Mr. de Beauharnois to Count de Maurepas.

My Lord,

This despatch was originally in cipher with the exception of the words in Italic.

We have just received a letter from Messrs. du Chambon and Bigot on the subject of the revolt which occurred at Isle Royale, in the month of December last, among the Swiss and soldiers of the garrison. Although they have signified us that they had the honor to inform you, by two vessels, they were proposing to dispatch in the beginning of May, of the importance of the affair, our uncertainty as to whether that garrison will not have opposed the departure of those ships, joined to the risk these are exposed to in consequence of the number of privateers which were to leave Boston to cruize in the latitude of Isle Royale, has caused us to determine on sending a vessel hence to advise you of this news, so that you may issue your orders for changing that entire garrison, according to the request of those gentlemen, and whatever other instructions you will deem proper to be sent for its disposal, as its continuance in that quarter is not advisable, as it has, according to those gentlemen's despatch of the 12th of April, pushed matters so as to cause every apprehension to be entertained up to the present moment. We have the honor to transmit you the particulars of the revolt, but as the captain of the vessel has orders to throw the despatches into the sea, in case he be hard pressed, M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart is to inform him of the subject of his voyage, so as to enable him to have the honor to render you an account thereof, should he escape the enemy.

News has reached here both by the domiciliated Indians and those of Acadia, that forty to fifty ships were to leave Boston for the purpose of blockading Isle Royale, or coming to Quebec. The first would be feasible, but I can scarcely believe the other. However, I have done all in my power to receive them; but Isle Royale appears to me in some danger, unless his Majesty send a fleet sufficient both for the conquest of Acadia and for driving off the English privateers who would assuredly annoy our merchantmen.

The party I have sent to Acadia is waiting at Minas, by M<sup>r</sup> du Chambon's orders, for those he is to send by your commands, which he is expecting in answer to what he has had the honor to address you, and the more impatiently, as he feels as much uneasiness from his garrison as from the enemy.

In other respects everything is quiet on this side. I am on my guard, and merely on the defensive, not being able to act offensively, as I had the honor to inform you, either against New England or the posts on Hudson's bay, in consequence of the want in the King's stores and even in those of the merchants, of the supplies necessary for such expeditions, a circumstance I was not informed of last autumn. Besides, the preservation of our possessions and forts, in the interior of the Colony, being my principal object, I considered it more prudent not to divest ourselves of our small means of resistance in case of attack, and to suspend the other projects, until I be in a condition to execute them.

I am in daily expectation of the Five Nations, who sent me word early this winter, that they would come and see me this spring, with the exception of the Mohawks, who, I am told, have accepted the hatchet from the English. They continue disposed to remain neutral as they have promised me. The Mohawks, however, are to come down with the rest, but the few there are of that tribe are not to be feared.

It has been very difficult to derive any profit from the Posts this spring, and there have been fewer licenses than last year. The scarcity, as well as the high price, of goods is the cause of this falling off in the trade which may be also looked upon as entirely lost for next year; should our ships not arrive in safety, it is to be feared that even this year the Indians will be disgusted on account of the few goods sent up to Niagara and the other posts, and be thereby induced to take sides with the English, in order to obtain their necessaries. I observe all these things with very considerable pain, in consequence of my inability to apply a remedy, and I see no other means of correction, except in the particular attention you will have been pleased to pay to the procuring for us the supplies I have taken the liberty to ask of you for the defence of the country, and in favoring, at this critical juncture, the trade the merchant vessels are prosecuting.

Reflecting, my Lord, that Isle Royale may be invested or besieged, those gentlemen will not be able to [dispatch] the ships they proposed, I write to Mr. Hocquart to send you two, if possible; and as that requires prompt expedition, he will come to a decision all alone, as the expected arrival of the nations, and my other occupations put it out of my power to go down, unless in case the enemy approach Quebec.

I am with most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

most obedient servant,

Montreal, the 18th of June, 1745.

BEAUHARNAIS.

Belle Isle Road, 13th of August, 1745.

My Lord,

I have the honor to inform you that I was obliged, on the twenty-seventh of June, to surrender Louisbourg and its dependencies to the English, after having sustained a siege of forty-seven days. I employed every means to save that Colony for the King, but it was impossible for me to do it, being in want of powder and people for its defence, as you will see by the decision of the Councils of War I have held previous to the surrender of that place. The enemy was greatly superior in number to us, having about thirteen thousand sea and land forces, and I had, at the commencement of the siege, including good and bad, but twelve to thirteen hundred men, who have been reduced to eleven hundred.

M<sup>r</sup> Bigot has informed me that he was sending you a copy of the capitulation, and of all the letters that have passed between the English generals and me. As he is about to repair to you as soon as possible, I shall give him the originals, in order that he may have the honor to present them to you, as I consider them more secure in his hands than if I had placed them in the post.

The troops are, for the most part, embarked in the Launceston, an English man of war, on board of which I went; another portion is in two vessels we have spoken at sea; the remainder, consisting of three French companies and that of artillery, were to leave Louisbourg a few days after our departure. I left M<sup>r</sup> D'aillebout to attend to their departure.

I shall await at Rochefort whatever orders you will be pleased to give me respecting the troops and myself.

I flatter myself, My Lord, that you will condescend to examine the defence I have made, and I hope that whilst doing me justice in your opinion, it will assure me the continuation of your protection, with which I pray you to be pleased to honor me.

I am, with the most profound respect, my Lord, your most humble and most obedient servant,

Quebec, 12 September, 1745.

My Lord,

You will have been informed, long before this reaches you, of our loss of Louisbourg. The officers of the garrison, and particularly those who may be deserving of your confidence, will have rendered you an account of all the circumstances which have accompanied the blockade, the siege and the surrender of that place. We have not been able to learn any particulars thereof, except from some seamen who made their escape, from time to time, from the different harbors of Ile royale, and have arrived at Quebec, the major portion of them in Biscayennes (long boats;) among the rest one Lacroix Girard, ship master, a native of St. Malo. This individual was in the place during the whole of the siege; his journal of it has appeared to us true, because of its simplicity, and this circumstance induces us to address you a copy of it. According to what M. Duchambon has communicated to Sieur Marin, in his letter of the 29th of June last, that commandant was obliged to capitulate, on account of want of men and powder. It is not for us, my Lord, to examine his conduct, nor that of the officers of the garrison, in the defence of the place; 'tis for his Majesty to judge of it; we shall confine ourselves merely on the occasion of this unfortunate affair, to submitting to you the different means that might be employed to recover Louisbourg, and conquer Acadia; the preservation of Canada depends thereon.

The English, by the situation of their Colonies, have had facilities which we do not possess. Boston is only 160 @ 180 leagues distant from Louisbourg; the passage is usually made in 3 or 4 days; therefore, after landing at Gabarus, they are within reach of supplies for their troops, and are able to replace whatever ammunition they might consume in the progress of the siege; they have made an entrepôt at the island of Canso, which they have commenced fortifying; the details of their arrangements, and the motives of the expedition, are fully set forth in their Boston gazettes; we annex them hereunto: Their diligence, and the success of the measures they adopted to obtain from Antigua and Old England the naval forces that have been employed in the blockade, are truly surprising. They have, moreover, been extremely favored by the fair weather and calms which have prevailed on the coast of Ile Royale, during the months of April, May and June last. The latest intelligence we have from that country is of the 17th July. The same Girard, who left Louisbourg on the 15th, told us that the English had begun to remove to the ramparts the artillery they had taken out of the Vigilant. We are to expect that the English will use all possible care to preserve that place; they regard it as of the greatest importance for the security of their coasts and fisheries; these views may the more reasonably be ascribed to them as, in order to rid themselves of all future uneasiness, they have not been willing to annul the severe condition of quitting the island which they imposed on the settlers; they even refused permission to them and the troops of the garrison to remove to Canada, doubtless in order not to strengthen a Colony they designed to invade; this they did not conceal; it constitutes the topic of the every day conversation of the people of New England, and particularly of those of Boston, Fort St. George, Chouaguin, &c. What is there, in fact, of more interest to them, than to occupy the entire of this continent? They would thereby become sole masters of the fisheries, and of the whole of the trade of this country, without any apprehension of being troubled by France, who would no longer possess any establishment in this part of America.

The English being now masters of Ile Royale, will become still more jealous, and more careful than ever to secure Acadia to themselves. That beautiful and fertile Province is essential to the maintenance of their new conquest, in which the English have not made any establishment, of importance, since the peace. 'Twas only last fall, and particularly during the present autumn, that they have put Port Royal into a state of defence, and have a garrison of about 300 men in it. All the rest of Acadia is inhabited exclusively by French people, and according to the information we have received of their numbers there may be about 2500 men, capable of bearing arms at Beaubassin, Minas and Port Royal, the three most populous places. As regards the dispositions of the inhabitants towards us, all, with the exception of a very small portion, are desirous of returning under the French dominion; Sieur Marin, and the officers of his detachment, as well as the missionaries, have assured us of this; they will not hesitate to take up arms as soon as they see themselves at liberty to do so; that is, as soon as we shall become masters of Port Royal, or they have powder, and other munitions of war, and will be backed by some sedentary troops for their protection against the resentment of the English. If, notwithstanding this preliminary, any settlers should still be found to hesitate declaring themselves, all difficulties would be overcome by the employment of menaces and force. The reduction of Louisbourg has, meanwhile, disconcerted them. M. Marin has reported to us that the day he left Port Royal all the inhabitants were overpowered with grief; this arose only from the apprehension of remaining at the disposition of the enemy; of losing their property, and of being deprived of their missionaries. The English might probably have recourse to such policy, or at least adopt measures to keep them in a strict and severe subjection. They will not experience any great difficulty in that, and consequently will not have to observe any delicacy, because the supplies of powder and lead, and other munitions, which the Acadians and Micmacs of the country were in the habit of drawing from Louisbourg, will be no longer forthcoming. These Indians, irreconcilable enemies of the English, cannot have any other place of refuge than Canada, or Ristigouche and Miramichi. This is what we have now to fear, and with a view to retain them, have thought of remedying it by transmitting to Miramichi some powder and lead, to which we add some provisions and other supplies.

We have just explained the conduct the English will probably observe towards the Acadians. We cannot imagine that they could entertain the idea of removing those people, in order to substitute Englishmen in their stead, unless the desertion of the Indians would embolden them to adopt such a course, utterly inhuman as it may be. The evacuation, exacted and agreed to by the capitulation of Louisbourg, excites a prejudice which must increase our distrust. The Acadians have not extended their plantations since they have come under English dominion; their houses are wretched wooden boxes, without conveniences, and without ornaments, and scarcely containing the most necessary furniture; but they are extremely covetous of specie. Since the settlement of Ile Royale they have drawn from Louisbourg, by means of their trade in cattle, and all the other provisions, almost all the specie the King annually sent out; it never makes its appearance again, they are particularly careful to conceal it. What object can they have, except to secure for themselves a resource for an evil day? Already many of them have caused inquiries to be made whether they could find lands here to settle on, and whether they would be admitted to enter on them. We have avoided all answer.

These reflections will not be without their use in throwing light on the principal object of retaking Louisbourg, or procuring for us an equivalent. But before entering into any detail, permit us again to submit some reflections in case the affairs of Europe happen to change their aspect in the course of this year, or a peace be concluded. The restoration of Louisbourg will, doubtless, be one of the articles to be discussed. The English are greatly interested that France should not possess a place of such consequence in their vicinity; their northern Colonies have heretofore regarded it as another Dunkirk which would keep them always in check. That harbor, fortified, would afford an asylum for our fleets and privateers, which would thereby be at hand to cut off their fisheries, the branch of trade of the greatest interest to New England and the Province of Piscataqua; Canso seemed to them a fishing post of such importance, that its capture by the French particularly led to the expedition against Louisbourg. It can hardly be expected that the English will give up their conquest, unless the King have gained advantages over them in Europe, which would induce them so to do; these will have to be considerable, otherwise we do not believe that they will surrender it, unless on condition that its fortifications be razed. This clause, and its execution would relieve them of all uneasiness; the battery or fort of L'Ilet would have, nevertheless, to remain.

The other maritime powers are interested that the benefit of the cod fishery do not fall exclusively into the hands of the English. Were these the sole masters of it, Spain, Holland, and even France would become, so to speak, their tributaries. 'Tis true, we would still possess the Gulf of St. Lawrence towards Gaspé, Labrador or Petit Nord, and the portion of the Island of Newfoundland ceded by the Treaty of Utrecht for purposes of fishing only. But all these put together do not amount to anything of sufficient consideration in regard to the consumption and trade of the Kingdom. We make no mention, my Lord, of the interest of this Colony. Ile Royale furnished it with a market for its provisions; that being no longer in existence, our products will necessarily fall in price. We already feel the inconveniences of this. Last summer flour kept up to 10 @ 12<sup>li</sup> the quintal; no sooner did we receive the news from Louisbourg than it fell to 6 and 7<sup>li</sup>. We have, according to all appearances, a fine harvest; wheat will not be worth 30 sous the minot, consequently there will be no more encouragement for the farmer. In fine, the two Colonies supported each other; ours, now, has no longer any support. A post could indeed be established at Gaspé. At the head of the bay of that name, is a fine harbor called Penouil bay, where the largest ships would ride in safety: its mouth is not difficult and may be about a quarter of a league in width. Gaspé bay is a secluded roadstead; its anchorage is good, and up to this time we have not heard of any ships having been wrecked there.

As many as 40 @ 50 fishing vessels have been seen at Gaspé and in its vicinity. Fishing commences there ordinarily between the 15th and 20th of June, and closes from the 15th to the 20th of November, and even later; but there are not enough of fish-flukes (galet) for drying; the fishermen supply the want by vignaux. The climate is nearly the same as that of Quebec. The lands at the head of Penouil bay are represented as pretty good. A Canadian, named Harbour, has a farm there, on which he has raised wheat that has come to maturity, also buckwheat and vegetables of every description; a quantity of hay is also raised there. The lands along the river that flows into that bay, are represented as capable of improvement. We mention this matter, my Lord, only incidentally; the Basque and St. Malo captains who visit that quarter every year, will be able to furnish you with more precise information of the advantages to be derived from the settlement in question, and we would have it in our power from this place, to perfect them when necessary. One obstacle, however, will always oppose its execution; that is, the passage of the gulf which is now barred. The English continue the same policy; they wish to occupy all the passages, and do in fact occupy them. In America they possess Antigua and Jamaica, in addition to Louisbourg; in Europe, Gibraltar and Port Mahon. We have learned indirectly that they have organized an expedition against Dunkirk; in the last wars they made an attempt on Cadiz. We ought to counteract and break up their plans. Excuse, my Lord, these digressions. We return to what more particularly interests this Colony.

His Majesty will, perhaps, confine himself simply to the conquest of Louisbourg, and postpone that of Acadia; but that project is as liable to mischance as to success; whatever measures are adopted must be very hazardous. We shall suspend the discussion of the matter only to refer to a second project in which Acadia will enter.

The enemy possessed, for his expedition, facilities we shall not have; Boston has been the first rendezvous; Canso, which they first established and fortified, was the second; this formed for them a place of retreat in all events, and from these two points they have been masters to choose their time for proceeding to Gabarus and landing their troops and ammunition there; they have had their vessels cruising before Louisbourg, according as the season and the ice permitted. It is to be observed that their first privateers were doubled and strengthened like the ships that go to the north, whale fishing; they have been so fortunate as to find the sea open on the south coast of Ile Royal as early as the 15th of March; a squall from the S. E., which is very usual in the spring, would have thrown some of their ships ashore. Such accidents may reasonably be apprehended, but if the contrary could be expected, we presume that the English will have erected fortifications or retrenchments at Gabarus bay to correct the defects of the Royal battery by constructing a cavalier or some blockhouses on the hill, for the purpose of preventing that work being taken in the rear. This will be an additional difficulty to be surmounted independent of the strong garrison that they will have stationed in the place.

On the east part of the Island are two convenient harbors, Port Dauphin<sup>1</sup> and Spaniards' bay;<sup>2</sup> the one or the other might serve as an entrepôt for the ships, troops and munitions of war which his Majesty would send from France. We should prefer Spaniards' bay; it is  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths of a league wide at the mouth; vessels would be secure in that bay by means of some gun batteries that could be erected thereabout. It is only 18 leagues distant by sea, and only 11 by land, from Louisbourg. Its environs abound with hard wood of every description, beech and cherry, some oak and pine. It was from this place particularly the inhabitants of Louisbourg procured their firewood. Some limestone and freestone are found there, and coal is not far off. Quite convenient is the mouth of the river called the Little Brador, which extends twenty leagues into the interior of the island, where it forms several lakes abounding with fish; on the northern borders of these lakes were the hunting grounds of the Micmacs, who reside on the island. The territory on the south abounds in prairies and is, 'tis said, well adapted for the growth of some products such as vegetables. On the coast, outside Spaniards' bay, cod is abundant and the fish good.

It is, then, in this bay that the King's troops, to the number of 2000@2500 men, destined for the expedition, would remain during next summer; we would reinforce them by 2 or 3 hundred Canadians and as many Micmac Indians belonging to the missions of Miramichi and Acadia, and according to this arrangement, we should set out in the course of the following winter. It may be about 5 or 6 leagues from the head of Spaniards' bay to Miré bay. There is no road, but we are assured that one is practicable; from Miré bay to Louisbourg, the road is constructed; it may be about five or six leagues in length. This bay freezes and the ice is always strong enough to bear artillery. In the summer our troops would erect fortifications and provide themselves with quarters. The fall is the proper time to make the road in question; a portion of the soldiery and Canadians would be employed on this work; the remainder would guard the intrenchments. Our ships would protect the mouth of the harbor or cruise in the gulf on the south side of Ile Royale and along the coasts of Acadia and New England. Thus, 'twould not be until the course of the winter, after the ice had taken, that our troops would move towards Louisbourg with a few pieces of light artillery and two or three mortars of 5@6 inch calibre, to be used in case of need. At that season, the place might best be carried by scaling. On the other hand, 'tis to be presumed that the enemy, aware of our preparations, will reinforce the garrison so as to be able to resist all attacks. The general in command of the expedition will be informed of this by the crews of the English coasters, sloops and other of the enemy's vessels which will probably be captured off the coast.

In case there should be, owing to difficulties, too much risk of compromising the King's arms, his Majesty might content himself with, or confine himself to, settling Spaniards' bay by leaving the 2500 troops there with implements, ammunition and provisions necessary for their support during one year. Canada is, however, capable of supplying this new post, from the commencement of next year, with abundance of provisions and the same comforts that Louisbourg was in the habit of drawing formerly from this colony; but in all cases 'tis proper that there should be one year's supplies in advance.

We have, in consequence, prepared the estimate of munitions of war and provisions, merchandise and tools necessary for the execution of the project in question, including a military chest of 3 or 400 m<sup>l</sup>. We suppose that the King will destine ten ships of war, 6 of 60 guns and upwards, and 4 others of 50 guns, 4 frigates of 20 @ 26 guns, two bomb ketches and a sufficient number of transports. 'Twill be proper to cause all these munitions, if possible, to be placed on board the armed ships; if, however, the 14 could not take them all, what remains could be put on board the merchantmen.

We shall not allude, my Lord, to the number of military officers destined for the land forces; we are equally persuaded that you will pay attention to the selection to be made of these, and of the military corps that will be employed in the operations. The staff will require one experienced commissary, one good storekeeper, with two or three intelligent clerks, one treasurer and a clerk, one surgeon-major and two assistants, versed in the composition of remedies, eight ship carpenters and two chaplains. It will be requisite to send, in addition to the 2500 regulars, some house carpenters, 12 or 15 at least, six joiners, six smiths and tool makers, as many locksmiths to act as armorers, 3 or 4 bakers and some masons, one blockmaker and two sailmakers. We add, that even should his Majesty confine himself to settling Spaniards' bay, the uneasiness and expense this new settlement would entail on the Crown of England, would inevitably induce it to surrender Louisbourg to us on the return of peace.

Sieur Dubois, the commander of Le Castor, who is well acquainted with Ile Royale, pretends that the expedition against Louisbourg could be undertaken in the month of May of next year; that a fleet could find shelter under Scatari and in its vicinity, and that the landing of the troops and artillery could be effected without much difficulty at the mouth of Miré bay, to proceed thence to the south of the lake of the same name and take up a convenient position for marching to besiege the place. Should his Majesty intend the expedition to proceed in spring, a greater number of vessels and troops would be necessary; 7 or 8 privateers of 20 @ 24 guns would be of essential aid to the squadron; 2 or 3 would be detached to Quebec for provisions and bring back 4 or 500 young Canadians. Messengers should not fail to be sent to notify the Indians of Miramichi and Ristigouche, and to conduct them to the rendezvous; their missionaries will be simply informed, beforehand, that they might receive news in the month of May from France, and of the course to be adopted in relation to Ile Royale and Acadia, in order that their Indians may be employed, if necessary.

In the annexed estimate of munitions of war those that can be drawn from Quebec are entered in the margin; it is not the less necessary to send some from France, say about half, lest the supply should fall short.

Success in the execution of the project will depend particularly on the fitness of the measures and on the diligence that will be used in carrying them out. They all appear to us of consequence; and you will, moreover, have an opportunity, in the examination you will make of them, to perfect them by the information the principal officers of Louisbourg will furnish you. Messrs. Bigot and Mompain ought to be perfectly conversant with everything practicable; but if it be his Majesty's design to carry the place decidedly, and if the English, as they seem, keep a strong garrison there, 'twill then be proper to double and even to triple the landing force and all the stores, with the exception, however, of the powder, artillery and muskets.

We resume the second project, that against Acadia. It must be considered under a different point of view from last year's; circumstances have changed since the reduction of Louisbourg. It is very probable that the English no longer entertain the same regard and the same complaisance as formerly for the Acadians, and that the latter will eventually be more reserved in favoring our projects against that province. Sieur Marin has informed us that when he was last leaving Beaubassin, he was assured that two English men of war had entered the basin of Port Royal. The enemy will not fail to stock the place abundantly with all the stores necessary for its defence and to strengthen its garrison. This consisted of 300 men when Sieur Marin left the place in the beginning of June. There were, then, six 24 pounders pointed towards the river, one 12 inch mortar and 30 pieces of cannon on the rampart. The fort is a square with 4 bastions, being about 180 toises<sup>1</sup> from one point of the bastion to the other; the wall is of earth faced with squared timbers 10 @ 12 inches in width, and 18 feet long, joined together and set up perpendicularly; the embrasures of the parapets are very open; the top of the parapets is set off with round sticks 12 inches in diameter, fastened with rope ends; these sticks being so disposed as to admit of being loosened and slipped over the talus of the parapets with a view to break the ladders which would be employed in scaling. The ditch may be 10 @ 12 toises in width, and 5 or 6 in depth; in its centre is a cunette with a palisade; the covertway is nothing else than the counterscarp; the glacis, with well defined, salient and entering angles, may be 15 toises. The outworks consist of the three blockhouses; * one situated between the mouth of the Little river and the fort, and defends the plain; the other two, E. N. E. of said fort, defend the approach of the Lower town. 'Tis to be observed that during Mr Marin's sojourn, all the houses of the Lower town were abandoned. The most part belong to the officers of the garrison. The English, however, have a large frame house (maison de colomage) there, to lodge their Indian allies; this house was defended by 4 guns. In regard to the blockhouses, they are square towers of the annexed figure, wherein their use is explained.

The English were informed, in the month of April, by three Indians whom one of their privateers, sailing under French colors, had surprised at Cape Sable, that Mr Duvivier was expected at the end of May with several men of war. It was in consequence of this advice, or even of previous information, that Mr Mascarin,<sup>2</sup> commandant of Port Royal, redoubled his precautions in order to place himself in a state of defence. You will see, my Lord, by the annexed journal, that Mr Mascarin had commenced, on the 12th or 15th of May, to have the north side of Goat island cleared, either with a view to discover, at a greater distance, the ships that enter the narrow mouth of the harbor, the view of which is intercepted by trees, or rather to erect a battery on it to defend the only ship channel between that island and the mainland, and by that means prevent vessels going up as far as the fort. 'Tis to be presumed that the English have now erected that battery, and that they will, on the receipt of the first news of preparations against Acadia, construct, perhaps, another battery at the entrance of the Strait.<sup>3</sup> Should they erect one on Goat island, it will not prevent ships entering and anchoring in the basin, nor troops landing on the south shore, opposite the anchorage ground. 'Twill be very easy to render the road, from that point to Port Royal, passable for the artillery destined for the attack; the distance is about 3 leagues.

The same estimate for the first project will answer for the second. One of the principal items still is that of the Military chest, to contain specie in silver coin of écus, half-écus and pieces of 30 sous, for the purchase of provisions and refreshments, the product of the country. We have made no reduction in the amount of provisions included in said estimate. Were the province to supply all that is required, it could not do so without being totally exhausted in less than a year. If his Majesty approve this second project, it will be proper to use such diligence in its execution as to enable the King's forces to be at the rendezvous by the first of May at latest, so as not to be anticipated by the enemy. With these precautions, success may be expected.

The success of the English in their expedition against Louisbourg, was owing to their extreme activity; they had been making preparations since the fall; their attempt against Canada in 1711, failed in consequence of their neglecting to adopt measures sufficiently early. Their old gazettes and journals attribute the ill success of their fleets in the West Indies, to delays which the government ought to have foreseen and prevented.

'Twill not be necessary that the ships to compose the King's fleet should meet on the same day in the basin of Port Royal, but only those having on board the landing forces and the munitions for the siege. The remainder could be employed in preventing the entrance of any reinforcements, and even in cruising along the coasts of Boston and the east coast of Acadia. These vessels will not fail, at this season, to capture some prizes that will inform them of what will be transpiring in New England and Ile Royale.

We have likewise left untouched, in the estimate in question, the different goods and implements required to meet the wants of the settlers and Indians of the country. It will be necessary to send enough of them every year until the possession of Acadia become peaceable and the French ships be able to bring thither from Europe the necessaries of life.

Port Royal is, in truth, advantageously situated for the security of the ships which will come to fish on the coasts, but the entrance to the basin is narrow, and the currents there are strong; besides, the fishery is much more abundant on the east coast, which has 3 or 4 very excellent harbors capable of accommodating the largest sized vessels, viz<sup>t</sup> La Hève, Chibouctou,<sup>1</sup> and Port la Tour.<sup>2</sup> This coast is not settled; at Mirligueche,<sup>3</sup> a small harbor 3 leagues east of La Hève, are only eight settlers, among the rest one Paul Guidry alias Grivois, a good coast pilot; again, west of La Hève, at the place called the Little river, are two more settlers. Germain Lejeune, one of these, is intimately acquainted with the coast; the man named Boutin and his children live three leagues east of the entrance of Chibouctou. The attachment of these people to France can be relied on.

Should the difficulty in getting the King's fleet into Port Royal basin be greater than we anticipate, by supposing that the English might have been beforehand with us, the landing could take place at the head of St. Mary's bay, but 'twould require fine weather, as the southwest winds there are strong. There is only a short portage then to Port Royal basin; this portage is used by the Indians.

Again, supposing that the English might have thrown supplies into, and increased the garrison of, that place, to the degree that our attempt would be too hazardous with the 2500 regulars we propose to have conveyed into that province, we might settle La Hève and Chibouctou, and intrench ourselves there. Chibouctou is not far from Minas, the most populous district of Acadia, and consequently that in which resources are most abundant. The Indians travel this distance in a day and a half. But 'tis to be hoped that the English will not anticipate our design on Port Royal; this is the principal object, and if the French flag can be hoisted there, all Acadia surrenders, and 'twill be no longer difficult to get the settlers to take up arms; reserving the eventual razing of that place and making a more considerable settlement at La Hève or at Chibouctou. We are very much inclined to believe that a settlement at the east would be better, because the fishing there is extremely abundant; at Canso alone, and its vicinity, the English have annually 2 or 300 fishing boats and 40 ships.

The English do not dry any fish on the east coast of Acadia since the war, through fear of being surprised there and killed by the Micmacs. These Indians rove along that coast from spring to autumn in quest of a livelihood. Lately, a boat belonging to an English merchantman having landed at La Hève for wood and water, these Indians killed 7 of the crew and brought their scalps to Sieur Marin; they can be depended upon to pursue the same course as long as means will be found to furnish them with arms, powder and ball. This is also the opinion of M. Loutre,<sup>1</sup> their missionary at Chibénacadie,<sup>2</sup> who arrived at Quebec on the 14th of September. He brought with him 5 of these Micmacs, deputies from that nation. We will report to you, my Lord, their resolutions and what will take place between us. This missionary has laid before us, on his arrival, the letter Sieur Dailleboust wrote him on the 22nd of July, indorsed on which is a sort of passport from Generals Warren and Peperel, enjoining him to repair to Louisbourg, in default whereof his life is threatened. The missionary has paid no attention either to the letter or passport, and we are about sending him back to his mission. He has handed the Marquis de Beauharnois a letter from Sieur Iriard, a merchant at Louisbourg, dated the 22nd July, which is interesting, and the intelligence it communicates can the rather be relied on as it corresponds essentially with what we have received from Acadia and other places, except that the information furnished by Sieur Iriard is more in detail. There is no doubt, at present, but it is well founded, and that the English intend to attack this colony next spring.

15th 7<sup>ber</sup> The delay of our ships makes us fear they are intercepted, and that we shall be this year deprived of every description of supplies that we demanded formerly, particularly last year, for the defence of the country. We flatter ourselves, however, until the 15th of next month, with the hope of receiving them, because we presume his Majesty, having been informed sufficiently early of the mutiny of the garrison of Louisbourg on the 27th of December last, and of the English expedition against that place, will have been pleased to reinforce the convoy which he will have ordered to be furnished to the ships from Europe for these parts. We shall annex to our last dispatches the estimate of the munitions we'll require; we cannot prepare it until we shall have received those we expect this year, or at least until we have abandoned all hopes of receiving them.

The project of the English modifies those plans we have submitted in the course of this dispatch against Ile Royale and Acadia. Sieur Iriard's letter explains, in a very positive and probable manner, the measures the enemy will adopt, if we except the 25 or 30 thousand men; 'tis difficult to imagine that they would be able to organize so large an expedition unless it include the land and sea forces. In 1711 they had about 6000 regulars from Old England, exclusive of the 16 companies levied at Boston of 100 men each (we do not know the precise number), and the crews of their ships. General Walker<sup>1</sup> sailed from Plimouth on the 15th of May with 11 ships of 60 @ 80 guns, 2 bomb ketches and 52 transports, fly boats and hospital ships, making, altogether, 65 sail. He arrived at Boston on the 30th of June, whence he took his departure only on the 10th of August with 14 small vessels, brigantines and barges, and 40 sloops or galleys with oars. This fleet was considerable for that period, and we must suppose that the English, being aware that this Colony has at least doubled within 35 years, will employ a proportionate force to conquer it. According to Sieur Iriard's information, they will avoid the inconveniences which caused their destruction on Egg island. They are aware of the difficulties and danger large vessels are exposed to in sailing up the river, and will not send any but middle sized ones; the others will cruise at the lower end of the river. Gaspé is a good place of retreat, and a safe entrepôt. 'Tis natural to suppose that they will fortify it as they have done Canso. The winds from the N. W. prevail during the whole of the month of May; the river can be ascended at that season in 7 or 8 days, and more than ordinary care will be necessary to avoid being surprised.

Sieur de Gannes, one of the captains of infantry who remained at Ile Royale until the evacuation was completed, has, by his letter of the 22nd of July, communicated the same intelligence to us as Sieur Iriard. Our scouts towards the Mohawk country were told on the 20th ultimo, even by some of the English themselves, that Quebec would be attacked in the spring from the sea, Fort Frederic and Montreal from above; that they would content themselves, this year, with weakening us by intercepting all the ships destined for Canada. This event must then be expected, and it appears to us indispensable for the preservation of the country, that his Majesty detail a fleet for these seas sufficiently powerful to oppose their expeditions. Their first rendezvous will probably be at Boston or in the adjoining harbors, to refresh their crews, and this will be in March and April, and perhaps partly in the month of May. The harbors of La Hève and Chibouctou, which are easily entered and quitted, are situated advantageously for observing the enemy, and conveniently for seizing their vessels, as well those destined for the expedition as for Louisbourg. We have already said it; success depends particularly on diligence; this is the most necessary; if it fail and the enemy's fleet and transports pass the gulf on their way to Quebec, without opposition, we should be embarrassed in providing against every casualty. In our opinion, the vessels which will bring us reinforcements should pass Gaspé in all April and the beginning of May, so that we might receive them here about the 15th. The season then is not so dangerous as people think. The late M. de Vaudreuil arrived at Quebec in the year 1686, on the 29th of May, with 5 or 6 ships which brought to the country regulars. M<sup>r</sup> de Beauharnois has repeatedly, and we have also conjointly, represented to you the necessity of increasing the troops in Canada; this necessity makes itself felt more than ever by that which exists for fortifying the garrisons of forts St. Frederick, Niagara and Fort Frontenac. There remain no more than 400 men in the 3 towns of the Colony, and if we be attacked above and below, 'twill be necessary to divide our forces. 'Tis true that the Colony can furnish 10 @ 12 thousand active and brave men capable of bearing arms, but only 6 thousand of them, or thereabouts, could be considered well armed. Notwithstanding the attention paid to disciplining them, 'twill be necessary to intersperse them among, and to have them coöperate with, the regular troops. The number of the latter is too small to form with our militia a body capable of intimidating and certainly overcoming the enemy. We consequently demand of you one thousand effective men. Another very important consideration is, that M. de Beauharnois has need of being seconded by officers of experience, and hereupon he will explain himself more particularly to you. He flatters himself that he will be able to preserve this Colony for the King by means of the reinforcements and of the supplies of munitions of war we have demanded of you last year, and whose arrival we expect, as well those we shall require of you for next year; otherwise the country will run great risk.

These are a great many objects to be attended to all at once, inasmuch as offensive and defensive operations are in question. 'Twill be for his Majesty to decide whether his naval forces will admit of his attending to both. The preservation of Canada must appear the object of most interest. Should the enemy once master it, 'twould, perhaps, be necessary to renounce this continent forever.

Under the apprehension that the supplies expected this year from France may be intercepted, and that the like may be the case next year, Sieur Iriard proposes in his letter, copy whereof we annex, to come to the River St. John next year with a vessel loaded with munitions of war to be afterwards conveyed to Quebec; he pretends to be conversant with that river; he is a man of sufficient discretion to avoid running any risk in that quarter; but the means he indicates for the conveyance of these supplies are not, in our opinion, very sure, still less are they feasible, on account of the distance, and of the difficulty of several portages, amounting to eleven, between the River St. John and the first French settlements, 40 leagues below Quebec. 'Tis confidently stated that vessels of 150 @ 200 tons can ascend two leagues up the River St. John to the first fall. Should there be any design against Acadia or against Ile Royale, or should the English persist in carrying out their plans against Canada, Sieur Iriard could be detached from the fleet, to convey to the place designated some munitions of war to be deposited with and confided to Father Germain, resident missionary at that place, for the purpose of arming the Indians of those parts, those of Medoctet, the Canibas and the Indians of Ristigouche and Miramichi, and to fit them for marching wherever deemed necessary. 'Twill be easy to distribute this ammunition among the neighboring Indians, and means will be found, by bark canoes, to convey another portion of it to Indians at a great distance. We have advised Father Germain of these circumstances. We simply annex the memorandum of the stores to be sent, if this project be carried out. We have included therein some provisions, some cloth and other goods suitable for the Indians. At all events, we shall be promptly advised of whatever will occur on the River St. John, and whether Sieur Iriard will repair thither.

We have held a council with the deputies of Sieur Leloutre's village; they stated in substance that being surrounded by the English after the loss of their stores at Louisbourg, they had come to inquire their Father's orders, for the purpose of punctually executing them afterwards, and to request him to prescribe to them the course they should subsequently have to adopt. We annex copy of the answer sent by the General to the village. The attachment of these Indians may be depended on; we send by sea as far as Miramichi, 4000<sup>lb</sup> of powder, and lead in proportion, and some cloth to cover them. It were to be wished that we had been in a condition to supply them with more ammunition, but in our present position 'twould not be prudent to strip ourselves. We made up the deficiency with 2000<sup>lb</sup> in specie, which we have intrusted to M. Loutre for the purpose of relieving their more urgent wants. It is highly important to preserve these Indians attached as they have always been to France; the English have been deterred from forming any settlement in Acadia solely by the dread of these Indians; and though the latter do in one respect embarrass the French, whose cattle they from time to time even publicly carry off for their support, the French are not sorry to see them residing in the Province, and themselves, as it were, under their protection. The English forbid the French selling or giving them any thing, and the latter excuse themselves to the governor of Port Royal, that they cannot help doing so to avoid being robbed. Permit us, my Lord, to report to you a late instance of the attachment of these Indians to us. The commandant of Louisbourg has recently caused notice to be given to the French of Acadia, that they should bring cattle there the same as before; the Micmas have plainly told the French that they would not suffer any to be conveyed there; that they would kill and eat all they should catch on the carrying place between Cobeguit to Tagmégouche,<sup>1</sup> which is the cattle road; none had been transported up to the 15th of August last.

21st 7<sup>ber</sup> M. Loutre left, with his Indians, on the 21st. He is to go to the River St. John, to Beaubassin, and thence proceed to his mission. He has been particularly recommended to inform us of every thing he will learn of interest. We have furnished him with a signal, by means of which the French inhabitants on the east coast, already mentioned, will recognize the King's ships. It is this: A White flag at the main, with the discharge of one gun, immediately followed by two others in quick succession. If the signal be not perceived and no canoes come on board, the same signal will be repeated in an hour. Sieur Loutre will send a letter to the captain of the ship who will have made the signal, to inform him of all that will occur in Acadia in regard to Port Royal, and of every ascertained movement on the part of the enemy. Some accident, however, may occur next spring, or even this winter, to Sieur Loutre, on whose head the English have set a price. In this case the signals become useless. We have furnished the same signal to Father Lacorne; if the news boat which will be sent him have no guns, the signal will be the flag at the main with three shots from a swivel, or 3 musket shots fired in the same order and repeated, if necessary. This last missionary left on the 22nd in a small sloop which we had equipped and loaded with provisions. She will be out of all danger if she can double Gaspé without encountering the enemy. It is well, my Lord, that you be informed of the number of Micmacs spread throughout all those parts.

When we received the first intelligence of the preparations making at Boston last spring, we were informed by our spies that the fleet was intended, in the first place, for Louisbourg, and that the English would come next to Quebec. We had the more cause to apprehend this, as, according to what Mess<sup>rs</sup> du Chambon and Bigot had written us on the 13th of April respecting the disorders among the garrison of Ile Royale, that place was, through the defection of the troops, untenable. We lost no time then to prevent all surprise, and to place ourselves in the best possible state of defence. Some fire-rafts have been diligently constructed about a league above Quebec, at Ile aux Coudres and other places, whence they could be easily drifted against the enemy's ships. We have caused a new retrenchment of fraized stockades to be built from the mill of the River St. Charles, near Quebec, to the powder magazines, and a new battery of 21 guns at Point à Carcy. Finally, in consequence of the deliberation of the 12th August, a wall of masonry has been commenced, which will inclose the town on the land side. We shall submit, in a special despatch, the motives that induced the Marquis de Beauharnois to have this work done, and annex the plan thereunto.

We have fixed, as last year, signals between S<sup>t</sup> Barnabé and Quebec; a sloop at Rimouski, and another at the Seven islands on the lookout. At Gaspé we had Sieur Bellefeuille, a worthy farmer of the place. He proposes going to St. Malo this year on a visit to France. The General has considered it necessary to move a portion of the militia of the government of Montreal down to Quebec immediately on learning the surrender of Louisbourg. Uncertain as we were of the enemy's proceedings, we had the Indians belonging to the villages of the Saut and the Lake of the two Mountains, and even those of the Upper country who were then at Montreal, brought down in like manner; we sent them all back at the close of August. This movement has occasioned an extra expenditure of 12 @ 15 m<sup>l</sup>. As for the rest, M. de Beauharnois will have the honor to inform you, in a private despatch, of the dispositions in respect to present circumstances, of the Iroquois of the 5 Nations and of the Indians of the Upper countries, as well as of those who are not domiciliated.

To return to Acadia; M. Hocquart will inform you by one of his despatches of the amount of expense incurred by Sieur Marin's party. This officer has received from that Province all the assistance it could afford, and by means of a letter of credit furnished him by M. Hocquart, engaging to pay at Louisbourg or Quebec, in specie or bills of exchange, all the moneys stated in the receipts which he gave, signed by him and Sieur Lignery, Major of the detachment. The Acadians readily seconded this expedition. Louisbourg being now no more, they find in their hands certificates of which they cannot make any use, as bills of exchange cannot be issued in their favor. It struck us that this will cause them much anxiety. We have given them assurances that all would be punctually paid next year, at Quebec. In order that we keep our word with them, 'tis necessary that you be pleased to authorize 80 @

100 m<sup>li</sup> in silver to be remitted hither to pay this sort of service already, or hereafter to be rendered. Otherwise, future difficulties must be expected which would cause the Acadians to look upon us as real enemies. 'Tis even fitting that, without being obliged to have recourse to this country, those who will have funds in the King's fleet should satisfy, if occasion present, the expenses in question, at the rate of 8<sup>li</sup> 8<sup>s</sup>, the value of the écu in Acadia, @ 6<sup>li</sup>, the value of the same écu in France, and to take up as many certificates as will be offered. This punctuality will maintain the King's credit.

We shall have some boats of observation again next spring at the lower part of this river; at Saint Barnabé, at La Trinité, at the place called Pointe des Monts, and at Seven Islands; the ships his Majesty may send, and even the merchantmen, will learn from them whatever will occur of interest either in this Colony or among our neighbors; and should his Majesty be pleased to have us furnished with some advice or orders, those intrusted therewith will be able to confide them to the commanders of said boats, who will be careful to convey them to the nearest settlements on the south shore. The first militia officer will afterwards have them forwarded to us by means of the post. This is the signal for our ships when on our coasts in order to make themselves known: hoist a white flag on the main yard, and the jack forward, and fire one gun, and a moment afterwards, two others in quick succession. A response will be made on shore by a fire, and when the vessel will have perceived the fire she will discharge a gun, when a boat or canoe will go on board.

We have communicated to you, my Lord, our different views respecting the expeditions to be organized next year. Among the officers belonging to Ile Royale who have gone to France, some will be found qualified to complete, and to throw more light on, them, especially as regards Louisbourg and Acadia; they must be still better instructed than we are as to what 'tis possible to effect. Pilots, conversant with the places, cannot be wanting at Rochefort, especially after the evacuation of Ile Royale. We presume even that some will be found acquainted with the coast of Boston. We annex hereunto, at all events, the copy Ensign Mercier has faithfully drawn of an engraved map found on board a schooner captured at Port Royal by Sieur Marin; on it is another of the harbor of Boston and its environs. We shall not enter, my Lord, into any project against that place, not being able to indicate to you the precise measures to approach and master it. We will merely observe that there is a tower, or lighthouse at Point Alderton, with a battery of 7 @ 8 guns. When ships are perceived from this tower, they are signalized by flags which are repeated at Castle island and thus reach the town. The coast from Bantry<sup>1</sup> to the Tower and Marblehead, furnishes pilots to the ships that propose entering. These pilots frequently go on board of their own accord without it being necessary to fire a gun for them; probably they are more on their guard since the war. Castle island is mounted with about 30 large guns which defend the channel. West of Boston and adjoining the town is a fort of 4 bastions with several batteries, one above the other, commanding the roadstead. Lastly, the English have erected, on the east point, a battery of guns which defends the harbor between Boston and Charle Town.

Permit us, my Lord, one last reflection. Should his Majesty order preparations this winter for the execution of any one of the projects mentioned in this despatch, we believe, that, with a view to throw the enemy on a wrong scent, 'twould be well to have the arrangements made partly at Brest, partly at L'Orient, Rochefort and Bayonne, and to fix on some Spanish port, either Corunna, Ferol or some other place, as the rendezvous of our ships. They could

Annexed, in cipher, is the extract of the general census of the Colony for the year 1744; it is extremely exact. 'Tis the summary of the several parochial returns ordered to be made last winter by persons whom we sent expressly for the purpose.

Hereunto also annexed, is the abstract of the marriages, births and burials in this Colony for said year 1744.

27th 7<sup>ber</sup> M. Germain, missionary on the lower part of the River St. John, arrived here yesterday with the Chief and 24 Indians of his mission, the most of whom served in M<sup>r</sup> Marin's party. They spoke to us to-day, and we have cause to be as much satisfied with them as we are with the Micmacs of Acadia, belonging to the Missions of M. Loutre and of Father Lacorne, the Recollet.<sup>1</sup> We shall endeavor to render them content, notwithstanding the want we experience of all sorts of ammunition. It is of consequence to keep them in their present good dispositions. This Missionary has assured us that he had learned from a sure source, that the deputies from the different parishes of Acadia had been well received by M<sup>r</sup> Mascarin; that this Governor had caused to be rebuilt the church at Port Royal, which had been burnt last year by the English Indians; that the deputies from Beaubassin having told him that they no longer had any missionary, he answered them, that if they could procure one he would willingly consent to it, as they had sent the other away. These same deputies have reported that they had never been so well received by the English, as on their last visit. This policy appears to us extraordinary in the present conjuncture. We do not clearly perceive its motives, unless M<sup>r</sup> Mascarin calculates that mild measures will be more effectual than any other to detach the affections of the Acadians from France, or that the reported success of the King over the English in Europe will have caused the change. The said deputies said that they had learned at Port Royal, that the King had achieved many important conquests even in England, where he had landed a considerable body of troops, which were headed, even by his Majesty; this news is so good, that we dare not look for its confirmation. However that be, it has diffused great joy among the inhabitants of Beaubassin. The missionary adds, that the English have permitted M<sup>r</sup> Maillard, priest and missionary at Ile Royale,<sup>2</sup> to remain at St. Peter's in charge of the inhabitants of that place who remained after having taken the oath of fidelity the same as the Acadians did formerly. The Micmac Indians belonging to this mission, numbering 80 families, are on their way to Quebec. We shall endeavor to locate

<sup>1</sup> "Better known by the nickname of Captain John Barthe. In truth, there was nothing of his order about him but his coat; he was a trader; visited Quebec in his own sloop, navigated by himself, only to sell his goods and purchase his supplies. When he had acquired vast sums of money, he abandoned his mission and applied for leave to return to France on pretext of ill health. Meanwhile, his money enabled him to keep a carriage; he mixed in ladies' society and thought no more of his convent. He went to France [in 1757], where he became secularized." Collections of the Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, p 82; Smith's History of Canada, I., 246.

<sup>2</sup> Rev. ANTOINE SIMON MAILLARD was sent by the Society of the Foreign Missions of Paris, to Canada, about the year 1734, and proceeded, as Indian Missionary, to Nova Scotia and Cape Breton. He afterwards was appointed Vicar-General of Louisbourg, but, on the fall of that place, retired into the woods, attending the few Acadian and Indian villages between that and Miramichi; he thus remained until 1759, when he made his peace with the English, and was invited by the Governor of Halifax to settle at that place, where a church was afterwards erected for his use, and to use his influence to quiet the Micmacs, for which service he was allowed a salary of £200. Surrounded by the respect which his virtues and influence gained, he lived many years at Halifax, where he died in October, 1768, and was buried with the greatest honors. Dourbourg. He was the first Catholic clergyman in Halifax, N. S. — Ed.

them when they will arrive. He has been informed also, that the deputies of the Island of St. John<sup>1</sup> who went to Louisbourg to submit to the English, had been sent home without any positive answer.

We have informed Father Germain of Sieur Iriards's project, and that it might be executed; he will, consequently, attend to putting in a place of safety whatever property might be sent and confided to him for distribution according to our orders, or by whomsoever the duty shall be assigned to. We have provided him with a signal by which to recognize the French vessel destined for the River St. John: A white flag at the mizen mast, and two shots succeeding each other at some little interval, and a moment afterwards two other shots in quick succession. It will be responded to from the shore by a fire or a smoke. The signal will be repeated should it not be perceived at first, and a canoe will go on board.

We have not spoken, except incidentally in this despatch, of the island and harbor of Canso. The Boston Gazette of the 6th of May, reports that the English have erected a block-house on the island, in the immediate vicinity of the old fort, and that they had inclosed it by a ditch, with a rampart and palisades fortified by a battery of 8 guns and a detachment of 80 men. They speak of the harbor as a retreat for transports, where armed vessels cannot enter. Should the English have held on to that post, it would not be difficult to dispossess them of it; Sieurs Duvivier, Dolabara, Morpain and other officers of Ile Royale, must be perfectly acquainted therewith.

4th Sher We learn to-day, by way of Orange, that the English have captured 10 of our ships in all, two of them large; that French blankets and cloths made their appearance and were even common in that town, which leads us to apprehend that our ships from Rochelle are among the number of the prizes.

'Tis added, that the Governors of Boston, New-York, Carolina and other Provinces are to meet at Orange, on an early day, for the purpose of treating there of present affairs; the Iroquois of the 5 Nations are to attend; the Mohawks have promised to inform the Commander of Fort St Frederic of what will take place on that occasion. The same talk continues respecting the project of attacking Canada next spring, at the upper and lower extremities of the Colony, and that preparations were already begun. They are not explained.

6 October. The strong winds from the northeast, which led us to expect some ships, have ceased; we must make up our minds to dispense with them. We are consequently going to work.

We have remarked in the Boston newspapers that the Governor of New England had, in order to insure the success of the expedition against Ile Royale, dispatched an express in February, or March, to Antigua, to invite Admiral Warren to come to Louisbourg to intercept whatever relief might enter the place; "that this officer, without awaiting the orders of the King, his master, had accepted the invitation," and that consequently he had come with the men of war, the Superb, the Launceston and the Mermaid. We were of opinion that we could mask our proceedings in the same way, and make use of the same ruse. We write, in consequence, to M<sup>r</sup> de Caillou, in triplicate, and annex copy of our letter. The English will be informed of the measures to be adopted in France for the security of this Colony, but they will not imagine that the ships which will sail in the month of January or February can have that direction. We believe, then, that this would throw them off the scent. They will suppose us weak, and we shall be strong.

13th October. The Marquis de Beauharnois had sent two Indians of the Saut S<sup>t</sup> Louis to Orange, at the end of August, to transmit from that place to Boston a letter he wrote to M<sup>r</sup> Shirley with a proposition to exchange the prisoners taken by M. Marin, at Acadia, and some others belonging to the two prizes taken by L'heureuse Marie, for the crew of the schooner La Marguerite, commanded by Sieur Lagrois of Quebec, which has been captured last summer off the coast of Isle Royale. The two Indians have not been well received at Orange; however, the Mayor<sup>1</sup> of that city has forwarded the General's letter to the Governor of Boston, who will probably reply to the proposition. These Indians, who are reliable, adroit and well acquainted with the English language, have reported the news contained in the annexed letter of Father Tournois, the Jesuit missionary of the Saut, on which the more reliance can be placed, inasmuch as it contains particulars that they could not imagine. We can hardly believe, nevertheless, that the English have fifteen thousand men at Louisbourg.

We are, with most profound respect, My Lord,

4th November, 1745.

P. S. On reflection, we have abstained from communicating to M. de Cailus the idea we have had respecting the assistance we might be able to derive from a fleet to be sent to the Island of Martinico; and we have thought that on receipt of this letter his Majesty would have time to issue whatever orders he should think proper on this subject. The fear of our letter being intercepted has, likewise, determined our change. Had we had a cipher with M. de Cailus we might have possibly persisted in our first project.

M. de Beauharnois to Count de Maurepas.

My Lord,

In my letter of the 19th of June I had the honor to inform you that I was daily expecting the Five Nations, as they had sent me word that they would come down to see me at the opening of the spring. They did, in fact, arrive at Montreal on the 16th of July last, except the Senecas, who did not accompany the four other Nations, but who came down on the eighteenth of August last to Quebec, whither I had been obliged to repair on receipt of the news, which had been transmitted to me at Montreal, of the departure from Louisbourg of the English fleet for this country.

As regards the Five Nations, I have held a council at Montreal with the Onondagas, Cayugas, Oneidas and Mohawks, who numbered more than 150; it was attended by the Indians from the different posts of the Upper country, who were at Montreal; so that this Council was composed of more than 600 Indians; the Iroquois alone spoke at it. I annex their speeches and my answers; also the address of the Senecas, who came down to Quebec. 'Tis to be wished that the one and the other perform their promises. What I can say at present is, that when my departure from Montreal for Quebec was mentioned, on the receipt of the news of the English fleet, all the different Nations that were at Montreal followed me hither, and several Onondagas joined the party. I have since been informed that they passed Chouaguén on their return to their villages; that they arrived at that post with the French flag, and had started from that place in the same style, without making any change. At their request I have sent Sieur de Joncaire to their country; he is to preserve them in their apparent dispositions, and to render me an account of the smallest change that may be effected by the urgent solicitation of the English, and by the resolutions to be adopted at a great Council to be held in the course of this month at Orange, which the Five Nations are to attend, on the invitation of the Governors of Boston, and of the other prominent governments of New England.

As for the other Nations belonging to the posts, the ardor manifested by those who were at Montreal and who accompanied me down to Quebec, and their conduct towards the English on other occasions, are proofs of the sincerity of their promises to me, when accepting the hatchet I presented, and caused to be presented to them. None were willing to accept the underground belts the English caused to be introduced into their villages, to induce them to declare against the French; and there is no suspicion of their assisting at any English Council. Several parties of the Detroit Indians which had been formed, as I had the honor to inform you, for the purpose of falling on the English settlements towards Carolina, have returned without striking a blow. Chevalier de Longueuil wrote me on the 27th of August last, that they passed five entire days at the entrance of English villages without any success; that the men did not come out, so that nothing was killed but a large number of horses, and hunger obliged the Indians to abandon their expedition; that, however, two parties of Hurons were unwilling to return without effecting something, and were going to try to penetrate into some places that were less on their guard, and where they will probably strike a blow. Although these movements have been, hitherto, unattended with any success, and none of any consequence can be expected from the operations of those parties, M. de Longueuil will prevail on these Nations to organize others, in order to foster a continual spirit of hostility against the English, who, in consequence of their distrust of the Indians, will not be able to corrupt and gain them over to their side.

Sieur de la Corne, the elder, whom I have sent to command at Missilimackinac, writes me on the 27th of August last, that as soon as he had raised the war-song at that post, 60 Outaouacs and Saulteux, applied to him for M. Noyelle, junior, who is deputy there, to conduct them to Montreal, in order to attack the English in conjunction with our domiciliated Indians. According to what he writes me of their departure, I have reason to expect them from day to day, and they will do good service in divers places.

The emigration of the Chasaneons has at length taken place; they have removed from their former location to the place I allotted them at the prairie of the Maskoutins<sup>1</sup>; they have even tied and plundered the English traders on the Belle Rivière to the number of eight, and advised M. de Longueuil to send in search of them. But the detachment of 15 or 16 Canadians dispatched thither by that officer, discovered only one, and the Chasaneons have said that they had carried the others along with them to their winter quarters, and would bring them to me, themselves, next year. I would have wished they had acted otherwise and sent M. de Longueuil, as they had proposed, these prisoners, who possibly will escape from, or perhaps be liberated by, them; possibly even they may form a new alliance with, in order to obtain their supplies from them. This is the more to be apprehended, inasmuch as, independent of the little reliance to be placed on the inconstancy of Indians, the prevailing scarcity of goods and articles they require, may produce among them great change towards us, and you will form a more correct opinion of our situation and of the difficulty we experience in supporting the posts in the Upper country, from the report M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart and I have the honor to submit to you on that subject. What I specially have to inform you, and took the liberty to communicate to you in my despatch of the 19th of June last, is, that there has been a great falling off in the amount of goods taken up this year for the trade (l'exploitation) of the posts, in comparison with what has been sent there in previous years. In consequence of the small quantity of goods in the hands of the merchants who furnish outfits, the ruling high prices, and the low rates obtained for peltries brought in return from the Upper countries, the Indian traders have been discouraged from supplying themselves with goods, and notwithstanding I offered licenses for nothing—especially to Detroit, in order that there should be abundance of goods at that post—only ten went up this year; I was obliged to give seven of these licenses gratis, in return for conveying the effects of the Commandant and of the garrison which could not otherwise be carried up without great expense to his Majesty.* I have not been able to find sale, either for the usual number of licenses for the post of Missilimakinac, to which place only nine canoes have gone, after considerable solicitation; for the same reasons that I have just had the honor to set forth, which apply equally to all the other leased posts; also to those of Niagara and Fort Frontenac, which are hardly better provided with goods necessary for the Indian trade there, and will be much less so next year, no supplies of any description having reached us this year. If these unfortunate circumstances, my Lord, give a considerable check to the general trade of the Colony, they become of still greater interest in the indubitable loss of the Indians, who no longer finding their necessities as usual at our posts, will assuredly abandon them to seek from the English their supplies, which will not be obtained except on conditions entirely opposed to the interests of the French, and to which it is to be feared, the Indians will be obliged to submit. Whatever attachment they may entertain towards the French, (a feeling I have preserved them in since I am in this Colony,) 'tis impossible for me to flatter myself with continuing them in it when the posts will be stript of every necessary, as I expect they will be entirely next year; ammunition and arms are the principal articles they desire, at the same time that they are what we can furnish the least of, in our present circumstances; and the same is the case with other articles of merchandise. Nevertheless, despite these inconveniences, which his Majesty alone can remedy by the aid he may send to the Colony next year, and which we expect, I will seek the possible, even in the impossible, so as to avoid wholly disgusting the Indians, and to stop the course they, 'tis to be feared, will adopt of abandoning the posts and of going over to the English. 'Tis not without considerable repugnance, my Lord, that I have taken the liberty of entering with you into these details; not only do my obligations require it, but it is also my duty to forewarn you of what may occur in this regard, against which 'twill, perhaps, not be possible for me to guarantee the Colony.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

most obedient servant,

Quebec, 23th October, 1745.

BEAUHARNOIS.

Speech of the Onondaga and Mohawk
Iroquois to the General, on the 26th of July, 1745.

The General's Answer.

After the usual compliments.

By a Belt.

Father: We see you are in a fog; that the sun is about to be hid from you; by this Belt we dispel the mist, and brighten the sun, so that he may give you light, to enable you and your children to labor in the good cause.

By a Belt.

Children: You know that I love the clear and quiet sunshine; I have never troubled it on any one; woe to them who will disturb it. As for me, by this Belt I clear away and dispel all the darkness that you may have found, and exhort you to labor, on your side, in the good cause, as I shall do, likewise, on mine.

By another Belt.

Father: By this Belt we water the Tree you planted with us; so that its top may touch the heavens, and M<sup>r</sup> de Callieres added that its summit must pierce the sky. In order that nothing may shake it he confided the care of it to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil. Father: We this day ratify it, so that nothing may throw it down.

By another Belt.

Children: I have neither forgotten nor abandoned the Tree of Peace I planted in your villages. You cause me pleasure when you speak of it. You desire, no doubt, to sustain it. By this Belt I lay hold of it, and again make it firm. I have no fear of its falling on my side, nor on that of my children, but take heed, lest on your side some blockhead may, unknown to you, break some of its branches; I warn that I will not then be able to preserve its trunk. Be on your guard, then, in order to avoid this misfortune.

By another Belt.

Father: We renewed M<sup>r</sup> de Callieres' treaty with M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil; we expect to do the like with you, and that you will be pleased to adopt the name we have conferred on you. We add some leaves to this Tree of Peace, so that it may be large enough to afford us shelter, whilst laboring in the good cause.

By another Belt.

The name you have conferred on me affords me pleasure. You perceive, by my mode of proceeding, that I have responded to it, and that I have trod in M<sup>r</sup> de Callieres' footsteps. To strengthen this Tree of Peace I bedeck it with new leaves, in order to be able to sit under its shade along with all those of my children who will labor with me in the good cause.

By another Belt.

Father: Roots were forgotten for this tree; our father omitted them on the south and on the west sides, and promised us to prevent any

By another Belt.

I strengthen, in like manner, the roots of this Tree of Peace from you to me and my children; but take care, lest those whom you do not sufficiently distrust, go secretly and cut some of its roots under-ground, so that it may fall. That would grieve me, as your tranquillity is dear to me. You know that I have always labored to procure repose for you; if any of my children have sometimes disturbed that, I have immediately repaired, to the best of my power, the harm that had been done.

By a black Belt.

Father: I forewarn you that I retain in my hand the good understanding between you and me. I shall not cease to strengthen it as long as I live. Father: You can send us, from time to time, M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, M<sup>r</sup> de Noyan, and others; they will not be in any danger by sending word when they are at La Grosse Ecorce, or at La Riviere a la Planche.<sup>1</sup>

By a black Belt.

Son: Your assurance that you will die, rather than abandon the good cause, affords me pleasure. I believe you sincere, but I'm afraid you will be imposed on. Distrust all those who do not love your Father. Whoever does not love him is not attached to his children. In order to strengthen you in your good sentiments I shall bestow on you, with pleasure, one of your children, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, de Noyan and La Chauvignerie, but you must wait until the path be open, and affairs less entangled. I have need of their services here, to unravel them.

By another black Belt.

Father: Agreeably to the treaty of peace not to disturb Choueghen, Niagara and fort Frontenac, we pray you not to carry the war into our country. No war is declared between your children; it is only between you and the English, and we are ignorant of the cause of it; we leave you to fight, and we pray you to let the Nations belonging to our cantons alone, so as to leave our hunting grounds undisturbed. We make the same request of the English by a similar Belt.

By another black Belt.

Children: You must be aware that I have no desire to trouble your country. You know I never tried to do so, and that I have observed what I have promised you. The English, to whom you have given new territory to make a beaver-trap, have, on the contrary, in spite of your prohibition, erected a considerable fort on it, furnished with good cannon, and a strong garrison. Such is the result of the promises they have given you. I now learn that they are collecting arms and provisions there. I'm told, even, that they wish to attack the forts of which you speak to me, and that you are pledged to assist them. Whilst you are here, expressing your sentiments to me, they are acting contrary to the treaties they made with, and the promises they have given to, you. If they act treacherously against me, in your presence and in your country, you will come and tell me, agreeably to your answer to my children of the Saut, that you have been but one night abroad, and that this misfortune has happened; do not think I shall be the dupe of it; I forewarn you; I shall not attack your territory, but should the English touch mine, from that point, and you defend me not, what opinion do you wish me to have of your conduct, other than that you have sold me, and struck me, by means of the English, whom you support, inasmuch as you require of me to spare Choueghen. Reflect well, I pray you, on that word you express, in the presence of all my children, your brethren.

The General's speech, after the Council. By a Belt.

Children. I cannot pass over, in silence, your apprehension that your brethren will declare against the English, and the manœuvres to which you have recourse to turn them aside from such a course. Some of you have given underground Belts to those of my children who have accepted my hatchet, with a view to engage them to remain neutral, and here is the proof: This message that you have given and which I give you back, because neither I nor my children can retain it. You did not even confine yourself to that; and you push your tenderness for the English so far as to exhort all my children in my presence to leave me to fight that nation all alone. Wherefore do you meddle with the matter I ask you? If your heart be English, and if you feel not your bowels yearning towards a Father, wherefore do you wish to disturb the obedience and tenderness good children must entertain for a good Father, when they are as much interested as I in the matter? I should very much wish you had remained quiet on your mats, when you cannot feel the interest you should have in acting otherwise. But I tell you that you will become suspected by me if you continue such speeches, and underground Belts against my interests. Should it happen that you hereafter give any, I engage all my children here present to bring them to me, and I rely upon their fidelity and affection.

25 August, 1745.

By a Belt.

Father: Be not surprised if we have not come to see you on our arrival. We knew you had a great deal of business. We met on the road our brethren, the Onondagas. We should be very glad to know what you said to them and what are your sentiments. We

third of September, 1745.

By a Belt.

Children: I am delighted at the desire you feel to see me. You must not doubt but I felt an equal desire to see you. 'Tis true that business is rather considerable just now, but it will never prevent me seeing children who afford me pleasure.

have seen M<sup>r</sup> de Beaujours at Montreal, who told us to come and see you, and that you would be very glad of the visit. We had nothing more urgent than to execute his word. We asked him for a little vermilion to appear before you, lest our Father should take us for ghosts, having the face pale, the rather as we do not know how we shall find him, and as, perhaps, he will be fighting the enemy. If that were the case, I should not remain quiet.

By another Belt.

Father: We have learned that a house belonging to you has been pulled down;<sup>1</sup> this Belt is to restore your spirits, and we are persuaded that you will find the secret of avenging yourself, being a great warrior. This we wish you may do, and we hope you will succeed.

By another Belt.

Father: When you restored peace to the earth you told us not to meddle with whatever you may have to do with the English; this we always conformed to, our word being inviolable. Father, in proof of the truth of what I said, there is a man who has been taken by your children, the Ouyatanons and Peanguichias, since peace was concluded. This spring your children, the Miamis, Ouyatanons, Peanguichias, have struck me; I did not carry their hatchet back to them, as I always bore in mind what you recommended to me, to coöperate in the work of peace.

Your son, Joncaire, will inform you of every thing that has transpired in the Council of your brethren, the Five Nations, and of my sentiments in your regard, which will ever be the same.

You have done well to follow M<sup>r</sup> de Beaujours' advice when he told you to continue your journey to me at Quebec. However you may appear before me, you would have always been well received. 'Tis not the face I regard; that is often deceitful; but the heart, which alone can give me pleasure. The uneasiness you felt in regard to the situation you might find me in on arriving at my house, affords me assurance of your attachment and fidelity. You owe me the one and the other, in return for the care I have always taken that you should live in peace with all your brethren. Children, I will continue in the same course as long as you will afford me evidence of a perfect submission to my will.

By another Belt.

Children: 'Tis true the English have deprived me of a beautiful residence;<sup>1</sup> but I hope that the Master of Life will avenge me. That enemy has no views but to overpower you. Listen to my voice. Be on your guard, and distrust those who seek only to deceive you.

By another Belt.

Children: You have done well not to meddle with any of the affairs between me and the English, since I gave you peace.

I have taken good care to have restored to you the man belonging to your Nation who has been taken by my children, the Ouyatanons. I shall reprimand my children, the Miamis, Ouyatanons and Peanguischias for having struck you. You have done well to let your hatchet be; and I will recommend them not to forget that you are, like themselves, my children and consequently their brethren.

Children: In regard to the road of peace

Father: We ask of you that the road of peace to Choueghen and Niagara, which you have cleared, be always open and unobstructed.

that I have laid out between my house and yours, my end has been always cleared; I have taken care to remove from it all the tufts (fredoches) that might incumber it; do the same at your end. The paths will be always free to you, and remember that you are always my children.

By another Belt.

Father: Be not surprised if I repeatedly begin my speech; I have no sense, but you can always rely, Father, that we shall be always peaceable, notwithstanding the invitations of the English, who have frequently endeavored to induce us to go and guard Choueghen, which we would not do. We are not like our brother, the 'Nondagué, who readily listens to their proposals. I am very glad that he hears me; I never speak in secret.

By another Belt.

Father: We have planted a Tree of Peace; we had made it as high as the clouds; you have raised its branches as high as the heavens, whilst its roots strike the centre of the earth, so that nothing can shake it. We beg of you to preserve it always in the same condition; on our side we will take care that nothing can damage it, so that all your children may be able to smoke undisturbed under its shade, and labor in the work of peace.

By three Strings of Wampum.

Father: We have a child* who heeds us not; he never ceases threatening us that he will leave our country; with that intention he has pulled down his house. Father: We pray you reprimand him. When he is among us everything goes well, and when he talks of going away, even the children are alarmed, all confiding in him for good times. Father: Be assured that no insult will ever be offered him; we are all ready to place ourselves in front of him, and will defend him on all occasions.

By another Belt.

I never weary of hearing my children talk when they speak well; they have sense enough to come to an understanding with their Father. This is evident, Children, from your refusal to listen to the solicitations of the English to guard their fort of Choueghen; if your brother, the 'Nondagué, has been there, he has allowed himself to be seduced. I think you will not follow his example. But I am persuaded that he will never return there again.

By another Belt.

Children: You cannot do better than to preserve the Tree of Peace which I have planted in your country; the loftiness of its branches, the verdure of its leaves, and the depth of its roots, prove that, on my side, I have done all that depended on me to preserve it in all its splendor; do the like henceforward, and nothing will ever shake it.

By three Strings of Wampum.

You, it is, who reared the child of whom you now complain. He will remain with you as long as the good of the service will not require me to recall him. I am persuaded of your affection for him, and of the quietness he secures you when in your country.

M. de Beauharnois to Count de Maurepas.

My Lord,

We have the honor jointly and severally to render you an account of the actual situation of the Colony; it is sad enough, and too interesting an object for us not to hope that you will condescend to apply serious attention to it.

The progress of the English in the lower part of the River St. Lawrence, informed as they are, of our not having received any aid, the advantage they have now over us in consequence of the capture of Isle Royale and the desire to achieve the conquest of Canada, leave no room to doubt that they will resume operations next spring. We are even openly menaced by them.

You, my Lord, are acquainted with our forces and their weak point; I calculate on the bravery of our Canadians and Indians. I flatter myself that you will do justice to my zeal, but notwithstanding all these advantages, if his Majesty be not so good as to send early supplies of powder, ball and at least eight thousand muskets, the force which the English propose to employ would make me entertain apprehensions for the Colony, though I might promise myself that it will be bravely defended as well by our few troops and our Canadians, as by all the Indians from the Upper country, who are to come down at the opening of the spring, and whom, with that view, I sent Sieur de Villiers to call out; the greater part of them will, however, be without arms. I am, with most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

most obedient servant,

Quebec, this 4th of November, 1745

[ Dep : de la Guerre ; Paris. ]

These arrangements have had three principal objects : the embarkation of the four battalions ; their treatment both afloat and ashore ; their command and service.

Embarcation.

Both battalions of Ponthieu are embarked on board the men of war with the exception of some companies belonging to the second battalion, which, as well as the two battalions of militia, will be put on board the transports (navires Malouines), and these troops have been distributed in such wise as to be very comfortable during the voyage.

The majors of Ponthieu, and the two colonels of militia, will be on board the men of war ; but the majors and adjutants of militia will be in the transports ; the captains and other inferior officers will make the voyage along with their companies.

In regard to the engineers, they will be put on board the men of war.

Treatment.

At sea, the officers in the men of war will, like those of the navy, eat at the tables of the commanders of the ships; those on board the transports will have tables which the purveyor will keep in the same style as those of the captains of the men of war; and the servants of the one and the other will have one ration and a half per day, the same as those of the naval officers. In regard to the noncommissioned officers (officiers-soldats) and privates, the first shall have a ration and a half and the others one ration per day.

On shore the officers' allowance shall be on the same footing as at sea, for which purpose eight months' supplies have been put on board the fleet. The arrangement of their tables on shore has not been regulated, as it depends on circumstances and the distribution of detachments; it is to be settled on the spot. As for the noncommissioned officers and privates, their allowance will be the same as at sea.

The soldiers shall not suffer any deduction in regard to this item, it being the custom of the navy to give the pay in full, exclusive of the ration during a campaign. But some part of the pay may be retained for the different articles which may be furnished the soldiers according to their demands; for care has been taken to put on board the fleet a considerable quantity of shirts, breeches, stockings, gaiters, shoes, officers' and soldiers' tents, canteens, wooden bowls, spoons, knives, and other store goods. No deduction has, however, been yet prescribed, and these articles have been left at the disposition of the commandants and commissaries, who are even at liberty not to retain anything for this first expense, should the accommodation proper to be afforded the soldier on such occasion, demand it.

Each soldier shall be furnished, before embarking, with 4 shirts, one jacket, one cap, and one blanket. The four battalions will receive, like the marines, three months' pay in advance. The funds necessary for the remaining five months' pay are on board the flag ship. The eight months' pay has been furnished by the treasurer-general of the Extraordinaries of war, and it is M. le Brun, naval commissary, who has charge of the money, as well as of the funds put on board by the treasurer-general of the navy.

This commissary is also instructed to perform the the duties of commissary of war to the four battalions. He has a general instruction to that effect in addition to a special one for the payments to be on account of the treasurer of the Extraordinaries of war.

Command.

M. de Meric is appointed, by special commission, commander of the four battalions, and another has been transmitted to him to command also the marine and colonial troops. He is to command likewise in Canada, subject to the governor's orders, should he go thither, and at the sieges that will possibly be undertaken in the enemy's Colonies under orders from the Duke d'Enville, or in his absence, from the commander of the squadron.

The two battalions of the regiment of Ponthieu are to march before the marine troops, which will take precedence of the two battalions of militia. And it is in consequence of this arrangement that the officers of the different corps are to roll in duty<sup>1</sup> among themselves respecting their command. But if the four battalions be in Canada the two battalions of militia and their officers will rank before the troops and officers of that Colony.

M. de Meric is authorized by his instructions to remain in America and retain there the whole or part of the four battalions of the land forces, according as the Duke D'Enville will think proper.

Order to M. de Meric to command the four battalions.

Another order to M. le Brun to act as commissary of war, with an instruction for the performance of the duties thereof, and a letter accompanying the same.

Instruction to M. de Meric respecting the course he is to pursue during the campaign, with a letter accompanying the same.

Regulation respecting rank between the four battalions of land forces and the marines, and between the respective ranks of the one and the other.

Orders of the King to prevent the land detachments on board private ships, obliging the captains of these vessels to put back in case of being separated from the fleet.

Letter to M. de Meric accompanying these orders and regulations.

Another letter on the same subject to the Duke d'Anville.

By Count de Maurepas.

Orders for the treatment of the land forces at sea and whilst landing.

Order to M. de Meric conferring on him the command of the marine and Canadian forces, and the supervision of sieges.

Copy of the regulation respecting the rank of the troops and their officers.

And a special regulation ranking the two battalions of land militia as well as the regiment of Ponthieu over the Canadian forces and militia.

Instructions to M. de Meric.

Sieur de Meric will embark, agreeably to his Majesty's orders, on board the fleet commanded by the Duke d'Anville.

The object of the equipment of this fleet is to accompany the two battalions of the regiment of Ponthieu and the two battalions of militia of Fontenay le Comte and of Saumur, which are to be shipped at the same time for the defence of Canada, on the supposition that this Colony is attacked by the enemy, or to attack their North American Colonies.

Should the fleet proceed to Canada, Sieur de Meric will assume the command there not only of the four battalions of the regiment of Ponthieu and of the militia of Fontenoy la Comte and of Saumur, but even of the marines which will happen to be landed, of the troops in the Colony and of all the militia of the country, agreeably to the orders his Majesty has caused to be issued and which are to be sent to him. He will employ all these troops in such operations as will appear to him the best, according to circumstances. But he will take care to execute all the orders he shall receive in this regard both from the Duke d'Enville and the Governor Lieutenant-General of Canada.

In case the fleet do not proceed to that country, and that the Duke d'Enville should have it in his power to employ them in some expedition against the enemy's colonies, Sieur de Meric will land with the troops at the places determined on by the Duke d'Enville for executing the operations he will have to carry on there. He will have everywhere on shore the command of the troops which will be employed there. He will, in like manner, command at the sieges he will have occasion to undertake there, but always subject to the orders of the Duke d'Enville, or the commander of the fleet, in case of the death of the Lieutenant-General.

If, after executing the operations with which the Duke d'Enville is entrusted, he thinks it necessary for his Majesty's service to leave in Canada, or elsewhere, the four battalions of land forces, or only a part of them, M. de Meric will conform to all the arrangements this lieutenant will make therefor. And in case he should determine to leave only two battalions of the regiment of Ponthieu, M. de Meric will complete them with the soldiers he will draw from the battalions of militia.

His Majesty also permits M. de Meric to remain in America to fill such command as the Duke d'Enville will deem suitable for him, in virtue of the power his Majesty has conferred on him; and He will retain even in particular consideration the services he shall render in that country.

Finally, he will be informed by a regulation that his Majesty has made, of the rank the officers of the land forces, of the marines and of Canada are respectively to hold, and that to be observed between these different troops in the movements they will make together.

Count d'Argenson to M. de Meric. 25 March, 1746.

I transmit you an Instruction wherein the King explains to you generally the conduct you have to observe in the campaign you are about to make with the Duke d'Enville's fleet. Should there be any particular orders to be given to you respecting the operations of this campaign, Count de Maurepas will cause them to be transmitted to you either directly or through the Duke d'Enville.

It only remains for me to wish you opportunities to respond to what his Majesty expects from your zeal and experience, and you need not doubt my attention to set your services in the best light, nor the pleasure I shall feel in contributing to obtain for you their reward.

Count d'Argenson to M. de Meric. 1st April, 1746.

I send you, Sir, copy of the Regulation issued to arrange both the rank of the four battalions of land troops to be embarked on board the Duke d'Enville's fleet, with the troops of the marine, and the respective command of the officers of these different corps; and Count de Maurepas addresses another copy thereof to the Duke d'Enville.

I transmit also to you the King's orders which you required to prevent the detachments of troops embarked on board private ships, obliging the captains to return in case of separating from the fleet. You will be so good as to distribute these orders to the commanding officers of these detachments.

I am truly, Sir, your most humble and most obedient servant.

All the accounts received concerning Louisbourg, show that the English have not sent any considerable force there.

It appears by those of the 15th of April, that Commodore Knowles<sup>1</sup> pretended to give out that he was destined to be Governor of Louisbourg, only with a view to conceal the object of his mission to the South sea, whither he proceeds with three ships. 'Tis known that he has passed from the command of the Yarmouth, of 70 guns, to that of the Norwich, of 50, and there is every reason to believe that the vessels destined for Louisbourg have really to escort them to the Colony, only the three frigates of 40 guns designed for service in the department of the Northern Colonies.

In regard to the regular troops, it has been observed that there are going on board only three hundred of the men belonging to the regiment that was reported to be wholly destined for Louisbourg; and that the reinforcement to this detachment of three hundred men amounts to no more than a like number of three hundred, making, in all, six hundred men.

The two regiments which sailed from Gibraltar at the end of November, were not to be more than eight hundred and fifteen men each, on the ordinary establishment, making, altogether, one thousand six hundred and thirty men; but the last advices from Cadiz state that the troops which embarked at Gibraltar for Louisbourg are, at most, one thousand men, and a captain of an English vessel coming from Virginia, who was taken by Count Duguay, declares that the convoy from Gibraltar, which put into Virginia, carries only eight hundred men to Louisbourg.

The united forces are not in a condition to resist those embarked in the Duke d'Enville's fleet.

As to Naval forces, there remain at Louisbourg only the Vigilant, 64, and the Chester, 50. Townsend's fleet, which consisted of six ships, is reduced to four by the return to England of the Princess and the Ipswich, each of 70 guns; and it is, moreover, expected that if Townsend<sup>2</sup> is able to reach Cape Breton it will be only in a very poor condition.

It does not appear that the English are disposed to send any fleet from Europe to that quarter.

<sup>1</sup> Sir CHARLES KNOWLES, Baronet, was commissioned Captain in the navy February 4, 1737, and in 1739 served in the expedition against Portobello; in 1740 he commanded the Weymouth, 60, in the fleet sent under Sir John Norris against Ferrol; and in 1741 was attached to the expedition against Carthage. He was afterwards Governor of Cape Breton, and commanded at Jamaica in 1747; beat the Spanish fleet under Admiral Reggio, near Havana, in 1748. He was Vice-Admiral in 1757, in which year he attacked Aix; Admiral of the Blue in 1763, and raised to the dignity of a Baronet 19th October, 1764. He was Rear-Admiral of England in 1765; went, afterwards, into the Russian service, but returned to his native country and died in 1777. Beaton.

<sup>2</sup> Admiral ISAAC TOWNSEND was commissioned Captain in the Royal navy in 1720. In 1740 he commanded the Berwick, 70, in the blockade of the Spanish fleet at Cadiz. In 1746, having become Vice-Admiral, he commanded the fleet in the Leeward Islands, and drove a French fleet ashore at Martinico in 1746. In the latter year he was in command of a fleet at Louisbourg. He was next appointed Admiral of the White and Governor of Greenwich Hospital; was struck with paralysis November, 1763, and died in 1768. Beaton. — Ed.

Abstract of the different movements at Montreal, on occasion of the war, from the month of December, 1745, to the month of August, 1746.

1745. December 30th. Lieutenant St Pierre left this town with a detachment under his orders, consisting of two lieutenants, 2 ensigns, on full pay, 4 seconded ensigns, 7 cadets, one surgeon and an interpreter, 3 volunteers and 105 colonists, making, in 'all, 126 Frenchmen and 37 Iroquois and Nepissings, to encamp in the neighborhood of St. Frederic, for the purpose of opposing the enemy's attacks against said fort.

1746. January 24th. Sieur St. Luc de la Corne was sent to reinforce Sieur de St. Pierre, with a detachment composed of one seconded ensign, 6 cadets, 2 volunteers, 100 colonists 30 Iroquois, who have remained under M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre's orders until the first of April, when they arrived in this town, after having made divers scouts on Lake St. Sacrament and in the neighborhood of the above fort.

31st Captain Desabrevois has been detached with Chevalier de Niverville, ensign, and 53 Iroquois to the South river, in Lake Champlain, on occasion of an alarm.

March 16th Chevalier de Niverville, officer, and Sieur Groschesne Raimbault, cadet, left this town with some Abenakis Indians, on their way towards Boston, and returned with some scalps and prisoners, one of whom he took with his own hand. Sieur Duplessis, Junior, an officer, started at the same time with 6 Algonkins and Nepissings in the same direction, and joined the preceding party, with whom he returned, bringing in a prisoner, who was captured at the same time, &c.

29th A party set out, consisting of 14 Iroquois, belonging to the Lake of the Two Mountains, who have been in the country of Orange, and returned with some prisoners and scalps.

April 20th A party set out composed of 14 Iroquois, belonging to the Sault St. Louis, commanded by Ontassago, the son of the grand Chief of that village, who sojourned at Fort St. Frederic, and made several scouts to Sarasteau.<sup>1</sup>

Theganacoeïssin, an Iroquois of the Sault, left with 20 Indians of that village, to go to war near Boston; they returned with 2 prisoners and some scalps.

Thesaotin, chief of the Sault, left with 22 warriors, belonging to that village, to make war in the direction of Boston; they returned with some scalps; one Iroquois was killed and two wounded of the party.

Ganiengoton, chief of a party of 8 Iroquois, belonging to the Sault, set out in the direction of Boston, and returned with two scalps.

26th. A party of 35 Iroquois warriors, belonging to the Sault, set out; they have been in the neighborhood of Orange, and have made some prisoners, and taken some scalps.

A party of 20 Abenakis of Missiskouy, set out towards Boston, and brought in some prisoners and scalps.

27th A party set out, consisting of 6 Iroquois of Sault St. Louis, who struck a blow in the neighborhood of Orange.

May 7th Six Nepissings started to strike a blow in the direction of Boston, and returned with some scalps.

10th Gatiénondé, an Iroquois of the Five Nations, who has been settled at the lake for 2 or 3 years, left with five Indians of that village and Sieur S' Blein, to strike a blow in the neighborhood of Orange; this small party brought in one prisoner; Gatiénondé, the leader of the party, has been killed and scalped by the English on the field of battle.

12th Six Iroquois Indians of the Sault set out towards Boston, and returned with some scalps.

15th Ten Indians, part Iroquois of the Sault, and part Abenakis, set out to strike a blow in the direction of Boston; they made an attack, and brought away some scalps.

17th 31 Iroquois, belonging to the Lake of the Two Mountains, set out, and struck a blow in the neighborhood of Boston, and brought back some prisoners and scalps, and laid waste several settlements on their way back.

18th 10 Nepissings left, who struck a blow towards Boston.

A party of 8 Iroquois belonging to the Sault has been fitted out, and has been to make an attack in the same direction.

22nd 19 Iroquois, belonging to Sault St. Louis, have been equipped; they have been to strike a blow in the direction of Orange.

24th A party of 8 Abenakis of Missiskouy, has been fitted out, who have been in the direction of Corlard, and have returned with some prisoners and scalps.

27th Equipped a party of 8 Iroquois of Sault St. Louis, which struck a blow near Orange, and brought back six scalps.

28th A party of 12 Nepissings who made an attack in the neighborhood of Boston, have brought away 4 scalps and one prisoner, whom they killed on the road, as he became furious and refused to march.

A party of Abenakis of Missiskouy, struck a blow near Orange and Corlard, and brought in some prisoners and scalps.

Equipped a party of 10 Iroquois and Abenakis, who joined together to strike a blow towards Boston, and returned with some scalps.

June 2nd Equipped a party of 25 warriors of the Sault and three Flatheads, who joined the former in an expedition in the neighborhood of Orange, and who returned with some scalps.

3rd Equipped a party of 18 Nepissings, who struck a blow at Orange and Corlard.

4th Equipped a party of 16 Iroquois of the Sault, who return to where they have already struck a blow.

5th Equipped a party of 11 Nepissings and Algonkins, who have struck a blow in the neighborhood of Boston, and have brought in some prisoners.

6th Equipped a party of 17 Nepissings, who have struck a blow in the direction of Boston and brought back some scalps. These Indians have had 2 wounded.

8th Equipped a party of 8 Iroquois of the Lake, who have struck a blow near Guérrefille.<sup>1</sup>

12th Equipped a party of 10 Abenakis Indians, who struck a blow in the direction of Boston.

13th Equipped a party of 6 of the same Indians, who made an attack in the direction of Boston.

Equipped a party of 9 Nepissings and Algonkins, who have struck a blow in the Boston country. One of these Indians was wounded.

17th Equipped a party of 10 Abenakis, who went to make an attack at the River Kakécoute,<sup>2</sup> and were defeated near a fort; their chief Cadenaret, a famous warrior, has been killed; the remainder returned with some scalps, and left others which they were not able to bring away, the dead having remained too near the fort.

19th Equipped a party of 25 Indians of the Sault St. Louis, who struck a blow near Orange. One or two of these Indians were wounded. They brought away some scalps.

20th Equipped a party of 19 Iroquois of the Sault St. Louis, who went to Orange to strike a blow

21st Equipped a party of 27 Iroquois of the same village to go to Orange; Sieur de Carqueville, an officer, and Sieur Blein, a cadet, have been of this party, which has brought in a prisoner that was on the scout to Sarasteau, and some scalps.

July 16. Lieutenant Demuy left this town with a detachment under his orders consisting of 5 ensigns, 6 officers of militia, 10 cadets, 48 settlers and about 400 Indians, partly our domiciled Indians and partly some from the Upper country; this party tarried at Fort St. Frederic, and has been employed scouting, and working on the River au Chicot,<sup>1</sup> where they have felled the trees on both sides to render its navigation impracticable to our enemies. Several of these Indians have formed parties and been out on excursions, M<sup>r</sup> Demuy having been ordered to wait for the party commanded by M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud, whom he joined.

June 30. 38 Iroquois of the Five Nations came to speak in Council.

July 23. 31 Outawois of Detroit, some of whom returned home being unwilling to go to war.
16 Wild Rice Indians (Folles Avaines).

14 Kiskakons of Detroit who gave proofs of their fidelity to the French, and who have all been to war.

NOTE.—Munitions and presents have been sent to Sieur Joncaire, to enable him to negotiate with the Iroquois, of the Five Nations, and to retain them neutral.

August 3<sup>d</sup>. M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, town major of Three Rivers, set out with a detachment under his orders, composed of 2 captains, 1 lieutenant, 3 ensigns, 2 chaplains, whereof one is for the Indians, 1 surgeon, 10 cadets of the regulars, 18 militia officers, 3 volunteers and about 400 colonists and 300 Indians, including those domiciled and those from the Upper country. This party has been on the River Kakekoute, where it attacked a fort near Brockfil containing a garrison of 22 men, with 3 women and 5 children. After a fight of 26 hours and the loss of one killed and several wounded in the fort, the garrison surrendered prisoners of war. M. de Rigaud, the commandant, has been wounded by a shot in the right arm, and 3 of his Indians killed on the field of battle; one of these was an Iroquois of the Lake and one an Abenakis; 4 Frenchmen and 11 Indians have been wounded. Considerable devastation was committed by the party on its return; it set fire to all the houses and grain found standing within a space of 15 leagues, with barns, mills, churches, tanneries, &c., and finally returned with its prisoners to Fort St. Frederic, where it remained awaiting the orders of the General, who recalled the whole party.

Sixty Abenakis, belonging to this force, went, after the fight, to lie in wait for 20 Englishmen who were to come to the said fort, according to the report of the prisoners; but not having met them, went farther, and some returned with 7 scalps, 1 Englishman and 1 Negro.

Seventeen Mississaguez who left this party before the capture of the fort, have been 6 leagues below Orange and struck a blow and brought back 4 scalps.

NOTE.—All the expeditions of our enemies have, up to the present time, amounted to some Mohegans (Loups) scalping a soldier belonging to the garrison of Fort St. Frederic, who had gone out unarmed, and who had been at a pretty considerable distance, where these Indians were concealed; the English had promised them a considerable sum of money, which alone gained them over, it being the only blow they were willing to strike, notwithstanding all the importunities of the enemy.

31st. Equipped a party of Iroquois of the Sault consisting of 6 men.

Equipped a party belonging to the same village of 8 warriors who have not returned.

M<sup>r</sup> de Montigny, 2 cadets and 25 Abenakis and Iroquois of the Sault, were sent, subsequent to M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud's fight, on the scout to Sarasteau.<sup>1</sup> A portion of the Indians having gone off, Sieur de Montigny, who saw no hostile movement nor preparation in that fort, made an attack with 14 men who remained by him, on 20 soldiers belonging to that garrison who were escorting a cart loaded with clay to build a chimney, and killed at the gate of the fort 4 men of the detachment, who were scalped by the Indians, and took 4 prisoners.

M. de Beauharnois to Count de Maurepas.

My Lord,

I have received the letters you did me the honor to write me on the 26th and 28th of April 1745, and on the 7th March of this year.

I have observed by what you have been pleased to communicate to me, that his Majesty has approved the work effected in 1774<sup>1</sup> for the defence of Quebec and Montreal, and in the different forts of the Colony. I have jointly and individually reported to you, my Lord, the condition of these forts last year.

The garrison of Fort Niagara is actually composed of Captain Duplessis faber.

Lieutenant De Contrecour.

Ensigns De Boulascry, Chev. de Garner.

4 serjeants and 33 soldiers, two of whom are gunners.

The garrison of St. Frederic consists of Captain De Noyas.

Lieutenants Dumont, De Boucherville, Herbin.

Ensign De Millon.

2nd Ensign De Montigny.

5 serjeants and 88 soldiers, including 5 gunners.

The fort is abundantly supplied with provisions and munitions of war, with the exception of artillery.

The garrison of Fort Frontenac consists of Captain De Tonty.

Lieutenant De Cabanas.

2nd Ensigns Le Borgne, Depeux.

Two serjeants, 33 soldiers and 2 gunners.

These garrisons will be reinforced, when necessary, on the first movement of the enemy.

At Fort Chambly are Sieur de Beaulac, a reformed lieutenant, one serjeant and 5 soldiers, as you have ordered; and I am unable, for want of sufficient troops, to increase its garrison, which, however, would be very necessary in the present conjuncture. This fort serves as a store or entrepôt for all the munitions destined for Fort St. Frederic.

I have already acquainted you, my Lord, with the disposition of the Five Nations as respects Choueguen. The advantages we have gained in the interior of the Colony might possibly have created alarm, had we been in a condition to follow them up, by being supplied with goods and effects necessary to fit out new parties, and to meet the wants of the trade of the posts. The circumstances in which we are placed by the want of these supplies, must make us desire more than ever that the 5 Nations should observe the neutrality they promised. Nevertheless, I shall neglect no means possible to induce them to coöperate in what his Majesty appears to require of me in this regard. Sieur de Joncaire is already notified to give that matter all his attention. His activity and vigilance may be relied on, if there be any prospect of success. M. de Longueuil might have suited for that negotiation, but that officer is very corpulent, and illy adapted to make these sorts of journeys. Those nations, who adopted his oldest son in the council I held with them last summer, appear always much attached to that family. I expect to send him to assist Sieur de Joncaire, should circumstances become more favorable.

On the 10th instant I received news of M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil by the arrival of Sieur Delinn,<sup>1</sup> a Louisiana officer, whom he permitted to come to Canada on some family affairs. He confided to him also several letters, in which he communicates to me what you were pleased likewise to state to me respecting the measures to be adopted to terminate the disorders Indian traders (Coueurs des bois) are continually committing among the Illinois, and to prevent the frequent desertion of the soldiers from that post. The distress of the Colony does not admit, for the present, of the establishment of the new posts proposed by M. de Vaudreuil; and as regards the limits of the trade of the two Colonies, which it might be well to circumscribe, that merits, nevertheless, an examination on which I cannot enter until after the departure of the ships, because it is necessary to reflect whether this arrangement would not be more prejudicial than profitable to the posts that are leased, in consequence of the separation of a portion of those posts that might follow; this would, in some degree, be injurious to the commerce of the Colony, by diminishing the revenue derived from them. But, as it is important to check the brigandage of the Coueurs des bois, and as this is one of the considerations of most interest to the commerce of the two Colonies, I shall take all the precautions which will possibly concur to that end, in making use, agreeably to your Lordship's wishes, of M. de Vaudreuil's reflections, and agree upon a plan on this subject that may put an end eventually to these sorts of disorders. As for the rest, on M<sup>r</sup> Bertet's complaining this year to me that deserters from Louisiana found free access to the posts adjoining Detroit, I have written to Chevalier de Longueuil to issue warrants in virtue of my orders, for the arrest and conveyance to Fort Chartres, of these deserters, without any sort of mercy.

The man named Augé, one of the partners in the post at the Bay,<sup>2</sup> has been killed by a Wild rice Indian. His misconduct and drunkenness have been the cause thereof. He, it was, who supplied goods to the Coueurs des bois, who afterwards retired to the Scioux. Sieur de Lusignan, who spent last winter among this tribe, has meanwhile ordered these Coueurs des bois to return. They gave him to understand that they were ready to obey and follow him; they even set out, but either on reflection, or rather on learning that they would be arrested at Missilimakinac, they turned aside and abandoned Sieur de Lusignan. This officer brought with him, this summer, four Scioux chiefs of the Lakes and Prairies, who came down to solicit my pardon for 19 of their young men, who had killed 3 Frenchmen at the Illinois. The chiefs delivered up these young men, bound and tied, to Sieur de Lusignan, on his arrival at their village, seemingly evincing sorrow for the fault they had committed. This nation behaved well during the winter, and made peace with the Puants, Wild rice Indians and the Sauteurs of the Point, with whom they had been a long time at war. Sieur de Lusignan obliged them to restore the prisoners they had made, which produced tranquillity among the nations inhabiting that post. As regards the lessees of the post, they have made no complaint to me of Sieur de Lusignan, who favored their trade by every means in his power. These lessees would have done a very profitable business had they not suffered from fire, whereby they have lost considerably; the increase in the price of beaver has, however, indemnified them partly for that loss. We jointly report to you the arrangement adopted relative to that post, the lease of which has expired, and to the others that are in a like position.

Immediately on receipt of your despatch I sent to Chevalier de Longueuil the cross of St. Louis and his Majesty's license to wear it until he may be able to present himself for reception. I have every reason, my Lord, to be well satisfied with this officer's zeal and diligence in the management of the Indians of Detroit, so as to determine them to come down to Montreal. Some belonging to all the nations came, notwithstanding all the intrigues of the English to dissuade them from this voyage. I have not failed to recommend to Sieur de Longueuil to profit by the good dispositions in which these nations have returned, and to manage so as to induce them to make some incursions during the winter against the settlements the English have made in the direction of the Beautiful river, and of the White river.

I have rendered you an account of the success of the party I sent out last fall to the borders of New England. The expeditions I proposed organizing towards Missilimakinac and Hudson's bay, have not, as yet, taken place, and I beg you, my Lord, to assure his Majesty that I will not relax in this, nor in any other parts of the service.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and most

Obedient servant,

Quebec, 25th S<sup>ber</sup>, 1746.

Military and other Operations in Canada during the years 1745-1746.

Abstract, in form of a Journal, of whatever occurred of interest in the Colony connected with Military operations; also of the various news received since the departure of the ship St. Roch, Captain Petrimoult, which sailed for France the first of December, 1745.

1745. November. The Minister has been informed of the fitting out of the party commanded by M<sup>r</sup> Marin, to attack the settlements on the River Connecticut. This detachment was composed of 300 Frenchmen, and of about as many domiciliated Indians, who set out from Montreal on the beginning of this month. The French arrived at Fort St. Frederic on the 13th and 14th of the same, and Indians not until the 17th. The latter, then, represented that the season was too far advanced to go to the River Connecticut; that not being fitted out for the winter they would run great risks in returning from this expedition; that, moreover, the settlements in that quarter were on the other side of the river, in which they might meet some ice. On these representations, and on the proposal of the Indians, M<sup>r</sup> Marin determined to march towards Sarasteau,<sup>1</sup> a post about 15 leagues from Fort St. Frederic. He attacked that village in the night of the 25th and 29th of this month; burnt and plundered all the houses, and took about 100 prisoners, men, women, children and negroes; part of these have been dispersed among the Indians, who took possession of them, and the remainder lodged in the prisons at Quebec.<sup>1</sup> This officer returned to Montreal on the 9th of December following, and his detachment a few days after.

December. At the close of this month the General issued orders at Montreal for the fitting out a party of 160 men, including French and Indians, under the command of Lieutenant St. Pierre, to go on a scout towards New England, and to observe the enemy's movements. This detachment set out from Montreal in the forepart of January, and proceeded to Fort St. Frederic.

January 7th. On the receipt of various information by Indians coming from New England, that the English propose attacking Fort St. Frederic, the General has just ordered the fitting out at Montreal of a new detachment, consisting of 150 men, both French and Indians, under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc la Corne, to join M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre's party, and to protect Fort St. Frederic. This detachment left Montreal between the 20th and the 25th of this month for its place of destination.

On the same occasion orders were issued at Montreal to hold 1500 men of the district in readiness to march to the assistance of Fort St. Frederic on the receipt of the first intelligence.

3 February. Captain de Perigny died at Montreal on the 24th ultimo, aged 85 years.

8. The General deeming his presence necessary at Montreal, set out to-day for that place in a sleigh.

March 25th Two Indians arrived from Acadia with letters from M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre and Father Germain, of the 27th of December and 30th of January; the first informs us that his Indians had, in the month of November last, intercepted letters written by the government of Louisbourg to that of Port Royal, directing M<sup>r</sup> Mascaren to dispatch a vessel to Boston, and to send him 1000 to 1200 Bostonnois to replace the dead; not to permit any Bostonnois to go into Minas basin to insult the settlers, and not to trouble the Indians this winter. It recommended the placing all the privateers, early in the spring, on the coasts of Acadia; complains seriously of M<sup>r</sup> Loutre, missionary of the Micmacs; requests M<sup>r</sup> Mascaren to do all in his power to apprehend him, or to oblige him to quit the country, and to abandon the Indians.

In regard to news from Louisbourg it appears certain that the English had not received any reinforcement up to the 14th of November, and that sickness had been very rife there, since the conquest.

These days past 21 guns have been removed from the rampart to the new Dauphin battery.

14th The General arrived from Montreal.

15th We receive a letter from Ensign Joncaire, of the troops, who was sent last fall to the Senecas, to retain the Iroquois, of the 5 Nations, in a strict neutrality. He informs us that some Mohegans (Loups) returning from Boston and Carolina, had reported that great preparations for war were making in those parts.

Several prisoners, men, women and children, taken at Sarasteau, having fallen into the hands of the Indians of the party, were ransomed by divers individuals, particularly from the Indians of St. Francis and Becancourt; they have been brought down and lodged in the barracks at Quebec, and the price of their ransom repaid by the King.

19. An express dispatched by Sieur Lefevre Bellefeuille, of Gaspé, arrived with intelligence that the ship Le Lion d'Or, commanded by Sieur Bionneau, anchored in Gaspé bay on the 15th November; this vessel sailed from Rochelle on the 8th 7<sup>ber</sup> in company with the flyboat La Gironde, from which she separated eight days after her departure; on the 8th November she found herself between the Grand Etang and Fox river, and was forced by bad weather to anchor in the Bay of Gaspé, which was already full of ice.

<sup>1</sup> Nov. 20, 1745. Last night I received a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Albany by express, dated the 17th instant, acquainting me, that the night before, the enemy had cut off Saraghtoga settlements upon our northern frontiers; that only one family had escaped destruction by flight; that they saw the fort and some other buildings in flames. Message of Governor Clinton to the New-York Assembly; Journal, II, 86. — Ed.

21. 3 expresses are dispatched to-day to Gaspé, to bring up the letters Sieur Bionneau may have, as he has not sent any by the express which arrived on the 19th

23. Conformably to the project proposed last fall to send early to the mouth of the River St. John, a vessel loaded with ammunition and necessaries for the Indians of that quarter and vicinity, Ensign Dupont Duvivier, formerly commandant of the Island of St. John,<sup>1</sup> was dispatched to the lower end of the St. John's river, to look out for and receive, in the absence of Father Germain who winters at Beaubassin, whatever ammunition might be sent, to distribute it among the Indians and also among the settlers of that river who will need it. That officer has taken his departure to-day accompanied by Serjeant Lambert, 2 soldiers, 2 Canadians and 2 Indians. They are to remain at the River St. John until further orders.

April 4. Sieur Cartier is sent off to-day to La Gribanne,<sup>2</sup> near St. Joachim, to build 12 additional fire rafts, with orders to inspect those constructed last year at Ile aux Coudres and its vicinity.

5. Messrs. St. Pierre and St. Luc, having had orders to bring back their detachments to Montreal, have arrived to-day to render an account of their mission.

8. M<sup>r</sup> Depleine is sent to arrange the signal fires along the south shore from Point Levy to Rimousky, the same as last year. He is entrusted with the orders issued to the captains of the said shore to construct cabins in the woods for the security of the families, and to send the settlers to Quebec in case of the approach of the enemy's fleet.

12. We receive by Indians from Beaubassin, letters from Father Germain and M<sup>r</sup> Le Loutre. The latter informs us, among other things, by his letter of the 2<sup>d</sup> March last, that the settlers of Mirligueche had come to acquaint him that Matthew Ouinel, an Acadian, had arrived at Mirligueche at the end of February, and assured those settlers that he had escaped from Ile Royale, and that that place had been retaken by M<sup>r</sup> Duvivier on the first or second of said month of February. This missionary adds: That the same Ouinel having, without doubt, been to Port Royal with the same news, it has spread consternation in the fort; that Governor Mascaren had, since that time, forbidden the English of the fort to speak, on pain of death, to the settlers, and that this governor had immediately set at liberty some Acadians whom he had detained as prisoners a long time. The capture of Louisbourg appears to us imaginary; it is impossible that M<sup>r</sup> Duvivier, or any other commander, entrusted with the expedition, would not have endeavored to give us or Father Germain notice of it.

By the same opportunity we receive a letter from Minas of the 2<sup>d</sup> March, stating that the English have been obliged to withdraw the troops they were keeping at Canseau, in order to send them to Louisbourg, and that sickness was more prevalent than ever in the latter town. The rumor prevailed in Acadia that the Governor of Boston<sup>3</sup> had been taken last fall on his way from Louisbourg to Boston.

Several prisoners taken at Sarasteau and elsewhere, have assured, on the contrary, that the Governor had died at Boston, on his return from Ile Royale.

An Acadian farmer, a worthy Frenchman, writes us on the 20th of March, from Tagnigouche, near Beaubassin, that the people of St. Pierre, near Ile Royale, who had retired to Ponquitte, have reported that the English had abandoned, at Christmas, the grand battery and islet; that they then amounted to 600 men, that they were burning the timber of the houses, that they had constructed a citadel at the Dauphin bastion, on which they have placed 6 pieces of cannon; and, also, 3 barracks at the Queen's gate, for the accommodation of 2000 men who had not arrived.

The captains on the Island of Orleans, are informed of the signal fires ordered along the South shore, with directions to send, on the first intelligence of the enemy's approach, their families and cattle, with all the provisions possible, to the North shore, and then to repair to Quebec to assist in the preservation of that town.

18. Two biscayan boats are dispatched, one to convey Sieur de Rouville to St. Barnabé with the signals agreed upon and sent last fall to the Minister, to observe all the French vessels that will pass there, as well as the enemy's ships which might ascend the river, and to give prompt notice thereof by means of signals and expresses which he is to dispatch immediately; the other serves to convey along the South shore the men who are to keep the signals in the uninhabited places.

22. We learn by a courier sent from Isle aux Coudres that the brigantine La Petite Marguerite, Capt<sup>d</sup> Chaboisseau, which sailed from Bordeaux on the 29th of January, has arrived at said island on the 21st. This vessel is freighted with 10 thousand weight of powder for account of the King, and the circumstance has begun to diffuse joy among the people.

23. The brigantine La Petite Marguerite has anchored in the roadstead. Sieur Chaboisseau has assured us that Sieur Sallabery has sailed from Rochefort about the 15th of November for Quebec in a sloop with 30<sup>m</sup> wt. of powder and some muskets. This Captain has added, that Sieurs Cheron and Monsegne, whom we dispatched in the month of June of last year, have fortunately arrived in France; that the vessels which sailed from Quebec last fall have also arrived, except the ships La Marie sans pareille of Marseilles, and the brigantine Le Perou of Quebec, whereof they have had no tidings.

2 May. Sieur Joncair, who resides among the Senecas, sends us, in a letter of the first of April, confirmation of the neutrality of the 5 Nations; that the hatchet of the English, which had been accepted by some young Mohawks, has been returned to them by the chiefs of that nation, who have declared that they would remain quiet during the war.

4th Sieur Cartier being returned from La Gribanne, where he had 12 fire rafts constructed, has been sent back to-day to the Ile aux Coudres for the purpose of manœuvring, if necessary, the rafts constructed on that island. Orders have been sent by him to Sieur Jean Peron to manage those of La Gribanne; to Captain Martel, of Bay St. Paul; to Sieur Bouchard; also to those of the Little river near Bay St. Paul, and to Captain Rancourt, to conduct those constructed at St. Joachim.

6. Orders are issuing for the enrolment, in various places along the south shore, of 175 men to assist in working the fire-rafts of Ile aux Coudres and vicinity. These settlers have orders to set out at the first notice they will receive of the enemy's approach. Boats are being repaired at each of these places for their conveyance.

Orders are likewise sent to the 7 Islands to post a guard at Pointe des Monts to watch the ships that will pass there. The commander of this corps has the same signals as Sieur Rouville at Rimousky.

An express, dispatched from Isle aux Coudres, has arrived; we learn by him the arrival of the ship Letourneur, Captain Duhamel, sent from Brest with 7 thousand <sup>wt</sup> of powder and 1000 grenadier muskets. It was by this opportunity that we received the Minister's despatch in cipher dated 24th January, containing the King's orders for the fitting out 600 Frenchmen and an equal number of Indians for Acadia, to join the forces of the fleet which are to be on the coasts of Acadia about the 20th of this month.

8th Agreeably to the King's orders, we are taking the necessary measures for the levy of the 600 men as ordered; to wit, 250 in the government of Montreal, as many at Quebec, and 100 in the government of Three Rivers, to be commanded by Captain de Ramezay.

The vessels for the conveyance of this detachment are being prepared.

The census is taking of the Abenakis and Micmacs of Acadia, who are scattered throughout different parts of the government of Quebec and in the villages of Becancourt and St. Francis. Orders are issued to bring down a portion of the warriors of these two villages to join the others.

Crews are being looked up for the vessels; they are very scarce.

Also, pilots for the entrance of Bay Verte.

Four months' supplies for 1200 men, including flour, biscuit, pork, vegetables and other refreshments, are preparing in the stores.

Other arrangements, besides, are making for the most prompt dispatch, and M. Guillimin, com<sup>r</sup>, who acts as commissary of the department, is instructed to attend to the details of fitting out of the expedition, and he will make the campaign.

We dispatch Sieur Goguel, merchant, to purchase grain in the government of Montreal.

13th The expresses sent in March to Gaspé have returned. They do not bring any letters of interest.

14th Ensign de Niverville has brought in to-day two prisoners, named John Spafford and Isaac Parker, whom he took about 30 leagues from Boston; <sup>1</sup> they have been examined—say that two regiments are to be sent from Boston to Ile Royale, to relieve the garrison of that place, where over 700 men have died; that 2200 regulars arrived from London at New-York, towards the close of the winter, and have set out again for Louisbourg.

That Lydius has been several times this winter to Boston, to represent the necessity of taking Fort St. Frederic; that at his instigation a consultation has been held in the Assembly on this subject, but that it had fallen through; that the preparations making at Boston are for the relief of the garrison of Ile Royale, and that the Governor of Boston is not dead.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> Perthuis and Bazin have started in two biscayennes, the first for Cape Desrosiers and the other for Cape Chat, with orders to establish a guard at each place, to look out for the French vessels which will appear off those coasts, to inform the commanders of the two frigates that are to come there of whatever occurs. With this view an abstract has been furnished them of all the news of this continent, with the signals agreed upon, by means of which they will recognize all the King's ships.

NOTE—This is a trader, who lives within 12 leagues of Fort St. Frederic, whose house has been plundered by Mr. Marli's party, in the month of September last.

We have entrusted to Sieur Perthuis a letter we write to Father L'Estage, the Recollect Missionary of the Ristigouche Indians, wherein we request him to send all his Indians to Beaubassin, where they are to await the detachment from Canada, of which we inform him.

15th We notify Father Germain, by a courier dispatched to-day to Beaubassin, of the King's orders, which we have just received, and of the preparations we are making at Quebec. We request him, in consequence, to cause the necessary carriages and other conveyances to be prepared for the conveyance from Bay Verte to Beaubassin of the provisions and ammunition of the detachment which we send off.

We write by the same opportunity to Father Lacorne, missionary at Miramichi, to repair with the Indians belonging to his mission to Beaubassin, where he is to await our detachment of Canadians.

The General likewise gives orders to M. Dupont Duvivier, who is at the River St. John, to repair to Beaubassin, where he will receive new orders for his destination, and to take with him whatever Indians will be within his reach. He will leave sergeant Lambert at the River St. John, to correspond with us, and take to Beaubassin the soldiers and Canadians we gave him at Quebec.

A courier sent from Rimousky by M. Rouville has arrived, from whom we learn the arrival at said place of the ship La Ste. Julienne, of Bayonne, captain Monségne, who sailed from St. John de Luz on the 20th of February, freighted with 18<sup>m</sup> of powder, 600 muskets and other munitions and effects. We receive, by this ship, copy of the Minister's despatch of the 24th January.

One of the prisoners taken last fall on the River Connecticut, told the interpreter, our confidential agent, that the Governor of Boston had returned very late from Ile Royale, and that M<sup>r</sup> Phipps,<sup>1</sup> his Lieutenant-Governor, was unwilling, pending his absence, to decide on the exchange of prisoners proposed by the General.

22<sup>d</sup> We are in receipt of letters from Montreal. That of the 20th informs us that the Englishman named Bleke<sup>2</sup> who had been taken prisoner near a fort situated on a river called Echouellet, 50 leagues from Boston, had been brought in, who having been interrogated said that several persons had come, a few days before his capture, into his country to raise a force, and that vast stores of provisions had been laid in at Boston during the winter, that about 2000 pairs of snowshoes had been made there and what Indian moccasins were necessary. He did not mention any other preparations.

The ship Ste. Julienne anchored in the port. Captain Monségne said that he had been chased five times in the course of his voyage.

23<sup>d</sup> We write to Father Germain, by a courier we dispatch to Beaubassin, respecting the precautions to be taken on the arrival of our detachment at Bay Verte. We write also to the Commander of the fleet.

<sup>1</sup> SPENCER PHIPPS, whose name was originally Bennett, was the son of Dr. David Bennett of Rowley, Mass.; his mother's name was Spencer, and she was from Saco, Me. Spencer Bennett on being adopted by his uncle, Sir William Phipps, took by statute the latter name. He was elected a councillor in 1722, and afterwards reelected nine times; next Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts from 1732 to his death, which occurred on 4th April, 1757. He administered the government from September, 1749, to 1753, and in 1756 and part of 1757. Williamson's Maine, II., 161; 1. Massachusetts Historical Collections, III., 194; Hutchinson's Massachusetts, III., 62. — ED.

25th A party of Abenaki Indians bring in two English prisoners whom they took on the first of this month at Goram,<sup>1</sup> 8 miles from Casco and 120 miles from Boston.

It is reported that a vessel arrived at Boston from London at the end of April, had given out that the King was equipping a fleet of 100 sail for North America.

That 2000 regulars had arrived last fall at New York in 25 men-of-war and transports, and that these troops had sailed for Louisbourg on the first of March with 100 families which had embarked at New York.

That six men-of-war and other vessels, the number of which he did not know, were at Louisbourg from the beginning of March, under the command of General Matthews.<sup>2</sup>

That Governor Shirley is at liberty to manufacture money to any amount he pleases for war purposes.

The ship Le Lion d'Or, of Bordeaux, which had wintered at Gaspé, is arrived.

The Micmacs of Ile Royale, to the number of 80 warriors, who have wintered in the neighborhood of Quebec, having been fitted out, departed yesterday in 8 biscayennes under the command of Cadet Marin, the younger, for Bay Verte, with orders to lie in a safe place there and to await the detachment of Canadians which is to set out in a few days; we gave him some signals which he is to make at Cape Tourment for the purpose of recognizing the ships which will convey our detachment.

We write by this opportunity to Father Germain and to the commander of the fleet.

25th Two prisoners, taken by a party of Abenakis on the 3<sup>d</sup> instant, 80 miles from Boston, are brought down from 3 Rivers.<sup>3</sup>

'Tis said that a ship, arrived at Boston from London at the end of April, had reported that the Pretender had been put to route, that a portion of the prisoners taken had been hanged, that the remainder were massacred and<sup>4</sup> driven to the mountains.

That about 3000 soldiers had arrived at Louisbourg from London, who had first touched at New-York.

That the English had a great desire to attack Fort St. Frederic, but it had passed off.

That no troops had been raised in New England to attack Canada this spring, though there had been considerable talk about it.

That a party of 150 men came from Dunstable, in the month of March, to within 2 days' journey of our villages of St. Francis and Becancourt, but finding themselves not sufficiently numerous, returned back.

29th An old trustworthy prisoner, who has been gained over to our interests, comes to inform us of what follows, which he has learned from the newly arrived prisoners.

That there are 15 men of war at Ile Royale and a great many privateers.

That the Pretender had been driven into the mountains of Scotland, and that 9,000 of his men had been destroyed or taken.

<sup>2</sup> Vice-Admiral THOMAS MATTHEWS, after a long and distinguished service, was tried by court-martial, 16 June, 1746, for misconduct whilst Commander-in-Chief of the fleet in the Mediterranean, in 1744, and sentenced to be cashiered. He died in 1748. The statement in the text is therefore correct. It was Vice-Admiral Isaac Towasend that commanded the Louisbourg squadron at this time. Beaton. — Ed.

That the Pretender's brother was in the Tower of London and several Lords with him, and it had been remarked that he had two thumbs on each hand.

NOTE.—The above information respecting the rout of the Pretender has been verified by the conversation our confidential agent had with some of the principal prisoners; these last have added, that Captain Vaune,<sup>1</sup> who had formerly served in the expedition against Louisbourg, was in the affair against the Pretender's son, in which this captain had been killed.

Same day, 29th Pursuant to the last orders received from England by the Governor of Boston, he was preparing to make new levies of militia, not stating for what design.

The rumor of the 28th and the news of the 29th have been sent to the commander of the fleet, and to Father Germain, by a courier who set out for the River St. John, and to Sieurs Perthuis and Bazin by a bark canoe which started to-day.

30th The Abenakis Indians, including those of Acadia and those who are domiciliated, numbering about 300, having been equipped and having repaired to St. Michel, near Quebec, took their departure to-day in bark canoes under the command of Lieutenant St. Pierre. They go by way of the St. John's river to Beaubassin to wait there for the detachment of Frenchmen. We have given this officer a letter of credit promising to repay at Quebec, or in Acadia, the expenses to be incurred by the Canadian and Indian detachments which will reside in Acadia.

June 3<sup>d</sup> Sieur Cheron, commanding La Société, which sailed from Rochefort on the 6th of March, arrived to-day; she is loaded with some cordage and implements for the frigate of 22 guns, and some goods for the stores.

Sieur Cheron has handed us a third copy of the Minister's letter of the 24th of January; he informs us that the ship La Déesse, commanded by Sieur Hiriard, was to sail two days after him, freighted with powder and other ammunition and merchandise.

Some Abenakis of St. Francis have brought in a prisoner named Thomas Joseph,<sup>1</sup> whom they took in the beginning of May, 20 miles from Boston.

This prisoner has reported that 500 men have been sent to Louisbourg from New England.

Heard that Prince Edward's brother has been taken on the 27th of February last and sent to London, and that his army had been routed.

4th The detachment of Canadians, numbering 680, including the officers and cadets, having been equipped, embarked in the following vessels:

Ship Letourneur, of St. Malo, Captain Duhamel.

Brigantine La Petite Marguerite, of Quebec, Sieur Cery.

<sup>1</sup> Lieutenant-Colonel WILLIAM VAUGHAN, son of Lieutenant-Governor George Vaughan, of New Hampshire, was born at Portsmouth, in that Province, 12th September, 1703. He was largely concerned in the fisheries, and had settled at Damariscotta, thirteen miles below Pemaquid. Here he had conceived the idea of the capture of Louisbourg and then repaired to Boston to suggest an expedition against that place. He was a man of good understanding, daring, enterprising and tenacious, and by his perseverance and enthusiasm succeeded in overcoming all objections to the expedition. Lieutenant-Colonel Vaughan conducted the first column through the woods within sight of Louisbourg and saluted the city with three cheers. At the head of a detachment, chiefly of New Hampshire troops, he marched, in the night, to the northeast part of the harbor, where they burned the warehouses and staved a large quantity of wine and brandy. The French were forced by the smoke to desert the grand battery, of which Vaughan next morning took possession and bravely defended, and the city soon after fell. In the subsequent distribution of ministerial rewards he was forgotten, and went to England to seek a reward for his services, and died in London in December, 1746, of small-pox. Hutchinson's History of Massachusetts, II., 364; Holmes' Annals, II., 164, 166; Belknap's History of New Hampshire, III., 154-174; Ward's Journal and Letters of Curwen, 452. — Ed.

They are waiting only for a fair wind to sail. We have had put on board 6 barrels of powder and other munitions of war, a proportionate quantity of goods both for the detachment and for the wants of the soldiers, iron stoves, and bar iron, to be given to the Acadians in payment of the advances they will make, as it was impossible to find any specie here. Shovels, pickaxes, spades, and other implements necessary for a siege, have likewise been put on board.

5th The vessels conveying our detachment have set sail with a light breeze for the S. W., except the ship Letourneur, which could not get her anchors clear (deraper). The other vessels are to wait at Camouraska.

6. The 22 gun frigate has been launched and brought safely into port.

Sieur Sallaberry, commanding the schooner Marie, has arrived at Quebec, he has declared to us that he sailed from Rochefort on the 16th of 9<sup>ber</sup> last, with 30<sup>ers</sup> of powder and about 600 muskets; that finding himself in the gulf on the 6th of January, he anchored at St. Peter's islands, the bad weather and other accidents obliged him to go back to Martinico, where he arrived on the 20th February, remained at the islands where he had his vessel recaulked; he could have sailed early, but for fear of the English privateers who were known to be in the passages.<sup>1</sup> He was obliged to wait for the convoy of a privateer that was armed; they sailed in company on the 20th of April. It was only under cover of a battle which the Frenchman gave an English privateer, that Sieur Sallaberry escaped; met nothing since. This captain has delivered us the Minister's letter of the first of November last.

By this opportunity we receive letters from Martinico, and among others, the General receives one from M<sup>r</sup> de Caylus of the 12th of April, stating that a cartel he had sent to Antigua, has reported to him that Admiral Thowsend<sup>2</sup> has returned there with 7 of his ships and a snow, in very bad condition; that this Admiral had left there in the beginning of January with nine sail for Boston to join M<sup>r</sup> Warren,<sup>3</sup> and to attack us with their combined forces; that a squall had deranged this plan and forced this Admiral to return to Antigua, where he is busy refitting, and whence, it is expected, he will sail only to Europe; that the two ships which he misses, were separated in the abovementioned gale, and no news has been received from them since, and that it is even to be feared that they have been either captured or wrecked.

<sup>3</sup> Sir PETER WARREN, K. B., was born about the year 1700; was commissioned a Captain in the navy 1727; commanded the Leopard, 50, in 1734, and the Squirrel, 50, in the expedition against Carthagea in 1741. In 1744 Commodore Warren commanded the fleet at the Leeward Islands, and in the following year at the siege of Louisbourg. As a reward for his services on the latter occasion, he was promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral of the Blue, 10 August, 1745. He applied for the government of New Jersey on the death of Governor Morris, but without success. In 1747 he was made Rear-Admiral of the White, and greatly distinguished himself in the sea fight off Cape Finisterre, whilst commanding the Devonshire, 66, and the same year was created a Knight of the Bath. In May, 1748, he was made Vice-Admiral of the Red. Admiral Warren was married to Susan, eldest daughter of Stephen De Lancey and Ann van Cortland, of New-York, and died in 1758. Beaton; Holgate; Bedford Correspondence, L, 28, 123, 217. — Ed.

return to Quebec, and, on his representation, not only that this vessel was too small to accommodate the Canadians that were put on board of her, but that she, moreover, made considerable water, it was immediately determined to unload La Société, just arrived, to replace L'Ormond Succèz. This change is going on with much diligence.

It was found necessary to land the 160 Canadians on board Letourneur; they were all seasick; they will reëmbark on the first favorable wind.

8th Sieur Douville, of the Island of St. John, who left that place on the 30th ultimo, arrived here at Quebec to-day with his family in his battoe; he has abandoned his settlement on receiving advice that the English were shortly to visit that island.

This individual has been on the scout in the month of May, to try and learn some news. Being at the gut of Canso, he met on the 16th a craft (charrois), conducted by two men, named Briant and Potier, settlers belonging to the Island of St. John, on their way from Ile Royale, who assured him that 7 ships with 1500 regulars had arrived at Louisbourg from England at the end of April.

That the garrison of that place, reduced to 5 or 600 men, including sick and well, on seeing this fleet and taking them for Frenchmen, thought only of surrendering; that the English had strengthened the exterior of the royal battery.

That of the 7 ships from London, two were to cruise along the coast.

That if Louisbourg had been attacked during the winter by 300 Indians, it might have been taken.

That 5 armed vessels were at Ile Royale awaiting the breaking up of the ice, to go and seize the settlers on the Island of St. John, put on board all the cattle possible, kill the remainder and burn the settlements.

That the English had several French pilots, to wit: Jasmin, an Acadian; Brisson, of Nantes, who resides with his family at Louisbourg, and some others.

Sieur Roma, former director of the Island of St. John Company, came in the same battoe with his family.

June 9th The 160 Canadians have been reëmbarked on board Le tourneur; the boat La Société is ready to sail.

10th These two vessels set sail with a light breeze from the S. W. to join the 5 first, and then to pursue their destined voyage.

The orders of M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, commanding the detachment from Canada, are to touch at Cape Desrosiers, where Sieur Perthuis will inform him of what has occurred at that post since he has been there; thence he will repair to Bay Verte, keeping east of the Island of St. John, as the pilots on board these vessels cannot undertake to conduct them between the Island of St. John and the main. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay has been recommended to use every precaution possible during the voyage to insure his safe arrival at the Bay Verte.

On arriving at said place he is to communicate the fact to Father Germain, at Beaubassin, and in case he should not find any order there from the commandant of the fleet, he is to execute the King's orders, divide his detachment into two, march the one to Canso, and the other to Port Royal, where he will receive the orders of this commandant.

We hand M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay a similar letter of credit to that we have given M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre.

10th We are in receipt, by a courier sent from Father Germain, of letters from that missionary, dated the 25th and 27th of May. He informs us of the return of a vessel which sailed this spring from Port Royal for Boston; that no news gets abroad; that he has learned only that it was said at Port Royal that the expedition against Canada had fallen through; that M<sup>r</sup> Miniac, missionary priest of the Acadians, wrote him to the same effect.

11th We have written to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, who was still within 6 or 7 leagues of Quebec, and answered Father Germain by that opportunity.

The General's presence being necessary at Montreal, on account of the different nations which have come down there, he set out to-day for that place.

12th A party of Abenakis of Panasamské just brings in an English soldier, whom they took prisoner on the 25th ult<sup>o</sup> at Fort Lucia, at the mouth of the River St. George; this prisoner has reported that Thomas Sanders, captain of a vessel, had taken on board 40 Flemish and Dutch families, about a month ago, at Grand Bay,<sup>1</sup> to convey them to Louisbourg; that other families of Casco bay, Pemquet and other parts of the east coast, to the number of 170 persons, have been also conveyed to Ile Royale.

That an English fleet was expected in the month of April; does not know whether it has arrived; that he heard it said that Prince Edward's army had been defeated, and his brother taken in a ship; he was recognized by the double thumbs he had on each hand.

Spoke of the vessels that had wintered at New-York, with some soldiers, without knowing the number.

That the garrison of Port Royal has been relieved by soldiers from Old England, and that place is in the best state of defence.

15th We are dispatching a courier to Beaubassin. We send to Father Germain the deposition of the last prisoners. This missionary is to communicate them to the Commandant of the fleet.

17th A party of Abenakis, of Panasamské arrived, bringing an English prisoner, named Timothy Comains,<sup>2</sup> aged 60 years, whom they took on the 2nd instant, near Fort St. George.

This prisoner has reported the same news of the 3000 men from Old England, who have gone to Louisbourg.

That they are busy, day and night, at Boston, in preparations for defence against a French fleet, which is expected there.

That the people of Boston have carried 20 guns to the island called Little Bluster, within 3 leagues of the town.

That about 100 English, Irish and Dutch families have been sent to Louisbourg from the east of Boston.

A private person—our confidential agent—has had a long conversation with some of the prisoners, who are in the barracks, who told him that they learned, by the prisoner arrived on the 12th of this month, that a great quantity of ammunition and provisions had been collected at Boston, and that a considerable English fleet was to arrive shortly on those coasts.

16th This same individual has learned, by a trusty prisoner, arrived yesterday, that men were being raised from the east to the south of New England, Georgia, Pensilvania, Maryland; that volunteers are clubbing together, independent of those who are levied proportionably in the country to come against Quebec; they are expecting ships from England every day.

All the prisoners whom we have in the barracks, to the number of fifty, say, openly, that they will be soon set at liberty, by the siege and capture of Quebec, whither the English will not delay coming. Means of writing have been furnished such of them as have been removed to the Hotel Dieu ; all these letters have been examined before they were transmitted, referred, invariably, to their approaching deliverance.

29th Arrived Sieur Delano, an officer belonging to the ship La Désse, who landed at Ile à Rassade on the 25th. This vessel is commanded by Sieur Hiriard, and sailed from Ile d'Aix on the 24th of March ; was forced to put into Ferol on the 6th of April for repairs ; left Ferol on the 27th of the same month ; is freighted with 30 <sup>m</sup> of powder, 3 @ 400 muskets and other ammunition and effects.

By this occasion we receive the general and private letters of the Court of last year, and a fourth copy of the despatch of the 24th January. Sieur Hiriard informs us that he had learned, at Ferol, that the fleet had not yet sailed from Brest on the 10th of April.

Arrived an express, dispatched in canoe by Sieur Perthuis from Cape Desrosiers on the 16th instant.

An express was immediately dispatched to the General to inform him of the arrival of La Désse.

We receive letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, informing us that he had arrived at Gaspé on the evening of the 15th with the vessels belonging to his little Armada ; also letters from said Sieur Perthuis, who acts as a vedette at Cape Desrosiers.

The latter writes us that Michel Miguét, dit Deloyal, who escaped with his family on the 12th from the Island of St. John, arrived at Cape Desrosiers on the morning of the 16th, who reported to him that three English ships anchored on the 2nd of the same month in Port Lajoie ; one of them was rated at 66 guns, though she actually carried only 44, one a brigantine of 20, and one a brig of 10 guns.

That the opinion prevailed at L'Ile Royale that some Canadians on the Island of St. John were building a fort, in conjunction with the settlers on that island.

That the Commander of these ships having ascertained the falsehood of this intelligence sent back the brig to Louisbourg, with information.

That this Commander had declared that he would not do any injury to the settlers, which did not prevent them retiring into the woods until the arrival of some assistance they expected to receive from Quebec.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay having arrived off Gaspé on the night of the 15th, Sieur Perthuis went to see him on the next day, the 16th, and gave him an account of the report made to him by the said Deloyal on the same day ; whereupon that officer held a council with the officers of his detachment, to which he invited the captains of the seven vessels. After having considered that these vessels were exposed to great dangers by proceeding around the east point of the Island of St. John, and that none of the pilots could take upon himself to carry Le Tourneur, between the Island of St. John and the main, it was concluded that the little fleet should remain in Gaspé bay until news be received from Father Germain, who is at Beaubassin. In consequence of this deliberation M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay immediately dispatched a biscayenne to Bay Verte, under the command of Ensign Belestre. He requested Father Germain to let him know what is passing at the Island St. John, and in case there was any truth in the report of Sieur Deloyal, to send him some pilots to take him between the Island of St. John and the main, so as not to be perceived by the English ships, said to be at Port Lajoie. He expects the return of this boat in 10 @ 12 days.

30th M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart has dispatched a courier to Montreal, and communicated this news to the General.

July 3<sup>d</sup> Captain Baudoin, of the schooner Charlotte, arrived to-day from Martinico. He left there on the 10th May; met nothing on his voyage.

Lieutenant de Raymond is just arrived from Montreal with 7 @ 8 prisoners that were brought some time ago to that town by different parties of Indians. These prisoners having been interrogated said, news had been received that a French fleet was coming to attack Boston, as was reported, and that they were erecting fortifications in that town.

That 2000 men were being levied at Boston in the forepart of May for Louisbourg.

That he had heard at Boston, at the same time, that the Pretender had been routed and had retired into the mountains, and that his brother had been taken; but it is, possibly, a story.

4th The ship La Déesse anchored in the roadstead.

5th On the 29th June, on receipt of the news from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart took advantage of the departure of the sloop La Madelaine, Captain Chevery, to send to Gaspé, where we calculated our little fleet still lay, some ammunition, cordage and other effects, for the fitting out of the biscayennes, which will be found there or in the neighborhood, in case the detachment should, on account of the dangers they might run with the ships, be obliged to go to Bay Verte in those craft.

We write to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay by this opportunity.

Sieur Dubois, who is to command the 22 gun frigate named La Martre, arrived at ten o'clock this evening. He landed at Bic on the 4th from the ship L'Auguste, of St. Malo, commanded by Captain Vincent Desmarais; this vessel sailed from Brest on the 7th of May, and brought out the crew of that frigate, 30<sup>m</sup> of powder, 3 @ 400 muskets and other munitions. Sieur Dubois has informed us that the fleet which had arrived at Brest, was to sail on the 8th of May for Port Louis.

We receive a part of the joint and special letters of the Court of this year.

6th A courier is sent to Montreal to inform the General of the arrival of L'Auguste.

7th Agreeably to the King's orders, contained in a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Maurepas, the work at the walls (enceinte) of Quebec has been suspended until the decision of the General Assembly that is to be held.

Father Germain confirms the news of the three English vessels at Port Lajoie<sup>2</sup> and the Island of St. John.

The ship L'Auguste, anchored in the harbor, as well as the brigantine, La Brunette, of Bourdeaux, Captain Clement, freighted with wine and brandy.

10th Mr. Hocquart dispatches to-day Le St. Jacques, Captain de Vitré, to carry to our detachment at Gaspé, if still there, similar munitions and effects to those put on board the boat La Madelaine, which sailed on the 5th instant; should M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay have left Gaspé, M<sup>r</sup> de Vitré has orders to proceed as far as Bay Verte with the effects he carries.

15th The General has returned from Montreal; some days before he left he gave orders to fit out the detachment commanded by Lieutenant de Mui, consisting of 50 Frenchmen and about 300 Indians, Poutegatamies, Puants, Illinois, Outagas, Sauteux, Folles Avoines, who had come down a few days before, and the domiciliated Algonkins, Iroquois and Abenakis, to proceed towards New England to strike a blow according to circumstances, taking care to send spies out frequently to be informed in season of the expeditions the enemy may attempt against us.

17th By a courier that left Gaspé on the 1st instant, we receive letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, who states that M. Belestre, whom he sent on the 16th of June to Beaubassin, had returned on the 30th of that month; that Father Germain had sent him pilots to guide his vessels between the Island of St. John and the main; that he was preparing to leave forthwith for his place of destination. By this occasion we learn the arrival at Beaubassin of M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre, on the 21st of June, with the Abenakis Indians whom he took thither, and of the arrival, on the 17th of June, of Sieur Marin, with the Micmacs at Bay Verte.

18th Lieutenant Falaise brings into Montreal an Englishman named John Bimant, taken on the 1st instant at Nortfields, 14 miles above Dierfils,<sup>1</sup> by a party of Indians belonging to the Sault. This prisoner has stated that it was reported at that place that the English were to come this year to attack Canada, presently by the river, by way of Fort St. Frederic, and on foot and in canoe by the River Connecticut; that no canoes were making in his quarter.

That 30 pieces of their money were given each man destined for the companies, which, they say, are to come to Canada in a month.

20th The ship St. Croix of Cherbourg, Captain Alzouet, has arrived freighted with wine and brandy.

21st An English prisoner, who is a trusty friend of ours, has informed our confidential agent that the man named John Bimant, who arrived on the 18th, had told his comrades that active preparations were making to come and attack this country; that 15 men of war and a number of privateers were all ready; that all the force possible was being collected; that they had orders from the King of England to spare no expense in this matter; that great encouragement is held out to the farmers by giving them 30<sup>li</sup>, a blanket and a gun in addition to their pay, and that the orders to the Governor of Boston are, to force the other governments as far as Virginia.

On this news we have written to Sieur de Mui, who is on the road to repair to Fort St. Frederic, not to scatter the tribes under command, so that they may be easily collected together at the first warning, and to postpone his march until that time.

22<sup>d</sup> Ensign de Carqueville, who had been sent from Fort Frederic, arrived this morning post-haste. He reached Fort St. Frederic on the 16th of said month with a party of Indians, and brought in a Dutchman whom he took on Lake St. Sacrement, who having been interrogated by the commandant of Fort St. Frederic, stated that he had left Orange 10 days

That six schooners loaded with bombs and other munitions of war destined for the siege, had arrived at Orange.

That proclamations were affixed throughout all the New England towns, to persevere in the subjugation of Canada, and that if it be not conquered in one year, several must be spent in the work until the object of that enterprise be attained.

That the battoes which are to bring a part of the army have been built at Orange and Menade, that some are to come by Lake St. Sacrament, and the remainder by the River du Chicot.<sup>2</sup>

That they are to be accompanied by the Five Nations.

That he had heard that there were at Boston, 32 men of war and a quantity of transports destined for the attack on Quebec, and that some of them had already sailed to cruise in the river. This Dutchman had been taken from the Mohegans (Loups) who were out scouting in Lake St. Sacrament. They offered no objection to letting this prisoner go.

M<sup>r</sup> de Croisille, the commandant of Fort St. Frederic, writes us on the 17th that some Indians of M<sup>r</sup> de Carqueville's party having been scouting near Orange, before capturing their prisoner, had reported having seen in a large pasture before that town, 3 British flags with a number of people and battoes.

We send by an express to Father Germain the reports of the 18th, 21st and 22nd instant, in order that he may communicate them to the commander of the fleet and to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay.

In our present uncertainty as to the designs of the enemy, we have judged it necessary to adopt measures to strengthen Fort St. Frederic; though we should not suppose the English would march to the number of 13,000 men, the armament being too considerable, we have believed it best to anticipate them should they make any attempt on that fort. The Marquis de Beauharnois, consequently, issued orders at Montreal to fit out with all diligence a detachment of 400 men under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud, major of 3 rivers, to join M<sup>r</sup> de Muy, at present at Fort St. Frederic, and together to oppose whatever the enemy may undertake against that post.

The general issues orders at the same time in the government of Montreal for the levy of 15 @ 1600 men, to be ready to march to the aid of Fort St. Frederic at the earliest reliable notice we shall receive of the attack of that fort.

12 fire rafts more have been ordered at L'Anse des Mers, near Quebec.

Those of S<sup>t</sup> Joachim, Bay St. Paul, Ile aux Coudres, and vicinity are ready to go on board to work them, if necessary; we write to Sieur Cartier calling his attention in this regard.

25th Information furnished us by an Irish prisoner.

The prisoner arrived on the 18th instant has assured him that the English were on their way to Quebec.

That 15 men of war intended for this country had arrived at Louisbourg, and that all the American governors were told that they must coöperate with the Governor of Boston in this expedition. The prisoner with many of those who are enlisted, have received 30<sup>li</sup> in current money of the Province, a gun and blanket.

We learn by letters we receive, that our little fleet which sailed from Gaspé on the 2nd instant, had arrived in safety at Bay Verte. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay writes us on the 17th that he had just received a letter from M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre, missionary at Acadia, who proposes to him on the part of M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan, who commands the two frigates at Chibouctou, to lay siege to Port Royal, in case the fleet do not arrive in the course of this month. But M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay having orders to divide his detachment into two, on his arrival at Beaubassin, he called his officers together to confer with them as to which course would be best, to accept M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan's proposal made by M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre, or to march half the detachment towards Canso. The officers thus assembled having been informed by Father Germain and by scouts who were returning from the neighborhood of Canso, that it was impossible to repair to that post with provisions and ammunition necessary for the detachment destined thither; that the route was absolutely impracticable; that it was not possible to construct any sort of canoes at Beaubassin to convey the detachment by water; that, besides, information had been received that there was nobody at Canso and that the English had taken away the garrison for the purpose of transferring it to Louisbourg. On consultation, it has been decided that the entire detachment, including French and Indians, should march to Port Royal pursuant to M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre's proposal to M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay writes that he is consequently at work, and is sending the provisions and munitions to Beaubassin, in order to transfer them thence to Minas. This officer demands a mortar and some shells for the siege of Port Royal.

He adds, that he has sent a scout to Port Lajoie,<sup>1</sup> to observe the movements of the English there, and is awaiting his return. In M<sup>r</sup> de Cery's vessel are 3 Frenchmen and one Englishman whom M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay stopped off Gaspé in a craft (charrois) which left Louisbourg on the 17th of June.

31. The brigantine La Petite Marguerite, from Bay Verte, has anchored in the harbor. The 3 Frenchmen and the Englishman, arrested by M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, have been brought before us. They state that on the 17th of June, the date of their departure, there were at Louisbourg more than 40 men of war, transports and merchantmen. Among these were the following men of war, according to their declaration :

The Vigilant ,	64 guns.	The Norwich ,	50 guns.
Kingston ,	60	Fowey ,	40
Canterbury ,	60	Dover ,	40
Chester ,	50	Lynn ,	40
The Kinsale , 40.

That the number of men at Louisbourg, afloat and ashore, was estimated at 7 thousand; that Admirals Knowles, Townsend and Waren are there; that the first named is in command; that it was openly said at Ile Royale that a French fleet was coming there; that the place is well supplied, and that 24 men of war and 14 transports, with military, were still expected there.

August 1. Lieutenant Chatelain, of 3 Rivers, arrives with the Englishman named John Richard who was taken prisoner by a party of Abenakis of St. Francis 23 days ago, near Rochester.<sup>1</sup>

This prisoner reports that Proclamations had been issued throughout the entire country for the levy of 1000 or 2000 men, more or less, in each Province; he says, that will amount to 40 @ 50,000 men for the attack on Canada.

That the King of England had sent word that he would furnish ships, and that they had only to raise the men.

That several vessels had already arrived at Cape Breton.

That there are a number of transports in their harbors.

That they are collecting provisions; giving a hundred pieces to the settlers who will fit themselves out completely, and 30 to those whom they have to furnish. That they do not press any person to go to the war; that goods are very dear with them, powder being worth 3<sup>u</sup> the pound there.

On the interpreter observing to him that the season was much advanced to send an expedition against this Colony, he answered, that the English were making preparations; that they were not yet altogether ready, and that Admiral Waren was to command this expedition. He adds, that they have 1500 Moak Indians in their party.

The intelligence we have received on the 22nd, 25th and 31st ultimo, and the report of the prisoner just arrived, appears to us serious; we learn, besides, from Indians arrived at Fort Frontenac, who have returned from the southern part of the Continent, that the Governors of Carolina and Pensilvania have set out with a large force for Boston to embark there for Ile Royale. We have supposed that so many men are not necessary to secure Louisbourg, the rather as 7 @ 8 thousand had already arrived there in the beginning of June. Despite the diversity of these views, it appears to us certain that the enemy is making extensive preparations, and we have come to the conclusion that it would be prudent, so as not to incur any risk, to recall a part of the M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment with our domiciliated Indians. We, consequently, dispatch an express to Beaubassin, and communicate to Father Germain, missionary there, our actual situation. We request him to transmit these news without delay to the commander of the fleet, in order that he may adopt, without loss of time, the best measures for the security of this Colony, which is greatly menaced; also, to recall part of our Canadians and our domiciliated Indians, who are at present in Acadia. We add, that M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay might leave, at most, in Acadia, 2 or 300 Frenchmen and the Micmac Indians, for the protection of the Acadians, and return here, either by sea or by the River St John, with the remainder of our Frenchmen and all our domiciliated Indians, including those of the River St. John and Pannasamski. We send to the commandant of the fleet and to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, copy of a letter to Father Germain and request him to act accordingly.

Before sealing our despatches for Beaubassin our express arrives from Montreal, bringing us the declaration of 3 prisoners brought in and interrogated in said town on the 30th ultimo.

<sup>1</sup> On the 27th June, old style, in the year 1746, four men were killed by the savages in this town, on the main road to Dover, about a mile below Norway-plain brook. . . . On the same day, another person, by the name of Jonathan Richards, was wounded, taken prisoner and carried to Canada, but soon returned, and died in Rochester in 1793. Haen's Notices of the Town of Rochester, in Farmer and Moore's New Hampshire Collections, II, 170. Belknap gives the name John Richards. History of New Hampshire, III, 191. — Ed.

NOTE.—This is the same prisoner who made the deposition at Fort St. Frederic on the 17th of July; he does not contradict himself.

One of these prisoners, named Robert d'Sinbart,<sup>1</sup> who was taken 18 days ago in the neighborhood of Sarasteau, has reported that 900 men were already arrived at Orange, and that the remainder of the army designed to attack Fort St. Frederic was expected there, and that this army was to march on the 1st or 2nd of this month, to the number of 13 thousand men.

That 500 grenadiers had arrived from Old England, on their way to Ile Royale; that 250 had wintered at York, and the remainder at Philadelphia.

Assures that when he was taken there were at Boston 32 ships of the line ready to sail with the other transports for Canada.

That canoes are making at Menade and Orange, and that people are busy on them at present; that the army is to come by the River du Chicot and Lake St. Sacramento.

We annex this report to our despatches.

NOTE.—These Indians are of the 5 Iroquois Nations.

The last intelligence we receive to-day from Montreal, dated 31st ultimo, confirms the preceding. A Mohawk and an Onondaga, who were out scouting, have been taken by our people, 15 leagues from Fort St. Frederic; they have reported that 300 officers had already arrived at Sarasteau; that all their troops were on the march; that they are coming by different routes, namely, by Choueguen, by Lake St. Sacramento, and by the River Chicot, to attack us from all points above; that they are bringing with them six 18 pounders; that 60 vessels had sailed 23 days ago for Ile Royale, to come afterwards to Quebec.

M<sup>r</sup> de Croisille writes us from Fort St. Frederic on the 14th of July, that some Mohegans (Loups) had killed and scalped a French soldier, who had gone out unarmed some distance from the fort, where these Indians lay, in ambush.

All the English on this continent must be under arms, if all these rumors be true.

Under these circumstances we dispatch a second express to Acadia, in case the first should happen to fail, informing M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay of this last news. We repeat to him our orders contained in our despatches of yesterday, directing him to return to Quebec, in all haste, with his detachment and all our domiciliated Indians, including those of the River St. John and Panagamské, and to leave only 200 @ 300 Frenchmen with the Micmacs of Acadia, to quieten the Acadians; he will receive, nevertheless, on the whole, the orders of the Commander of the fleet.

We write to this Commander in the same sense; we request him to come with all dispatch to the relief of this colony, which is menaced by a general attack; we add, that he can send back the 2 or 300 Frenchmen, who are to remain at Acadia, if he think they be not absolutely required there.

We communicate the whole to Father Germain, to whom we send our despatches, in order that he may transmit them by safe hands to their address.

We consequently adopt, at Quebec, every precaution to put ourselves in a state of defence.

NOTE.—This order has been executed, and ammunition is consequently being distributed in the Captains of the settlements.

We issue orders to all the Captains of the settlements (côtes) within this government to send expresses to receive the powder and ball, which we shall have delivered to them to be stored, and to be by them distributed to the farmers in their respective commands, on the first notice we shall give them of the enemy's approach, so that they may then repair to Quebec in a state to defend themselves.

4th In a council held at the General's, which was attended by all the principal officers of the <sup>This has been done.</sup> garrison, and the captains of the merchantmen in port, we have resolved that 12 small vessels be prepared as fire ships, in case the enemy's fleet appear in this river.

It was also resolved to prepare some houses in the interior of the country around Quebec for the storage of provisions and ammunition for the wants of the different detachments that will possibly be sent without the town.

We write to Sieur Cartier, commanding the fire rafts at Ile aux Coudres to redouble his attention in observing the vessels that will happen to come up the river, and to keep his rafts and those of the neighborhood ready to be manned, in order to be worked, if necessary.

The same notice to M<sup>r</sup> de Rouville, who is on the watch at Rimouski.

New battoes are ordered built to supply the wants of the service.

Provisions are being prepared for every emergency. There is not a particle of salt pork, and M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart is obliged to have beef cured for the subsistence of the militia, should they come to Quebec.

The General issues orders to the government of Montreal to hold 1500 men ready to come down to Quebec at the first notice we shall receive of the enemy's approach.

We adopt, moreover, the best measures of defence against the enemy's attacks, should they dare to make any attempt.

M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud's detachment is fitting out with all expedition at Montreal; the 10th of this month is indicated to us as the latest.

6th Sieur Sallabery is sent in a biscayenne<sup>1</sup> to cruise and make observations from Cape Chat across to Trinity, with orders, should he perceive any vessels which he may have reason to suspect belong to the enemy, to come and report the matter to us.

9th We dispatch to-day the brigantine La Petite Marguerite, commanded by Sieur Cery, to Bay Verte, to convey to our detachment there some provisions, consisting of 250 quintals of biscuit, 100 barrels of flour, 30 barrels of pork, 200 quintals of vegetables and other refreshments; we send also by this opportunity one thousand pounds of powder, 2000<sup>l</sup> of ball, 200 Liege muskets and other small stores.

We write by this opportunity to the Commander of the fleet, and inform him, in our letter of the 6th, that possibly he might be better informed than we of the enemy's movements and strength, and that it is for him to dispose of our forces at Acadia; either to send them back, or to retain them in whole or in part; we add to him, that if we be attacked we have reason to apprehend that our people will return too late, or that we will derange plans, should he prevent our being attacked.

We write, in consequence, to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, so that he may follow, in all things, the orders of the Commandant of the fleet, and add, that not only do we not think that he will be in a condition, with the 2 royal frigates, to undertake the siege of Port Royal, but that, besides, we cannot, under existing circumstances, spare the mortar he asks for this expedition.

The preparations which have been commenced, and are already spoken of, are continued.

11th An express from Beaubassin has arrived via the River St. John. We receive letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay and Father Germain of the 22nd of July. The former informs us that he continues to forward to Beaubassin the provisions and ammunition of his detachment; that he is in receipt of a letter from M<sup>r</sup> du Vignan of the 17th wherein this officer makes no mention of the siege of Port Royal; M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay hence infers that M<sup>r</sup> Le Loutre went too far, when he made such a proposition to him, on the part of M<sup>r</sup> du Vignan. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay is waiting for the latter's answer to the account he had given him of the state of his detachment, and of the measures he was taking in consequence of this pretended proposition.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay adds, that the Acadians are very uneasy on account of the delay of the fleet, and that if Port Royal be not taken they will be obliged, in the most part, to abandon the country, having been already menaced.

M<sup>r</sup> du Vignan proposes to send to this officer 100 prisoners belonging to the prizes taken by L'Aurore and Le Castor.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay having also adopted the resolution of dispatching his detachment to Minas, has been able to send only a detachment of Micmacs to Port Royal,<sup>1</sup> under the command of Ensign de Montesson, who set out in boats from Bay Verte, on the 21st of July, to endeavor to surprise the English ships from the shore.

12th By another express sent from Beaubassin we are in receipt of despatches from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay and Father Germain of the 25th July. The first informs us that he learns from Port Royal that M<sup>r</sup> Mascaren had demanded from Boston 4 vessels, with men, to oblige the Acadians to take up arms for the English, and that they would burn all the settlements. All the people are trembling with fear of the failure of our projects; they say that in such case they are all lost.

We are informed of the success of the Micmacs, who have been at Port Lajoie to the number of 200 under M<sup>r</sup> Croisille de Montesson's command. These Indians attacked about 40 @ 50 men, 30 of whom were soldiers, who were on shore; they killed or made prisoners of all of them, except a few who escaped by swimming. Only 3 prisoners had as yet arrived, and the man named Brisson, a Frenchman, who is said to be the pilot of one of the vessels. There were in Port Lajoie, one 24 gun frigate and a transport of 700 tons, in which may be still 200 men. These vessels could be mastered had the officer been able to control the Indians who would not remain, though they had been told that all the officers and soldiers belonging to the frigate were about to come ashore, to place a guard there. The Indians have killed a quantity of oxen and other cattle that the English had in a park on shore for provisions.

Pierre Brisson and the 3 prisoners having been interrogated by M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, have reported that 8 50 @ 60 gun ships had arrived in the month of May at Louisbourg from Gibraltar with 1800 regulars.

That previous to the arrival of these ships, there had been at Louisbourg 3 regiments of militia, consisting of 30 companies of 70 men each, from Boston, and that 7 companies more were expected there to complete another regiment, three companies of which had arrived.

That the English vessels at Port Lajoie designed only to take all the cattle belonging to the settlers on the Island of St. John, on paying for them, for which purpose the captain had brought money.

That they were expecting at Louisbourg 14 ships and 3 bomb ketches for Quebec, and that Admiral Warren had gone to New-York to collect the militia of that quarter for the same place.

That the Frenchman, named Baptiste Dion, had told him that he was to have 2000<sup>li</sup> for piloting the English fleet to Quebec, and that the man named Jasmin, also a Frenchman, had 1000<sup>li</sup> for the same business.

That these vessels expected to return to Louisbourg on the 24th July, with the cattle which had been collected together.

That Louisbourg was well provided with munitions of war and provisions, as the approach of a French fleet was somewhat suspected.

The 3 prisoners said that said Brisson had piloted the frigate of his own free will, and that it was he who conducted the captain to the settlers' houses on the island.

19th An express dispatched by Sieur Perthuis, who is on the watch at Cape Desrosiers, brings letters dated the 6th of August, to the effect that he had seen 4 vessels that day about 6 leagues off Cape Desrosiers, but that the wind having died away, and the tide running out, he had lost sight of them.

21. We receive letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay from Beaubassin, dated 29th and 30th of July. He writes us that he had just received a letter from M<sup>r</sup> du Vignan, dated Chibouctou 26th of that month, informing him that his object in speaking to M<sup>r</sup> Le Loutre about Port Royal, was merely to learn the state of that fort; what force had come from Canada, and how many would be required to make us masters of the place, so as to render an account thereof to the commander of the fleet; that he had never thought of undertaking such an expedition; that, besides, such were not his orders, he is not in a condition to attempt it. He adds that Le Castor sails on the 27th by his mission, and as regards himself, he will await the fleet as long as provisions will permit him; he had then a supply only for 50 days; he observes to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, that he concludes on sending to Minas the prisoners taken on board the prizes captured by Le Castor and himself, with a view to their removal to Quebec.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay adds, that all his detachment has gone to Minas; that he will transmit to Quebec the prisoners M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan sends him; he represents that the settlers of Acadia would be much to be pitied were the expedition abandoned in case of the non-arrival of the fleet; asks for orders so that he may take precautions, if he or a part of his detachment be to winter.

Sieur de Vitre, commanding the battoe St. Jacques which sailed on the 10th of July with ammunition to our little fleet, arrived to-day; he reached Bay Verte on the 24th of said month of July, and left on the 29th. By this opportunity we receive letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay and Father Germain, of the 25th, informing us that the first named had sent that day 3 officers to Chibouctou, to confer with M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan on the expedition against Port Royal, in case of the non-arrival of the fleet.

On the 21st of this month we received additional later intelligence.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay had put on board this vessel 7 English prisoners, taken in the attack at Fort Lajoie,<sup>1</sup> along with Pierre Brisson, the Frenchman taken on that occasion. These prisoners have been interrogated anew on their arrival. They added, that the settlers of the Island of St. John had agreed with the English for the sale of their cattle; that the former have sent this spring to Louisbourg two deputies, of whom Pierre Brisson was one, to demand the protection of the English against some privateers that had been laying waste their plantations.

That a sort of agreement had been entered into, stipulating that no injury was to be done these settlers, who would furnish cattle for cash, and that it was in consequence of that agreement that the two vessels in question had come to Port Lajoie.

Some said that the army of the Pretender had been sent to the route by the Duke of Cumberland, others knew nothing of the matter.

After that attack several settlers of the Island of St. John came to demand provisions from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, who gave them what he could.

Douville, who is with Sieur Vitré as mate, told us he has been at the Island of St. John since the descent at Port Lajoie; that the 2 vessels had sailed on the next day; that the captain of the English frigate had, indeed, paid some of the settlers the price of the cattle they had furnished in consequence of the agreement; that on the day following, the other settlers who had furnished supplies in like manner, were to go on board his ship to settle and be paid; that the English had on board with them six settlers of the island as hostages.

We are in receipt of letters from Montreal whereby we learn that some scouts arrived from Sarasteau, where they have been several days, have reported, that no person went outside that fort unless in parties of thirty; that they have no more Indian scouts with them; that they saw no more trails; and they added, that there were at that fort, no canoes nor appearance of preparations; no bridges nor roads.

Also, that all our Indians from Michilimakinac and that neighborhood who were with M. de Muy, had returned to Montreal with a party of our domiciliated tribes; the one and the other had made attacks in different places, and brought in some scalps; they asked to return home immediately. They promise to come down next spring in a larger number; some of these parties struck a blow near Orange, where they saw nothing extraordinary.

M. de Rigaud, who repaired to Fort St. Frederic about the 15th of this month, having no intelligence that the enemy would make any movement, set out from said fort on the 20th with the remainder of M. de Muy's party, consisting of 500 Frenchmen and about 400 Indians, to seize the forts, 4 leagues from Sarasteau.

27th An express arrived from Sieur Perthuis, who is on the look out at Cape Desrozières; he writes us on the 11th of this month that he had seen on the 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th of said month, as many as 10 vessels, 4 of which have cruised as far as Gaspé Bay, where he saw them tack; that he concluded they were Englishmen, inasmuch as they had a favorable wind to enter the river, and as people who came on the 10th to his post, reported to him that these vessels had appeared some days ago to the number of 12, at Pabo.<sup>1</sup>

Sieur Perthuis informs us that he sent a bark canoe to Beaubassin with word to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay of what he had seen. He asks a biscayenne boat and crew, having only 2 men at his post.

We learn from our confidential agent who had, this morning, a long conversation with the prisoners taken at the Island of St. John, and brought hither yesterday by M. de Vitré, that the 2 vessels at Port Lajoie did not intend returning to Louisbourg, but were to sail in two days after the attack, for some other place known only to the Cammander, Captain Rouze.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Captain JOHN ROUSE. The earliest mention we find of this officer is in August, 1744, when he commanded an expedition sent to cut out a fleet of French vessels of force from the harbor of Fishotte, in Newfoundland, which duty he successfully performed, and laid waste all the French posts on that coast. Beaton says that expedition was under the command of a lieutenant of H. M. ship, the Kinsale. (Compare Beaton's Naval and Military Memoirs, I, 187, and Otis Little's State of Trade, 40, note.) The next service he was engaged in, was in the expedition against Cape Breton. As soon as the General Court at Boston had determined on the reduction of that place, a vessel was purchased and called the Massachusetts frigate, of which Colonel Edward Tyng was put in command and named Commodore of the fleet, and Captain Rouse was appointed second in command. He was a bilander or small brigantine, called the Shirley, hired at Boston and carrying 24 guns, in which General Pepperell sailed 24th March, 1745, convoyed by ten other stout privateers. On the night of the 18th of May, the Massachusetts frigate captured Le Vigilant, 64, the command of which Commodore Warren offered to Colonel Tyng with the rank of Captain, which he declined and recommended Rouse for the berth, who, after the reduction of Louisbourg, was dispatched by Governor Shirley, to England with the news, and as a reward for his gallant service received a commission of

We suppose that these vessels had orders to carry their cattle to the ships which are cruising off Cape Despair, or even to a fleet they were daily expecting to come and attack us.

All our prisoners appear so persuaded of the certainty of this design that they are extremely surprised since the arrival of the last (prisoners), that it does not progress. They are, therefore, apprehensive that the project has fallen through.

We write to Beaubassin and inform the commandant of the fleet and M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay of all that occurs on this Continent.

The General informs the latter that in case his letter of the 6th of August, and our despatch to the commander of the fleet, which were sent by M<sup>r</sup> de Cery, should have reached him, he will wait for orders from that officer and news from us, before sending back a portion of our militia and domiciliated Indians, as we had directed him to do by our letters of the 1st and 2nd of this month.

We write, in consequence, to the commander of the fleet; we tell him, in addition, that he will have been better informed than we of what is passing at sea, and will have been at liberty to carry out his plans, notwithstanding what we had communicated to him on the first and 2nd of this month.

M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart sends by this express 1000 dollars (piastres) to M<sup>r</sup> Guillimin, for the wants of the detachment.

September 2. Jacques Hamelin sent by Sieur Perthuis from Cape Desroziers, is arrived, with letters from the latter, dated the 15th of August, stating that he had not seen any more vessels about his post; that having sent this same Hamelin some leagues from Cape Desroziers to look for a boat, he reported having spoken to one George Leroux, alias Big George, a former acquaintance of his, who had been taken by one of the cruisers off Cape Desroziers; we have interrogated said Hamelin and he has related to us as follows.

That he learned from Big George that he had been taken by an English ship near Anticosti, 15 to 20 leagues from Cape Desroziers, about the 15th of July, coming, he the 4th, in a small craft with a cargo of salt from the 3 Islands<sup>1</sup> (Island of Newfoundland); that this ship carried him to Louisbourg, where, on arriving and about to cast anchor, she was sent back by the Governor of the place with two other sail, of which the Vigilant is one, and a small schooner, to capture 5 vessels, that, as he had been informed, were fishing at Gaspé.

That on their way to Ile Royale they captured, on the Orphan's bank, a fishing sloop commanded by a man named Raymond, a Basque, whom they retained, and, on the 11th of August, sent back, overland to Gaspé, the two other men belonging to that sloop and the 4 belonging to the craft (charrois).

Captain in the Royal Navy, 24th September, 1745. He returned to Louisbourg in command of the Shirley, and in 1746 was attached to Vice-Admiral Townsend's fleet, and in 1747 was doing duty near Annapolis and Minas. In 1755, he commanded the little squadron which convoyed the expedition against the French forts at the head of the Bay of Fundy, and afterwards sailed to the River St. John's, where he destroyed all the French forts and houses. In 1756, he was changed to the Success, 22; in 1757, commanded the frigate Winchelsea, 20, in the unsuccessful expedition against Louisbourg, and captured a French sloop of 16 guns, after a stout resistance. He commanded the ship Sutherland, 50, the next year at the siege of Louisbourg and in 1759 at the siege of Quebec, where he did good service. It was from this ship that General Wolfe issued his last order before ascending the heights of Abraham. After a career of activity and distinction, Captain Rouse died in 1760.

Said Leroux also told Hamelin that the English had reported, on leaving Gaspé, where they did not find anything, that they were going to Bay Verte, to capture the ships Letourneur and Le Castor; that they had 5 large men of war at Port Royal waiting for the French in case the latter would come to besiege that place; that they were daily expecting the arrival of a fleet to attack Quebec. The English told said Leroux that they would cruise in the gulf until the end of autumn, to prevent the passage of the vessels from Canada.

Sieur Perthuis adds, that he will stop Sieur de Cery when he passes Cape Desrosiers; prevent him proceeding, and will even send him back to Quebec, in consequence of the risks he would be running to get into Bay Verte.

We dispatch a biscayenne and a bark canoe to Sieur Perthuis; the master of the biscayenne has orders to observe the vessels that will happen to enter the river, and should he discover any of the enemy's ships, to come and report the fact to us.

We write to Sieur Perthuis that we do not expect him to stop M<sup>r</sup> de Cery, who, it is of consequence, should reach Bay Verte with the provisions destined for our detachment there, which needs succor, and that we think rather that he will have sent out scouts to discover what is going on.

3<sup>d</sup> An express arrives from Acadia.

The General receives a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan, commander of the frigate L'Aurore, dated, Chibouctou the 11th of August, informing him, among other things, that he sailed from Brest on the 9th of April, in company with the frigate Le Castor, which arrived at Chibouctou on the 12th of June; that he took 6 small craft, 3 of which were freighted with cattle, and the remainder with provisions, part of which he gave M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre, who asked some of them for his Indians; that Le Castor, which had orders to cruise, had entered Chibouctou on the 9th of July with two craft loaded with cattle and codfish; that this frigate sailed again on the 29th of said month on her return to her cruising ground, and thence to France, having only five months' provisions when she took her departure, and that she has supplies for 5 months and a half; that this frigate had returned on the first of August with an English Snow, commanded by a lieutenant of the navy, and carrying ten guns, 12 swivels and a crew of 75 men, which was going to Boston for the purpose of convoying thence to Louisbourg some vessels that were to carry provisions to that place; that he had learned from prisoners that there is in Ile Royale a garrison of 4 thousand men with 18 men of war, which have sailed (except 3 that are cruising at Newfoundland and on the coast of Acadia), on receiving intelligence that our fleet had been chased by Admiral Martin<sup>1</sup> and had taken refuge in the Island of Aix, where it is blockaded; that this news is but too probable, inasmuch as the fleet does not make its appearance on the coast of Acadia, and that being at the end of his provisions, he has concluded on returning with Le Castor to France.

That he is unable to put into separate vessels, agreeably to the King's orders, the prisoners he has, to the number of 168, and to convoy them to the mouth of this river, in consequence of the number of sick on board the 2 frigates; that in like manner he has been unable to take them on board his ship, as he would not be able to defend himself, should circumstances require it; that he handed over his prisoners to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, and left them sufficient provisions for their subsistence, and some munitions of war and 5 vessels; he adds that the port of Chibouctou is favorably situated for the stoppage of any supplies the English send from Boston to Louisbourg, and very easily fortified.

M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan informs us that he has opened our despatches to the commander of the fleet, which he had received for transmission to that officer on his arrival, in order to ascertain if there were any duty that he could perform in the commander's absence, but having found nothing for him to do he had resealed the letters, and returned them to M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre.

Sieur de Ramezay informs us, under date of Minas, 14th of August, that Sieur de Gay, lieutenant of the frigate L'Aurore, had come to Minas some days before M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan's departure, to request him to take charge of the 168 prisoners, for the purpose of sending them to Quebec; that through fear of running out of provisions he had resolved to send a detachment of 150 Frenchmen to Chibouctou, under the command of Sieur Repentigny, to guard their prisoners there, and place them in the hands of the commander of the fleet, when he should arrive, and that if they received within 15 days no news of the fleet, to send them all back in one of their vessels with a pass from M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan, who is to leave provisions for them and the detachment during the whole of this time.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay informs us that an express has reached him from Chibouctou, informing him that the 2 frigates had sailed on the 12th of August; he receives a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan of the 11th, who writes him that he has left the prisoners with Sieur Repentigny, with sufficient provisions for them and a part of the French detachment of 150 men; that 'tis absolutely necessary that Sieur de Ramezay adopt measures to send these prisoners to Canada; that it would be of fatal consequence to send them to Louisbourg, where they would furnish an exact journal of all our measures. M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan adds, at the close of his letter, an order, by way of command, to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, to take charge of these prisoners for the purpose of forwarding them to Quebec.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay communicates to us returns of the provisions M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan says he left at Chibouctou, which barely suffice to support the prisoners and detachment of the French at said place until he receive our orders, even if the provisions of which he is in want permit him to wait for them, as it is not possible to convey to Minas the provisions which would remain unconsumed at Chibouctou at the departure of the prisoners.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay annexes the report of 3 Irish soldiers, who had deserted from Port Royal on the 9th of August, who said that the garrison of that fort consisted of 300 men with 12 or 15 officers; that more than 30 Irish soldiers were desirous to follow their example; that there is at least one year's provisions in the fort, but very little firewood; that there is a frigate of 40 guns off Goat Island, that they heard the workmen and soldiers say that Sieur Mascaren<sup>1</sup> had demanded 40 thousand men of New England, to force the Acadians to take up arms, to embark with them, and to come to Quebec, and that those who would refuse should be imprisoned, their houses burnt, their property confiscated, and themselves finally transported to Boston; that 14 men of war were expected from Old England at the latter place, to convey the troops destined for Canada; that they had received news from Boston only two days before, and that these vessels had not arrived as yet; that Sieur Mascaren was aware that there was a detachment of French and Indians at Minas, but he did not know how many.

Joseph Grangé, who lives at the River Aux Canards,<sup>2</sup> in Acadia, arrived at Minas on the 11th of August, and reported to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay that within two months he had stopped at Port Royal, where the commandant had forced him to work; that he heard the English at Boston were taking up arms against Canada; that he had also heard, recently, that 14 ships belonging to our fleet had been blockaded in Brest by 18 English men of war, and that Sieur Mascaren had demanded 3000 men at Boston, for the purpose of laying waste all the settlements from Minas unto Beaubassin.

M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan transmits to M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart the returns, both of provisions and ammunition, taken from the prizes of L'Aurore and Le Castor, as well as of those he caused to be delivered to M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre for distribution to his Indians, and of those left by that officer to Sieur de Repentigny for the subsistence and other necessities of his detachment, and of the prisoners he handed over to him.

M<sup>r</sup> Guillimin informs M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart on the 13th of August that the detachment is on the point of getting out of provision; that the inhabitants object to furnishing any on notes promising to pay all these expenses at Quebec or in Acadia. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay has even been obliged to have an ordinance published which we have transmitted to him, to oblige the Acadians to furnish necessaries to our detachment.

5. Lieutenant-Major de Lanaudière, of M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment, has just arrived; he left Minas on the 21st ult<sup>o</sup>. We receive a letter of the same date from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, who, in consequence of our despatch of the first of said month, is taking measures to collect his people, and to leave with the greatest diligence possible for Beaubassin, where he will learn the route that is best for him to take on his return, observing all possible precautions; he is sending for the prisoners at Chibouctou. Another deserter from Port Royal has come over to him, whose declaration is similar to that of his predecessor; our domiciliated Indians were to leave on the following day for Quebec by the River St. John. In our present uncertainty as to whether M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment will come by sea, or by the River St. John, M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart is having prepared 20 quintals of flour, lard, sugar, Indian corn and some other articles to be sent to the River du Loup, 35 leagues below Quebec, in order, on the first intelligence received there of the approach of our people, to dispatch 50 settlers to carry those provisions across the woods as far as Lake Temisquata.

M<sup>r</sup> de Cery, commander of the brigantine La Petite Marguerite, which sailed from Quebec on the 9th of August, arrived at seven o'clock in the evening, in a sloop from Cape Desrosiers; he left that place on the 18th of the same month.

Reports that he touched at Cape Desrosiers on the 16th of August, to leave provisions with Sieur Perthuis, and to learn from him what was passing; that the day following his arrival he was at anchor close to the shore, to avoid being seen by an English vessel, which had made her appearance the evening before, in case she should return that day; that the same craft was, in fact, seen in the offing about 5 or 6 o'clock in the morning, with a light wind from the east; that she was heading towards Cape Desrosiers, with very little wind, and was approaching very slowly, whereupon Sieur Cery, who was on board his own vessel, proceeded in quest of Sieur Perthuis; they both concluded that should his vessel happen to be discovered 'twere better to run her ashore than to allow her to be taken; and that should the ship intend to carry her off, the brigantine should be set on fire; that the enemy continued his course, and about four o'clock in the afternoon came in sight, and turned out to be a large ship. When about a league off Sieur Cery hoisted his flag, and fired a gun, to be sure of him, and the ship ran up a streamer (flamme) and a French flag, but did not confirm it. This ship continuing to approach, Sieur Perthuis perceived, with his glass, that she had a boat on board in slings (palans), and another afloat on her starboard side, and he distinguished, ready to be hoisted, an English flag, which scarcely appeared above the railing; the vessel continued her approach very slowly, for want of wind, and came under French colors within half a gun shot of the brigantine, without showing any signals; this determined Sieur de Cery to cut his cables and run ashore; after which he and his crew landed, armed, and laid in ambush, in a favorable position. The ship cast anchor in the brigantine's berth, within half a quarter of a league of the land, and when she discovered the latter ashore pulled down his French streamer and colors, and immediately run up an English streamer and flag, and discharged 7 guns, loaded with grape and canister, which did no harm; he thereupon manned both his boats with an armed party, to cut out the brigantine. Sieurs de Cery and Perthuis seeing, at this moment, that with their men, who numbered . . . . ., they could not resist these two boats, which were, besides, armed with swivels, resolved to set fire to the brigantine. This was effected, and when the boats, which were approaching under cover of the ship's guns, saw her on fire, they, as well as our people, let fly some musket shots, put off again, and went to raise the brigantine's anchors, the cables of which had been only cut. As there was some powder on board the brigantine, and it was dangerous to remain near, our men retired to the Cape, to observe the manœuvres of the ship. The wind having shifted to the S. W., somewhat fresh, and the ship being quite in shore, and even in danger of being unable to get off, should the wind come to blow, being riding only with one anchor, she fired 2 or 3 guns, and her boats, which were in the offing, returned on board; the night fell, and about 9 o'clock the ship set sail and doubled Cape Desrosiers in 5 or 6 fathoms.

In the course of the day some provisions and other articles were saved from the brigantine, and Sieur Perthuis took charge of them. On the day following Sieur de Cery had some gun barrels and locks taken out of the hold, and has brought them away.

8th We dispatch an express to Acadia; we write to Sieur de Ramezay respecting the different precautions necessary to be observed on his return, in consequence of the dangers he may run in coming by sea, and the difficulties to be met, if the route by the River St. John be taken; but we are always in hope that the fleet will arrive at Acadia before his departure.

At all events the General sends his orders to Captain Coulon, who is to command the detachment of 300 Canadians that is to winter in Acadia, to satisfy the Acadians and protect them against the resentment of the English.

We inform said Sieurs Coulon and de Ramezay, as well as the Commandant of the fleet, of the accident that has happened to M<sup>r</sup> de Cery, which must render M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay more embarrassed in respect to his return, for he informs us in his last letter that he was awaiting the arrival of Sieur de Cery, in order to determine what route he should select for his return.

We send to Father Germain informing him of everything; of the new signals that the King's ships will make next year, should any of them come to Chibouctou,<sup>1</sup> in order that M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre may be able to recognize and communicate with them; we request Father Germain to remain at Beaubassin, where we believe his presence of use for the good and advantage of the service.

11th The schooner La Charmante Nanette, Captain Maillet, is arrived; she sailed from Rochefort on the 21st of June, in company with the squadron and fleet commanded by the Duke d'Enville.

12. Dispatched a boat to Sieur Perthuis at Cape Desrosiers with some rigging that he has demanded.

We write him not to quit his post until the last moment possible.

We permit Sieur Bazin, who is on the lookout at Cape Chat, to leave on the 10th of 8<sup>ber</sup> for Quebec. We hope our ships will have passed by that time.

Same permission to M<sup>r</sup> Rouville, who is at Rimousky.

13. Captain de Sabrevois, who was dispatched on the 3<sup>d</sup> of this month by M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud 5 leagues beyond Fort St. Frederic, has arrived. Sieur de Rigaud informs us that he has burnt Fort Massachusets,<sup>1</sup> taken 22 soldiers and some women, destroyed the grain, killed the oxen, horses and other cattle on both sides of the river<sup>2</sup> coming down, for the distance of 12 leagues. He has been wounded in the arm; 5 Frenchmen and ten Indians have also been wounded; he lost only one Abenakis.

An express is arrived from Acadia; we are in receipt of a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, dated Minas, the 22nd ultimo, wherein he acknowledges the receipt of our despatch of the 2nd of the same month; he informs us that Sieur de St. Pierre took his departure on the same day, the 22nd, with 30 Frenchmen and our domiciliated Indians, for this place by the River St. John; he is waiting for the prisoners from Chibouctou, to bring them along with him, if possible. He hopes that on M<sup>r</sup> de Cery's return to Bay Verte it will be in his power to take measures to insure the safe return of the detachment by sea. He flatters himself that this captain will be loaded with provisions; otherwise he would find a rapid return somewhat difficult.

No news of our fleet.

Father Germain writes us on the 25th ult<sup>o</sup> about various matters relating to current affairs.

The vessel fitted out to convey to River du Loup the provisions destined for M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment, which will possibly return by the River St. John, has not been able to leave until to-day by reason of contrary winds.

14th We write to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay in answer to his letter of the 22nd, and continue to keep him advised of every occurrence on this Continent. We inform him that we hope our fleet will have arrived in sufficient time to make some demonstration, and that he will find himself in season to second it with his detachment.

That if, unfortunately, our fleet should not have arrived, we will shortly know the fact by the King's ships that, 'tis said, are detailed to escort our principal merchantmen as far as Quebec, and that the General will determine, according to the news, either to recall the detachment, if proper, or to cause a part of it to winter; that M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay will, until then, be guided by the last orders he had previously received; but we add, when the fleet shall have arrived, and Sieur de Ramezay will have received the commandant's instructions, he is to act accordingly.

We advise him that M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart has had flour, biscuit and vegetables prepared, to the amount of nine or 10 thousand quintals, which we shall send to the orders of the Admiral of the squadron by our vessels on receipt of the first intelligence of the arrival of the fleet, and according to the requisitions which will be made on us for them.

22. The General issues orders to relieve the guard of the beacons set up on the South shore.

Orders Sieur Cartier at Ile aux Coudres to put the rafts in a place of safety, as well as the provisions, ammunition and effects, until next spring.

An express arrived from Beaubassin, which place it left on the 4th instant. We receive a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, dated Minas, the 27th of August, informing us that he has learned, from Jacques Costé, an honest man coming from Port Thoulouse, who said he had a conversation with his brother, who had arrived from Louisbourg 16 days ago, that 9 large ships had sailed from that port, and that he knew not what course they steered ; that there remained still at Ile Royale 4 or 5 other pretty heavy ships, including the Vigilant, with about fifty small craft ; he had no knowledge of the English expedition against Canada.

Sieur de Ramezay transmits the General a petition handed to him by divers inhabitants of Minas, to the number of ten, wherein they represent their poverty, and if a detachment of French and Indians be left with them, 'twill complete their ruin, as they cannot furnish any more supplies to the troops that have been sent thither.

Other inhabitants of Minas have since handed M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay another petition, wherein they supplicate the General to leave a detachment at the said place to protect them from the incursions of the English, which detachment they will supply with everything they can for its support ; that those who made contrary representations to theirs, are attached to the English, with whom they desire to preserve their trade and do not care about living under them. Sieur de Ramezay adds, that should he receive provisions or money, 'twould remove every difficulty on the part of the settlers.

That officer is expecting the prisoners from Chibouctou, on their way to Beaubassin, to embark for Quebec on board the vessels he had left at Bay Verte.

Father Germain in his letter of the 4th of this month, informs us that it would be necessary to send a vessel with provisions as far as Gaspé to meet the detachment, as he foresees they will run the risk of falling short of food before they reach Quebec.

He represents to us, also, the necessity of sending provisions to Acadia for the support of the detachment which is to winter there, as the country is not able to furnish any more, and as the inhabitants, moreover, object very much to advance any in their hands on the notes issued by the commandant.

This missionary addresses us an extract of a letter that Sieur de Ramezay wrote him on the 27th of August, in which the latter advises him that he then learned, by a courier he had sent to Port Royal, that a privateer was about to sail from that place to Beaubassin, or Minas, Grand Pré, Pequignil,<sup>1</sup> etc., and to be on his guard ; that Sieur Mascaren is very uneasy ; that he intends making a prisoner in order to ascertain what is going on at Minas, and recommends him to send, as he shall do, some Indians to the cape to scout. Sieur de Ramezay adds, that he has just received 16 prisoners from Chibouctou ; that the remainder will arrive next day, and that he will then depart.

Lieutenant S' Ours arrived this evening; he left Minas with Sieur S' Pierre and the Abenakis, whom he left at Camouraska on the 22nd of August.

This officer reports that having left Minas with the Abenakis in a bark canoe, they had loaded a small vessel with provisions to go to the mouth of the River St. John; that when about 15 leagues from Minas this little vessel was chased by an English privateer of about 16 guns, from Port Royal, and was forced to run ashore at Ile haute,<sup>1</sup> where the vessel went to pieces and the provisions were lost; that M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre and all the Indians who were on the mainland, could not give any assistance to their friends because it blew too strong for small canoes; that the privateer seeing the vessel ashore, returned. In consequence of the loss of the provisions, they subsisted along the entire route exclusively on fish, which they fortunately found in sufficient abundance.

24th We receive letters from M<sup>r</sup> Joncaire, dated at the Senecas the 2nd instant; he informs us that no dependence is to be placed on the conduct of the Iroquois of the 5 Nations, until they had returned from Orange, whither they had gone 40 days before to attend a meeting, to the number of more than 400, and were soon expected to return.

We learn from Fort Frontenac that the Onondaga formerly taken prisoner in the neighborhood of Fort S' Frederic, where he was on the scout, and who had been sent back to his village by some Iroquois of the Sault, had arrived there in safety with the latter, which cannot fail to have a very good effect on the 5 Nations, to whom this Indian belongs.

The General is issuing orders at Montreal for the dispatch of divers parties of Indians towards New England, under the command of some Frenchmen, for the purpose of harassing the enemy.

M<sup>r</sup> de S' Pierre has arrived with the Abenakis, including those domiciliated and belonging to Acadia, to the number of 150.

25th According to information received from Father Germain in his letter of the 4th 7<sup>ber</sup>, we fear that the half of M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment, which will be able to get away on the 12th or 15th of this month, will be in want of provisions on the way. We, in consequence, send to Gaspé the sloop St. Jacques, Captain de Vitré, with some provisions and refreshments, with orders to wait for our little fleet there; but in case he should learn, on the voyage, that our vessels have passed on their way to Quebec, he is to repair to Bay Verte, where he will deliver his cargo according to Father Germain's orders, so as to provide so far for the subsistence of the detachment of Frenchmen and Indians who are to winter in Acadia.

We inform Sieur Perthuis, at Cape Desrosiers, of this expedition; we request him to secure the vessel in the Bay of Penœuil whilst waiting for Sieur de Ramezay, and should Sieur de Vitré continue his voyage as far as Bay Verte, to notify Father Germain of the circumstance and inform him that we shall dispatch, in a few days, to Bay Verte, a vessel of 90 tons, with provisions and as much cloth as we shall be able to procure, for the relief of our Canadians who remain in Acadia, as well as of M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre's Indians and the inhabitants of Port Thoulouse, &c.

M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud has arrived from Montreal; the wound he received in the right arm is not dangerous, the ball having merely pierced the flesh.

The prisoners he made in his last expedition have been sent to the barracks to the number of 27; to wit, 22 men, the remainder women and children. One of them, the Minister,<sup>2</sup> having been interrogated, reported that Prince Edward's army had been defeated on the 17th of May; that the sailing of the French fleet was known at Boston; that it had been seen, and that Admiral Bing and Admiral Martin had gone to fight it and oppose our enterprise.

We have had advice that a party of Abenakis, headed by Ensign Monsiegn, who had been detached from Sieur Rigaud's party after his attack on Fort Massachusetts, proceeded towards Fort Sarasteau; that they had met 17 soldiers belonging to the garrison, took 4 of them, scalped 4 others; the remainder threw themselves precipitately into the fort, pursued by our people, who killed some of them.

M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud has also informed us that several Abenakis, belonging to his detachment, had set out, after his expedition, to make an attack towards Deorville and Corsac, and have taken 56 scalps.

27th Ensign Croisille de Courtemanche has arrived; he left Beaubassin on the 7th instant.

We are in receipt of letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, dated Minas, the 6th, informing us that when he was about to set out from that place for Beaubassin, Father Germain had informed him of the privateer which was cruising in the Bay of Fundy and had chased the vessel on board of which he had put a part of the crew belonging to the detachment and Sieur Guillimin had embarked, who had been forced to return to Minas; that this privateer deranges the plans he had taken for the conveyance to Beaubassin of the provisions he had prepared for his return and for the subsistence of the 135 prisoners whom M<sup>r</sup> Duvignan had handed over to him, and who seriously embarrass him; that unable to effect this arrangement he had resolved to proceed overland to Beaubassin where he arrived on the 4th instant with his men, amounting to 500, with only eight days' provision, and without any expectation of obtaining much at Beaubassin.

What causes him most disquietude is, the eight ships that are cruising at the mouth of the river, according to the report to be mentioned hereafter. This has determined him to return in boats; when he will be at Bay Verte, he will consult with the ship captains what course he is to adopt to protect his men from the enemy.

He adds that he greatly fears being obliged to leave the prisoners at Beaubassin until further orders.

He requests us to send a vessel loaded with provisions as far as possible to meet him.

No news from the fleet.

The following is the report M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay mentions:

Francois Brilliant, John Baptist Martel and John Marchand, a farmer of Fort Thoulouse, who set out from said place on the 27th of August, and arrived at Beaubassin on the 5th of this month, have declared that they spoke to Nicholas Norman, an honest man of their acquaintance, who had left Louisbourg on the 18th or 20th of August, who assured them that eight ships had sailed time of its capture and carried prisoner to Canada, where he remained one year, and arrived in Boston in August, 1747. The following year he went to East Hampton, Middlesex county, Connecticut, and was installed Pastor of the Congregational church at that place November 30th, 1748. He labored nearly thirty years in the ministry there, and died of small-pox March 24th, 1778, aged 62 years. Field's Statistical Account of Middlesex County, Connecticut, 61, 138; History of Berkshire, 424. from Ile Royale, the smallest carrying 40 guns, to cruise at the mouth of the river between Gaspé and the North shore; that he had seen two large vessels going to the Island of St John, where they were intending to erect a fort, should the place be convenient for their design; that 8 ships of war were expected at Louisbourg from Boston with Captain Warren, who is to command the fleet destined next spring for Canada, which is the common report in town; that there were 8 men of war, and some forty smaller craft there, with a considerable force; that the English at Louisbourg have constructed four covert ways, one at the postern gate, another at the Maurepas gate, and the 3<sup>d</sup> at the murs grêlés, and a citadel with two batteries at the Dauphin gate, repaired the little island, which had been much dilapidated; also two subterraneous passages at the grand battery, and placed 12 pieces of artillery on the quay. They have not done anything at Gabarus.

Father Germain writes us on the 6th that the English will eventually be informed of the arrival of two frigates at Chibouctou, and that it is to be feared they will anticipate us next spring, and seize that harbor.

Sieur de Coulon, commanding the 300 Canadians that are to remain in Acadia, writes us, the first of this month, that it is absolutely necessary to send to Bay Verte some provisions for the subsistence of our people, together with some woollens, and other articles of clothing for them. He does not yet know where he will winter, whether at Minas, where he is, or at Beaubassin; that a portion of the farmers at the former place are not disposed to furnish him the supplies he will require; that he will possibly go to Beaubassin, where the inhabitants appear more inclined to furnish supplies to the Canadians; that he is waiting, before he decides, for news from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, who is to sound the farmers at Beaubassin. He adds, that the principal cause of all these difficulties is the want of money, and that the settlers are always apprehensive that it will be a long time before the notes will be taken up, which they have received in payment for what they have furnished.

25th Rausin, who has been the entire summer at Point des Monts, has arrived.

He reports that he has seen, on the 3, 4 and 5 of this month a large ship cruising from north to south; that it is probably only an English vessel, for during the heavy northeast blow, which prevailed the last two days she was in sight, she was lveering and standing close in shore; that he heard, on the 6th, 12 guns fired in the dusk of the evening, at a great distance; but does not know what it meant. He has seen nothing in the river since the 16th, when he left Point des Monts.

29th Sieur Sallaberry, who had been sent on the 6th of August, in a biscayenne to cruise, and look out between Cape Chat and La Trinité, arrived this morning; he also saw the ship spoken of by Rausin. He has perceived nothing since the 18th, when he left La Trinité.

30th We learn that M<sup>r</sup> de Gannes, Deputy-Governor of Montreal, died on the 26th of this month.

October 1. Ensign de Belestre, who left Beaubassin on the 8th of 7<sup>ber</sup>, arrived to-day. Sieur de Ramezay writes us from the same place, that, in consequence of the intelligence he has received that 8 English ships were cruising at the mouth of the river awaiting our detachment, and of his inability to pass with the vessels without evident danger, he has proposed to Sieur Duhamel, Captain of the ship Letourneur, to take charge of the 100 prisoners to convey them to the enemy's country or to France if possible, so as to prove to this ship that he cannot, for want of provisions, remain any longer. The other prisoners will come in the vessels as far as Pabo, in the expectation that our Canadians and those small craft will not run any great danger so far. He adds, that he is starting for Bay Verte, where he will adopt the best measures for his return, being short of provisions; that some might, however, be had in the country for money, but, with notes, it is necessary to force the farmers to furnish the most urgent succors.

In order to facilitate his return, he has permitted some 40 officers and Canadians to proceed by way of the River St John.

We are sending to Bay Verte a schooner of 90 tons, commanded by Captain Cheron, which we are loading with provisions, some cloth, linen and other articles and necessities, for the support and clothing of the Canadian detachment which is to winter in Acadia. The General writes to Captain Coulon, who is in command of this detachment, so to manage as to prevent the English making any new settlements in Acadia; to come to an understanding with M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre, missionary at Chibénaccadie,<sup>1</sup> so that the latter may cause his Indians to scour the country towards the port of Chibouctou and La Heve,<sup>2</sup> in order to prevent the formation of any settlements there by the English, should they make their appearance, as they will certainly be informed of the arrival of the King's ships this summer at the former port, it being of consequence to us to keep possession of these two places, which are the only ones in Acadia in which ships of war can lie in safety.

The schooner will sail with the first fair wind.

2<sup>d</sup> Arrived Lieutenant Péan, who sailed from Bay Verte on the 14th ultimo, with 6 biscayennes and 2 skiffs, containing 2 officers, 172 Canadians and 48 prisoners; they are absolutely out of provisions, having had, when they sailed, only enough for 8 or 10 days.

This officer brings us some letters from the ship Letourneur, which he boarded at St Barnabé. They are from M<sup>r</sup> Guillimin, dated said place the 28th ult<sup>o</sup>, who sends us a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, dated Cape Tourmentine,<sup>3</sup> six leagues from Bay Verte, 17th 7<sup>ber</sup>, wherein he informs us that being obliged to leave Bay Verte, being out of provisions, he had gone on board our little fleet to proceed to Quebec, notwithstanding all the dangers he was incurring; that he is just in receipt of a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Girard, missionary priest at Copequit, addressed to Father Germain, dated 15th of said month of September, whereof the tenor is as follows:

"I send you an express to let you know that twelve or thirteen days ago there arrived in a harbor called Au Castor,<sup>4</sup> 15 leagues from Chibouctou, a ship that had separated from the fleet 14 days previously, when three hundred leagues from France. After leaving the fleet she fought eight days with two English privateers, having lost the mate and 11 men. She sent her boat to Chibouctou whence they sent me an express for M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre to convey the King's despatches to the ships arrived at Chibouctou, and which, to their great surprise, had sailed for France, as you are aware; the ship, after refitting, is to be in Chibouctou. The fleet consists of 250 sail, whereof 30 are ships of the line, exclusive of the Toulon and Spanish fleets which are to join them, but had not done so on the departure of the ship already arrived; the fleet is to winter. I learned all that I tell you from the express who saw and conversed with the boatswain (Serjent de la chaloupe) at Chibouctou. Mr le Loutre is about Minas. I have sent him the letters from Chibouctou by express from Copequid."

Sieur de Ramezay having held a council on this letter, it has been decided that he should return to Minas with all his officers who had embarked on board the vessels, except two and a detachment of militia, to repair with greater facility to and rejoin M<sup>r</sup> Coulon's detachment which is at Minas; that he had left the rest of the Canadians on board the vessels to escort the prisoners, who number 100 and upwards, and that when he shall have arrived at Bay Verte, he will give us fuller information by couriers he is to send overland.

Sieur Péan adds, that Father Germain had left Beaubassin for Quebec, by way of the River St. John, 4 or 5 days before him, and had Pilotte, who left Quebec on the 27th of August with 6000<sup>l</sup> in specie, arrived before his departure, the whole of the detachment would have still remained some days at Beaubassin; and that the cause of M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's sending him with 160 men in a biscayenne, is the absolute impossibility of having any more provisions from the Acadians except for cash.

Sieur Guillimin states that the detachment and prisoners had gone on board the ship Letourneur, and the 5 small vessels belonging to our little fleet, that the latter are coming up, that he met Sieur Vitré, whom we had sent to Gaspé with provisions, part of which he took, and sent him to meet the other vessels and boats under the command of Sieur Péan, which are in want of some.

Sieur Péan informs us that he has left 3 of his biscayennes at Matanne, without any provisions; that he has learned that the five others had been thrown ashore, on the coast towards Gaspé, where they had been obliged to wait for high water to get off; that this detachment must suffer more than the others, for want of provisions; that 'tis, consequently, necessary to send a small vessel with relief for all these boats.

He adds that some days before his departure from Beaubassin, an express, which had been sent to Port Royal, had returned with news that he heard some people tell the English of the fort that they had advice of four Spanish men of war, cruising off the mouth of Boston harbor.

3<sup>d</sup> We are dispatching two biscayennes with provisions to meet the boats left behind by Sieur Péan.

4th The schooner we are sending to Bay Verte with provisions, sailed this morning.

We write to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay that we approve of his conduct, and add that he will not have been long in possession of positive news of the fleet before he will have the Duke d'Enville's orders.

We instruct that officer to inform himself of everything passing here, and of the return of our Indians, and a portion of our Canadians.

Father Germain having left Beaubassin we address our despatches to the commanding officer at that place, who will forward them to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay and the Commandant of the fleet. We inform the Duke d'Enville that on the earliest intelligence of his arrival in Acadia we shall freight the vessels here with provisions; that he can calculate on ten or twelve thousand quintals, but that he alone can provide for the safety of the transports which we shall send him.

We receive a letter from Father Germain dated Pekoudiak,<sup>1</sup> ten leagues from Beaubassin, dated 19th of 7<sup>ber</sup>; he informs us that after he had left the latter place for the River St. John an express brought him a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, dated Beaubassin the 18th, wherein he requests him to return, and that he will communicate to him some news he has just received of the fleet. Before leaving Pekoudiak, where he was, Father Germain dispatched this express to us, to inform us of M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's putting back. Pilotte, who left here on the 27th of August with 6000<sup>l</sup> in specie had arrived.

Item. The bateau Le Loup marin, Captain Aubert, with twenty Canadians and 13 prisoners.

Item. The bateau La Société, Captain Depleine, with forty-one Canadians and eighteen prisoners.

The season which begins to advance, makes Mr Hocquart afraid that there will not be time to unload the vessels which will come from France, in order to load them afterwards with provisions for the fleet, whereof reliable news must be shortly received. He has concluded that two or three of those here should begin to load for that destination, whilst waiting the first news.

7th Sieur Guillimin, commissary to the detachment from Canada, has just arrived overland; he left the ship Letourneur at St. Jochim; this vessel anchored in port this evening; she brings 34 Canadians and 43 prisoners.

On this evening also arrives Father Lacorne, the Recollect Missionary at Miramichi; he left Bay Verte in the beginning of last month; represents to us the melancholy condition of the Indians of his mission, in consequence of the want of provisions and clothes, at a time when the season begins already to be severe; that they have all abandoned Acadia and returned to Miramichi, highly dissatisfied at not meeting in that province the succor we had led them to expect. Though the season be advanced, we shall endeavor to send back Father Lacorne to his mission, with some relief, in provisions and effects, to clothe his Indians, in order to induce them to return to Acadia, should they be required for any expedition.

Arrived Sieur Jean Darat, Captain of the ship L'Heureux, one of the five vessels which the Duke d'Enville sent off on the 14th of July. He tells us that having come by the Straits of Belisle the ship struck on the point of Castle Bay (Baie des Chateaux) on the 20th of August, in the day time, but in foggy, almost calm weather: that the crew got off and he could save from the vessel only about eighty barrels of brandy.

8th Arrived Captain Lacroix Gerard of the schooner L'Aimable Martre, from Bay Verte, with thirty-five Canadians and fifteen prisoners.

10th Ensign de Linot, of Louisiana, has just arrived. He left there in the month of February last.

We are in receipt of letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, the Governor. Everything was then quiet in that country.

The man named Pierre Hevé is arrived from Gaspé; has declared that being at Kerpont, on the North shore, he saw, in the middle of August, two ships cruising in those roads, and that when he was at Mount Louis, on the South shore of the Gulf, he had likewise seen, on the 15th ultimo, a large vessel and a brigantine or schooner, cruising between that place and Seven Islands. Assuredly, these are not French vessels.

Pilote, sent express from Beaubassin, has arrived; we receive letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay and Father Germain, dated 22nd ultimo, containing nothing but what reached us on the 5th instant respecting the ship arrived in Beaver harbor, in Acadia, announcing the fleet.

14th Two more couriers have arrived from Beaubassin; they bring us, at length, the agreeable tidings of the arrival of the fleet at Acadia; we are sent copy of a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Bigot, Intendant of the fleet, to M<sup>r</sup> le Loutre, missionary priest at Acadia, dated Chibouctou, the twentieth of September, wherein the former informs this missionary that the fleet commanded by the Duke d'Enville had anchored in Chibouctou on that day; he requests him to procure for him at least some fifty beeves for the wants of the fleet, for which he will pay cash; he asks him to come to Chibouctou and to give notice to the inhabitants of Acadia, who will be in possession of promissory notes for supplies furnished the detachment of French and Indians who have sojourned there, to send in said notes to Chibouctou, where he will pay their amount.

This news has diffused great joy throughout Acadia; the inhabitants of that Province dared no longer hope for the arrival of any force from Europe. They refused the most urgent supplies even to the Canadians and Indians, who are to winter there, apprehensive that they would not be paid, or be a long time out of their money for the supplies they furnished on certificates. 'Tis hoped that there will be, at present, no more difficulty in this regard.

M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart continues to have provisions put on board 3 or 4 of the stoutest vessels in the harbor, to be sent to the fleet on the first notice we receive from the Duke d'Enville.<sup>1</sup>

14th We send an express to Camouraska with the necessary orders to cut a road, or path, of about 3 feet over the carrying place from River du Loup, forty leagues below Quebec, to Lake Temisquata, whence people go in canoes by way of the River St. John as far as Beaubassin; this is with a view to facilitate the communication with Acadia, and to transport thither some detachments of Frenchmen and Indians, if necessary.

We learn from Montreal that M<sup>r</sup> Largenterie, a half-pay captain, died on the . . . of this month.

Father Germain writes us finally that the settlers of Port Thoulouse<sup>2</sup> in Ile Royale, and other Acadian farmers, worthy Frenchmen, were absolutely in want of provisions, which has induced us to send to Bay Verte a small detachment, under the guidance of some of the inhabitants of Port Thoulouse, with 120 barrels of flour and some other provisions, and a small quantity of ammunition, for the relief of those settlers, a portion of whom have joined the Canadian detachment that is to winter in Acadia. This vessel has sailed to-day; we consign it to Father Germain, who is to distribute these provisions among those most in need of them.

The lateness of the season has not prevented Father Lacorne accepting the proposal we made him to return to his mission at Miramichi, in Acadia, in order to convey provisions, ammunition and clothing to his Indians, who are in great want of these supplies.

It is most important for us to preserve these Indians at the present crisis. With this view, M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart has had purchased, for account of the King, a vessel of 45 tons, on board which these provisions and ammunition will be placed. People are busy equipping her and she will sail in a few days.

Arrived, the schooner La Marie, commanded by Sieur Chauveau, freighted with 27 Canadians and 14 prisoners, two of whom died on the voyage. She is the last of those that carried the detachment of French and Indians which we sent to Acadia last spring. These prisoners, as well as those arrived by the last vessel, making, in all, 106, have been lodged in the barracks at Quebec. They amount, at present, to 240, including those of this and of last year.

15th Five prisoners are brought down to us from Three Rivers; two of those who have been taken in the beginning of September in the direction of Boston say, that they were talking in that town of attacking Canada; that the project has aborted, and that there were at Boston, at the close of August, eight vessels of war, large and small.

He preserved in that severe service a taste for letters and an elegance of manners which characterise his illustrious family. He was sent, in 1745, with a fleet of fourteen ships of the line to recover Louisbourg, but a violent tempest dispersed his squadron, and he died, overwhelmed with grief, 16th September, 1746, at Chibouctou, where the English have since built the city of Halifax. Biographie Universelle; Hutchinson's Massachusetts, II, 348. — Ed.

20th The three merchantmen that M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart had loaded with provisions are ready to sail.

The five sloops of the eight that started from Acadia under the command of M<sup>r</sup> Péan, and which had fallen behind, have arrived. The Canadians and the prisoners have suffered extremely for want of provisions.

16th We are dispatching couriers to Beaubassin. We inform the Duke d'Enville of the news we have received of his arrival at Chibouctou. We advise him that M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart has put provisions on board some merchantmen to be sent on the first advice we shall receive from him, when others will be loaded and joined to the former, and sent to the same destination.

M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart sends Father Germain, by this opportunity, 2000<sup>l</sup> in specie to provide for the special wants of the service at Beaubassin.

23<sup>d</sup> Sieur Barin,<sup>1</sup> who has been all summer on the lookout at Cape Chat, is returned; he has seen nothing in the river.

Father Maurice Lacorne, missionary to the Micmacs of Miramichi, left to-day in the vessel that we have had armed. He is supplied with provisions and goods for the relief of his Indians, who are in extreme want. This missionary is to obey the Duke d'Enville's orders to send the Micmacs wherever he will think proper; he is even to accompany them.

We write by this occasion to the commander of the fleet respecting the uneasiness we feel about the arrival of our ships from Rochelle, and how necessary it is for the welfare of the Colony that they reach us.

We adopt measures for wintering the frigate La Martre in the little River St. Charles.

25th Arrived a schooner from Martinico; left Port St Pierre on the 18th of August; she was commanded by Sieur Dailleboust de St Vilmé, who died on the passage.

27th It is a fortnight to-day since we received news of the arrival of the fleet at Chibouctou, and it is 37 days since it anchored in that port; 'tis impossible that no new couriers have been dispatched from Beaubassin with letters from the Duke d'Enville, since the 27th of September, the date of the last dispatches from that place. We fear that some accident has arrived. In our uncertainty as to the necessities of the fleet, through want of advice, which, however, we expect every moment, we have not considered it our duty to defer any longer the sending to Chibouctou some supplies in provisions and refreshments. These supplies consist of 6 thousand quintals of flour, 200 ditto of codfish, 500 minots of oats and 40 tons of iron. They will be put on board the following vessels:

NOTE.—The Lion was already loaded with provisions for account of the owner; she was destined for Martinico. Mr. Hocquart stopped her and the cargo, payment for which will be made to the owner at the rate of purchase, besides the freight.

Ship	La Déesse ,	Captain Iriard.
"	La Ste. Croix ,	Captain Alzouët.
"	La Ste. Julienne ,	" Monsegue.
"	Le Lion ,	" Bionneau.
Brigantine	Le Soleil ,
Snow,		belonging to M <sup>r</sup> Hiriard.
Brigantine	St. Esprit ,	" Sieur Sallaberry.

Of all these vessels the brigantine Le St. Esprit only remains to be loaded. We calculate on dispatching them within 8 or 10 days at farthest. Of the provisions which had been prepared for the fleet, there will remain at Quebec about 2000, 3 or 400 barrels of flour and vegetables, which we will be able to forward this year if circumstances permit; if not, next spring, and others can be prepared during the winter according to the requisitions the Duke d'Enville will make on us.

We send off to-day Ensign Beaujeu de Villemonde, by way of the River St. John, with despatches to the commander of the fleet, whom we advise of our resolution to send him some supplies to Chibouctou, and of all our consequent arrangements.

November 4. Chevalier de Beauharnais is arrived; he left Chibouctou on the 2nd of last month. We report what we have learned through him.

13th November, 1746. Report of M. de Repentigny, who arrived this day at Quebec.

This officer being, twenty-one days ago on the high road between Orange and Sarasto, with a party of thirty-seven men, four of whom were Frenchmen, heard a great noise; they halted and concealed themselves in a wood thirty paces from the road. The chief Nautagarouche, of the Lake of the Two Mountains, was dispatched to find out what the matter was; on his return, reported having seen a number of men on horseback and on foot, and a great many wagons. Our party withdrew into the wood and, whilst there, heard wagons and horsemen continually passing until one o'clock in the afternoon. Chevalier de Repentigny went forward with a cadet, two Iroquois and an Outaouas, about a quarter of a league in the direction of Orange, and lay in ambush about fifteen paces distance from the road, where he saw a wagon passing, under an escort of eighteen fusiliers, in which were some barrels that he thinks contained powder; others followed to the number of eighty or ninety, each escorted by three or four armed men; they were loaded with casks, barrels, sacks, mattresses and muskets behind. Among these vehicles were ten or twelve caleches containing some well dressed persons, apparently officers, with laced coats. When this manœuvre and observation was concluded, Sieur de Repentigny withdrew into the wood, and at sundown heard several drums beat; it was the head of the enemy's camp; some attentive Indians heard that night, and next morning, the noise of drums in the direction of the head of said camp, and at its extremity, which was three-quarters of a league distant from the head.

There was a fresh scout next morning. Chevalier de Repentigny went forward in person to ascertain the cause of the noise heard by the Indians: from the top of the hill he saw a large force collected and heard the roll of the drums. He, then, came down with all his party, and went and lay in ambush about fifteen paces from the road where this force was to pass; he saw about one hundred and fifty men march in good order, four deep, on the main road, whom the Indians would not attack; next came, at a distance of about half an arpent, two carts followed by twenty others. The Indians then determined to attack the two first, and killed two men attached to them, one of whom remained in one of the wagons that they pursued to the top of the hill at the bottom of which they had attacked them. The wagon having upset, they scalped one of the men they had killed. Sieur Deselle, who was following them with another Canadian, perceived, on the top of the hill, a number of men on horseback and a-foot, and some loaded wagons proceeding to the head, and other empty ones returning to the tail of the camp.<sup>1</sup>

The blow being struck, the Indians retired into the wood, where Chevalier de Repentigny proposed to them to follow the enemy until the latter would appear to make a decisive stand; but the Iroquois having refused the belt he offered them for that purpose, he determined to send three well disposed Outaouacs after the enemy. On rejoining him, four days after, these Indians reported that they had left the camp at the same place, always engaged in the same manœuvre. 'Tis about thirty leagues from Fort St. Frederic.

No sooner was the Marquis de Beauharnois, Governor-General of Canada, informed that war had broke out with England than his first care was to endeavor to secure to himself all the Indian nations of the Continent.

These nations having appeared in general disposed to side in this war with the French (except, however, the five villages of Iroquois, who, up to the present time, adhered to their system of neutrality), he organized, in the month of December,<sup>1</sup> one thousand seven hundred and forty-five, a detachment of five hundred men, partly Canadians and partly Indians, under the command of Sieur Marin, to attack the English settlements on the River Connecticut, which are not very considerable.

Sieur Marin set out from Montreal on the first of the said month of December, and marched until the eleventh, without communicating his destination to the Indians. But so soon as they were informed of it the Iroquois and domiciliated Hurons, who acted as guides to the detachment, set up so many difficulties to the execution of the enterprise that Sieur Marin, in order not to repulse them on an occasion when there was question of engaging them seriously in the war, agreed to the proposal they made him to proceed towards Orange, called by the English Albany, where, it appeared by a map they drew for him, they would have an opportunity of capturing three little stockaded forts built by the enemy.

He consequently marched until the twentieth, when the Indians again changed their mind, and asked to go towards Sarastau, where there was a fort of that name, and some considerable settlements.

Sieur Marin, whose principal object always was to get them to attack the English, consented to the new change.

Arrived at the English settlements he learned that the fort at Sarastau was garrisoned by a pretty strong force, whereupon he prepared to approach it with caution, in order to carry it by escalade, but the Indians, too impulsive, having attacked the houses in the vicinity too soon, the fort was secretly evacuated, and Sieur Marin found no person in it when he wished to make the attack.

After having burnt this fort he ordered the adjoining settlements to be laid waste, which order was so well executed, particularly by the Indians, that in a single morning the whole of the buildings, the principal of which consisted of four mills, were burnt, the cattle killed, and all the provisions destroyed within a circle of four leagues. One hundred and nine persons were taken prisoners, but only twelve or fifteen men were killed, the English, for the most part, having offered no resistance.

The Indians feeling vexed, after the expedition, that they had not had an opportunity of fighting, required of Sieur Marin to send two of the prisoners to Orange, to tell the Commandant at that town that they were about to return by short marches, in order to afford him time to pursue them, if he were disposed, but they returned undisturbed.

Since that time twenty-seven detachments of Indians have been formed, with a certain number of Canadians always at their head, to make incursions on the enemy's flanks, and not one of those has returned without killing or capturing some persons. The number of prisoners was, at the date of the departure of the ships from Quebec, about two hundred and eighty.

But of all these parties the most important one was that which the Marquis de Beauharnois organized in the month of August last, on the receipt, repeatedly, of intelligence that the English were preparing to attack Fort St. Frederic. This party was composed of about seven hundred men, both Canadians and Indians. Its command was conferred on Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Major of Three Rivers; it was designed at first to cover the fort, on the supposition that this was about to be attacked, but orders were issued at the same time to go in quest of the enemy to their own country, should it be ascertained that the attack on Fort St. Frederic was abandoned.

Sieur de Rigaud repaired, at first, to Fort St. Frederic, and having been informed, on his arrival, that the news received respecting the attack on this fort had no foundation, he set out for New England. It having been deliberated, in a council held with the Canadians and Indians, that an attack should be made on the fort called Massachuset, after the name of that Province, Sieur de Rigaud arrived, after a march of ten days in the neighborhood of this fort. He commenced the attack on it on the morning of the 30th of August, keeping up an incessant fire from both sides until the following day, when the garrison surrendered at discretion. Three women and five children were found in it. The loss on the part of the English, was not ascertained, as they had buried all their dead, except one. The French loss was one man killed and twelve wounded. Sieur Rigaud was among the latter. The fort was burnt on the same day, and the prisoner having stated that a reinforcement was to arrive from Dierfil, Sieur Rigaud detached sixty Iroquois and Abenakis on the route they were to come. These Indians having met this reinforcement, which consisted of only nineteen men, defeated it, and brought in four prisoners only, all the remainder having been killed.

After this expedition Sieur de Rigaud ordered the pillage, and all the settlements were burnt and sacked and the harvest laid waste within a circle of twelve to fifteen leagues. Only fifty-six prisoners were, however, made in this foray, almost all the settlers having had time to take refuge in Boston, Dierfil and Orange.

These incursions spread alarm throughout the whole of New England; almost all the rural settlements were abandoned in the month of September last, and the Colonists no longer went abroad except in parties and armed. But, on the other hand, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beauharnois and Hocquart state that the enemy were forming, last October, a camp between Orange and Sarastau. This camp has been reconnoitred by a detachment under the command of a Canadian officer,<sup>1</sup> who attacked two loads of ammunition. The report he has made was annexed. There is no doubt but the troops which were being collected were destined for a winter attack on the Colony from the south. The Marquis de Beauharnois was engaged in measures to counteract these plans, and there is reason to hope, so long as the English will not have regular troops with them, that the Canadians will not succumb. From the course they observe, it appears that they have lost nothing of their ancient valor, whilst the Indians, on their side, act better than they used to do in the last war, for they fight well in the open field, which they did not formerly do; and it is to those who compose the village of the Lake of Two Mountains that we are indebted for this. 'Tis they who have given the example both in that regard and in taking up the hatchet when the Marquis de Beauharnois proposed it to all the nations.

1.

A detachment of his Most Christian Majesty's troops will form themselves into two lines in front of the stone house occupied by his Britannic Majesty's troops, who will take their departure for Annapolis-Royal within twice twenty-four hours, with the honors of war, six days' provisions, haversack, one pound of powder and one pound of ball per man.

2.

The English prisoners in the hands of the French, will remain prisoners of war.

3.

The shipping seized by the troops of his Most Christian Majesty, cannot be restored to his Britannic Majesty's troops.

4.

As pillage was committed only by the Indians, the booty cannot be restored.

5.

The sick and wounded belonging to the English, actually in his Britannic Majesty's hands, will be conveyed to the River Aux Canards, where they shall be lodged by order of the French commandant, and supported at his Britannic Majesty's expense, until they be in a condition to be removed to Annapolis Royal; and the French commandant shall furnish them with letters of protection, and they shall be at liberty to retain one of their surgeons until they be restored to health.

6.

His Britannic Majesty's troops, actually at Grand-Prée, will not be at liberty to bear arms at the head of the Bay of Fundy, that is to say, at Minas, Cobequitte and Beaubassin, during the term of six months from the date hereof.<sup>1</sup>

On the acceptance and signing of these conditions on the one side and the other, his Britannic Majesty's troops will bring with them a flag, and march to-day from their guard-house, of which his Most Christian Majesty's troops will take possession, as well as of Grand Pré and all the munitions of war, provisions and artillery which his Britannic Majesty's troops now have.

Done at Grand-Prée, the 12th of February, 1747.

Expedition against Fort Clinton, New-York.

1747. 23<sup>d</sup> June. Started from Fort St. Frederic at midnight for Sarratau, to endeavor to find an opportunity to strike some good blow on the English or Dutch garrison at Fort Klinckton,<sup>1</sup> as they call it.

26th Left his canoes and slept near the River of Orange, which he crossed, the first in a little pirogue. Had five canoes made of elm bark (ecorce d'orme). Left Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Carqueville and St. Ours to cross their men; all were over at two o'clock in the afternoon.

28th At early dawn the Abenakis told him he was exposing his men very much, and they wished to form an ambuscade on a little island in front of the fort, in order to try and break somebody's head. He told them they must go to the fort.

He addressed the Iroquois of the Saut and the Hurons and Nipissings, who made answer that they had no other will but his, and that of Ononthio. He sent Sieur de Carqueville with seven Indians of the Saut and Nipissings, to see what was going on at the fort.

They reported that some forty or fifty English were fishing in a little river which falls into that of Orange, on this side of (en deca) the fort. He sent Sieur de Carqueville, a Nepissing, and an Abenaki to examine where the fort could be approached. M. de St. Luc said he should give his gun, which was a double barrel, to the first who would take a prisoner, and told them that after the first volley they should charge, axe in hand. He said the same thing to the French. Sieur de Carqueville arrived, and said that the English had retired into the fort. I sent M. de St. Ours to see where the river could be crossed, and to watch the movements of the fort. He returned to say that he had found a good place; that several Englishmen were out walking. They crossed the river and spent the remainder of the day watching the enemy.

29th The nineteenth<sup>2</sup> they all crossed, half a league above, though the Abenakis were opposed to it. Waited all day to see if any person would come out. Sent twenty men on the road to Orange, who returned, under the supposition that they were discovered, passing near the fort. Made a feint, to induce them to come out. He demanded of the Chiefs six of their swiftest and bravest men; commanded them to lie in ambush, on the banks of the river, within eight paces of the fort at daybreak, to fire on those who should come out of the fort, and to try and take a scalp, and if the fort returned their fire to pretend to be wounded, and to exhibit some difficulty in getting off, so as to induce the enemy to leave the fort.<sup>3</sup> Those in ambush [neither saw any persons] nor heard any noise; they came to say they thought they were discovered. The chiefs assembled around the officers and said that they must retreat; that they were surrounded by four hundred men, who had just come out of the fort. These gentlemen told them that it was not the custom of the French to retire without fighting, when so near the enemy, and that they were able to defend themselves against this number of men, should they be so bold as to come and attack them. The young braves of the Sault, Iroquois, Nepissings and Hurons said that they would not abandon him; they were ready to die for the French, and should give him a proof of it. The Abenakis of several villages were constrained to say the same; but it was only the good example of the Iroquois, in whose praise, as well as in that of the Nepissings and Hurons, on this occasion, too much cannot be said.

They sent out six scouts to lie in ambush at their appointed place, and to pass the night on their arms. He commanded the French and Indians to discharge their pieces, in case a large number of people came out, and to let them return the fire, and then to rush on them axe in hand, which was done.

30th Those who lay in ambush fired on two Englishmen, who came out of the fort at the break of day on the thirtieth, and who came towards them. The fort made a movement to come against our scouts, who withdrew. About a hundred and twenty men came out in order of battle, headed by two lieutenants and four or five other officers. They made towards our people, in order to get nearer to them by making a wheel. They halted at the spot where our scouts had abandoned one of their muskets and a tomahawk. Sieur de St. Luc arose and discharged his piece, crying to all his men to fire; some did so, and the enemy fired back, and the fort let fly some grape, which spread consternation among the Indians and Canadians, as it was followed by two other discharges of cannon ball. [Our men then rushed on them axe in hand]<sup>1</sup> and routed the enemy, whom they pursued within thirty toises of the fort fighting. Some threw themselves into the river and were killed by blows of the hatchet, and by gun shots.

Forty-five prisoners were taken and twenty-eight scalps. The number of those drowned could not be ascertained. One lieutenant, who commanded, with four or five other officers, was killed, and one lieutenant was taken prisoner. Only one Iroquois of the Saut was killed. He was attacked by three Englishmen; five were slightly wounded.

The attack being finished, Sieur de St. Luc collected the arms and withdrew his men. He remained with three Frenchmen and as many Indians, watching the enemy's movements. About one hundred and fifty men, as well as they could judge, came out of the fort, without daring to advance. Of the hundred and twenty or thirty who might have been in the sortie from the fort, some twenty or twenty-five only appeared to have reentered it.

The fort might be one hundred and fifty feet long by one hundred wide, with six wooden redoubts, for barracks; four in the angles of the fort and two in the centre of the two main curtains, which have been protracted to enlarge the fort that was one-half too small when it was first visited by Sieur Marin; but experiencing such harassing from the French and Indians, they apprehended some new attacks from us; however, it had not been rabbetted when M. Marin was there.

Lieutenant Herbin and his party took, in one instance, three prisoners and nine scalps; one was killed whose scalp could not be had. On another occasion they defeated ten persons, including those taken prisoners and those scalped. He has frequently been in expeditions towards Sarrantau.

Report of an incursion into the Island of Montreal by a party of English, Dutch, Mohawks, Senecas and Oneidas of the Five Nations. 1747.

June 14th Four Indians belonging to the Sault St Louis, having noticed in the little Lake St. Francis, fifteen leagues from Montreal, seven large elm canoes and a small bark one, hid in the wood extending to Chateauguaye (in which canoes, according to their calculation, from a hundred and twenty to a hundred and thirty of the enemy might have passed on their way to attack the Montreal settlements), came on the same day to notify the fact to Captain de Lavaltrie, the commandant at Sault St Louis, who informed M<sup>r</sup> de Beaucours, the Governor, thereof; the latter issued his orders on the fifteenth of the same month, at one o'clock in the morning; he had three guns fired and the drums beat to arms. The people assembled in the Place d'Armes, where a detachment was formed consisting of two hundred men, whereof I had the command; I marched at six o'clock in the morning in pursuit of the enemy, with ten canoes equipped with twenty men each and twenty officers. On arriving at La Chine, I detached M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre with five officers, fifty militia and one hundred and twenty Indians of the Sault, whom he was ordered to go and get there for the purpose of scouring the woods next day between the Sault and the Cascades, where I had fixed his rendezvous, which was well executed. For fear of being discovered by the enemy, I waited until night to set out from La Chine for the Cascades. Two leagues from La Chine I inquired of a man who was passing on horseback, whether there was any news? He told me he was carrying a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Perthuis,<sup>1</sup> parish priest of St. Anne, to M<sup>r</sup> de Beaucours, with information that three Frenchwomen belonging to his parish had been captured at three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, above Fort Senneville.<sup>2</sup> I told him to make haste and to tell the Governor that I was going to blockade the passage across to the Cascades. I landed at Point Claire fort, and sent an order to all the captains of the concessions, to march to Bout de l'Isle, to seize the enemy's canoes in case they were still there. I diligently continued my route towards the Cascades, and at one o'clock in the morning, about a league off (au large des) the Cascades, saw a canoe and paddled with all speed towards it. When within sound of the voice, I cried out to them Oukanéguen, Who are you?<sup>3</sup> To the third challenge they answered, Seneca. Seneca ho! 'Tis for you we are looking. The Indians cried Okanissé, who are you? Reply. Onnontio Sagejen, Onnontio's children.<sup>4</sup> The Indians answer; we're dead. I overtook them with much difficulty; they were moving as well as I. As soon as I overtook this canoe, the three women who had been captured the night before, rose up and threw themselves into my canoe crying and laughing all at once. In that canoe were four Senecas, one Oneida and a Dutchman. This last spoke Indian like themselves; he had his hair arranged, and was dressed like them. When the nine were embarked I proceeded to the Cascades, where arriving, day began to break, and I recognized the Dutchman who was closely interrogated as well as the Indians and the three women. Each, individually, said that no other than that canoe, containing six men, visited the Island of Montreal, where they captured the three women; that Thoianoguen,<sup>1</sup> White Head, a Mohawk, had gone with four Dutchmen and thirty-two Indians of the Five Nations, near Chateauguay, to make canoes to cross to the Island of Montreal and make a foray there. As I had sent M<sup>r</sup> de S<sup>t</sup> Pierre opposite the Cascades, nothing more urgent was left for me than to go to their cache on the South shore of the little Lake St. Francis, where I arrived at three o'clock in the afternoon, and found seven elm canoes capable of carrying, each, fifteen @ twenty men; all their provisions, powder, ball, deer skins, shoes, awls, blankets, wampum-belts, kettles, &c., which I gave to the nine Indians of the Sault S<sup>t</sup> Louis and sixteen Nepissings of the Lake of the Two Mountains who had accompanied me. I had the canoes cut; had mine also concealed in the woods, and I lay in ambush until two o'clock in the afternoon of the next day, when I received two Frenchmen and three Indians sent me by M<sup>r</sup> de S<sup>t</sup> Pierre, to inform me that he had heard nothing of any enemy. I sent back the five men to M<sup>r</sup> de S<sup>t</sup> Pierre, with word to range along the bank of the river for about half a league, opposite the island, where the enemy were to pass, in case some canoes should escape me; that I was going to pull up (me mettre en panne) at the Cascades at nightfall to wait for them, and if they did not make their appearance in the course of the night, I should conceal myself in the island with my canoes during the day. At two o'clock in the morning I heard and saw M<sup>r</sup> de S<sup>t</sup> Pierre firing at four canoes which were landing at the place where he lay in ambush. I immediately repaired thither with my whole force. M<sup>r</sup> de S<sup>t</sup> Pierre had taken nine men prisoners, two of whom were English, one Dutch and six Indians. An Indian who accompanied me in my canoe made another prisoner on arriving there; two others of the enemy's canoes made off higher up at daylight; the two canoes were found but the men had escaped. Thejanoguen, with three Dutchmen and ten Indians in two canoes, separated in the traverse, and had been to Chateauguay to strike a blow, having missed doing so on the Island of Montreal, whence they were coming. Being perceived by the Indians of the Lake of the Two Mountains, they abandoned the canoes on the South shore. As Thejanoguen was about landing at Chateauguay, he saw M<sup>r</sup> de S<sup>t</sup> Pierre firing on his people, whereupon he went ashore and abandoned his canoes, which were found, and he struck into the depths of the forest. Of twenty-four men who escaped in all, only eight reached Corlar; the rest died of hunger on the road. Thejanoguen got there with two Dutchmen who have been a month sick unto death, as we have learned from a number of prisoners from those parts. After all was done, I proposed to the Indians of the Sault S<sup>t</sup> Louis to go all together in pursuit of the enemy; they told me 'twas useless, that they would die on the way, and, moreover, that we had no provisions, which was the truth. The Indians of the Sault have done wonders, having tied their brethren of the Five Nations and repaid one hundred and twenty-five livres which the King gave them. It is one of the greatest strokes that could ever be made to get them to attack the Five Nations, who openly threaten them. I arrived to-day at Sault S<sup>t</sup> Louis at eleven o'clock of the forenoon, and handed over all the prisoners to the chiefs who asked them from me, to make them sing after their fashion. At one o'clock in the afternoon I demanded them back; they were brought to me, and I arrived at Montreal with the sixteen prisoners, whom I surrendered to M<sup>r</sup> de Beaujours, Governor, who detached me to proceed with them to Quebec and to deliver them to the Marquis de Beauharnois, which I did. They are in prison, in irons, since three months. We hear no more of the enemy.

NOTE.—Before this last blow, these Indians captured and killed thirty to forty persons and scalped one, who is still living, whom they left for dead at Chateauguay. His wife, who was with him, was killed at his side and scalped.

I shall not be able to have the honor to make a fuller report to his Grace this year, being too much troubled by the French and Indians. I shall begin with the subject of most interest to this country, namely, a great confusion caused by a general conspiracy of the red skins against the whites. Though manifestly known, we continue still to dissemble, and endeavor to arrange matters as well as possible. Our domiciliated Indians refuse us their assistance, not being willing to strike those who have killed us. One of the Iroquois cantons adjoining the Dutch, that on slender pretences came here to speak, met on their way home, loaded with presents, some carpenters at Ile de la Mothe,<sup>1</sup> beyond our frontiers. They were nine, who took one of our carpenters, killed one, and wounded another. Their comrades fled. The reason of this is, that our Indians of the Saut, especially, were the first to leave the Mohawks, who have established this village; as the Iroquois are most feared and respected by all the nations as well as the Hurons, they possess a great ascendancy over all the rest. The Five Nations are long since sending Belts to all the other nations as well as the Hurons, with whom they are intimately connected. At length, they have recently been wishing to raise the hatchet at Detroit, where Sieur de Longueuil commands.

The Hurons were ready to massacre all the French were it not that a Squaw, going into a garret in search of some Indian corn, overheard their conspiracy below. She went immediately to advise the Jesuit lay brother thereof, who informed M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, the commander there, of the danger. They were to sleep that night in the fort, as they often did before, and each was to kill the people of the house where he lodged.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil called together all the principal chiefs; spoke to them so as to stop them and they excused themselves the best way they could. We, too, have Indians on our side who appear much attached to us. M<sup>r</sup> d'Enyel came down with a Father; they bring news that the Sauteurs had attacked two French canoes, one of which was entirely destroyed, the men killed, and the merchandise pillaged. The other escaped by throwing the merchandise overboard, in order to be more light. M<sup>r</sup> d'Enyel was near being destroyed also by the same Indians.

This conspiracy is fomented by the English, who, by force of presents and lies, excite the Indians against us, insinuating into their minds that we are not in a condition to furnish them with any supplies; that we have no goods, as they take all our ships, and that Quebec has been already captured. This is their ordinary language, the falsehood of which they shall, please God, soon learn by the arrival of the convoys commanded by Ensign Dubuisson, of the infantry, who is well escorted; besides the conductors of the canoes, all the Indians return hence loaded with presents, which will have a good effect.

Shortly before the Detroit conspiracy, the Hurons had assassinated five Frenchmen at Sandesqué, sixty leagues from Detroit, where the Hurons plant, and frequently go to concoct plots against us with other Indians and, may be, with the English.

Of all the Indians who are going home, there are many very faithful ones who are most anxious to get back to their own country to labor, as was seen here, to reestablish peace. They belong to the River St. Joseph, and are principally the Poueatamis, who are all allied with the Miamis, Sacs, Foxes and Folle Avoine. Their first harangue was delivered with energy to convince us of their fidelity and attachment to the French, whom they would rather die with than ever abandon. The Outaouas are divided. The whole of them were to come down [but] their acquaintances stopped them; otherwise they would all have descended; they had faithfully promised M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne to do so when he visited them that winter; he was commandant at Michillimakina. Should affairs not be arranged by Father La Richarvie, ancient missionary of the Hurons, who is going to form a new establishment in that country, Canada would be to be pitied; we should be in need of great assistance from France to support ourselves here.

The French are in the midst of an immense forest, which is intersected by the great River St. Lawrence, and many others that disemogue therein. When ascending those rivers that are very rapid, 'tis necessary to go close to the shore. The enemy, lying in ambush in the woods, can easily defeat us. When they want to attack the French they descend these rivers and conceal their trail and canoes in the woods, then, marching in the rear of the settlements, they pounce on them, kill men, women and cattle of all sorts, burn the houses and barns, as we do theirs. It consequently requires a large force to preserve a country in which it can with difficulty be ascertained when and where they will strike.

Good officers are stationed at the frontier posts where we keep garrisons. As, for example, at Fort St<sup>e</sup> Frederic, the seat, at present, of the hottest of the war; it adjoins the Dutch, and is passed also on the way into the Boston government on the east, and that of Orange towards the S. W. M<sup>r</sup> de Celeron is commandant there; an officer of great capacity, who has commanded with distinction in several posts, at Michilimakina, where he preserved good order among the Indians, who are all around, and the French, making himself loved, both by the one and the other. He was sent thence to the Chicachas in 1739, and was the only officer commanding the party that went with the Canadians and Indians to that village. He came down to Quebec, was ordered next year to go to command at Michilimakina, and to make the establishment there such as the General desired; thence he went to command at Detroit. He came here; war broke out; was sent to Niagara, where he remained two years; returned to Montreal; was sent by the General to Fort St<sup>e</sup> Frederic, where he has been during the last six months. He has acquired the esteem of everybody; deserves promotion, being one of the best officers we have, and even one of the oldest Captains.

Captain de Vercher has had orders to command at the Bay. He is a worthy officer, who has often commanded in the upper posts, and has so well acquitted himself that he has been always employed by the General, whenever his services were required. It is the opinion that he could return to Michilimackinac were M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne employed elsewhere. He has managed the Indians equally well during his sojourn, and went this winter with some influential domiciliated Indians to invite the Nations down,<sup>1</sup> who were very quiet.

Captain de Noyan has also been in command at Fort Frederic. He is a man of talent, who has governed well on two different occasions; a proof of his capacity.

Sieur D'Enyelle, Jun<sup>r</sup>, commanded at Michilimackinac, M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne, the commandant at that post, having been recalled by the General for duty. Affairs were very bad when he left, and M<sup>r</sup> de Vercher was sent to prevent a more serious difficulty, which was caused by the Hurons of Detroit having stopped them up there; and since this officer's departure we are ignorant of the situation of affairs.

Sieur de Belletre, known and loved by the Indians of the River St. Joseph, accompanies them to that post; he is an Ensign of excellent conduct, who served through the Chicaches campaign, and marched to the villages under M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron, an officer of whom I could not speak too highly, as he deserves great praise. Sieur de Belletre is a brave fellow, who pleases every one that is with him. He accompanies Father de la Richardie as far as Detroit. Lieutenant de St. Pierre, of the infantry, went through the Chicaches campaign, and was sent by the [French] to the village to negotiate with the Chiefs, accompanied by our domiciliated Indians; I saw some of their chiefs<sup>2</sup> at Fort L'Assomption. The negotiation seemed prosperous and pacific, and would, to all appearance, have been permanent, had not our Iroquois broken, by a foolish act, what had been so well concluded. But on quitting the camp of L'Assomption they encountered some Chicachas men and women, who were going to their hunting grounds, and killed a number of them, which left things in their previous bad condition.

Captain Duplessy, commanding at Niagara, where he fell sick of fatigue, conjoined to bad diet, having been in want of fresh meat, as the Senecas no longer supplied him with any, has been obliged, through bad health, to ask leave to come down to recruit. He is a good officer, well sustained among that nation in a very critical time, when it was impossible to calculate on anything very settled; though they have always appeared to get along very well with the French, we doubt, at present, their fidelity. Sieur de Joncaire, who has resided so long among them, having become dangerously ill, sends us scarcely any news from thence at present; they have not come down to Montreal, and some of their people have been in the parties that made attacks on us this year.

M<sup>r</sup> de Contrecoeur, who was his Lieutenant, remains commandant of the place. He is a reliable officer, being wise, possessing a talent to command well, and to maintain good order in his fort. Of the Iroquois cantons, it is the farthest from the French. He is vigilant, and will omit nothing that can contribute to the security and preservation of his post; he may be confidently relied on.

He has good officers with him, to whom he can show a good example for the proper performance of their duty, in the execution of the orders he will have to give them. M<sup>r</sup> Péan,<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> HUGUES PÉAN was a native of Canada; his father had been Adjutant, or Town Major of Quebec, a situation to which the son succeeded, on the arrival of M. de Jonquière. His wife was young, lively, spiritual, mild and obliging, and her conversation amusing. She succeeded in obtaining a considerable influence over the Intendant, M. Bigot, who went regularly to spend his nephew, is in the post of Major at Quebec, since he went to Montreal, and has been on an expedition in our enemy's territory, where he behaved very well; he is very active and vigilant, as an officer ought to be on such business. He has been on all occasions in Acadia, where it was necessary to do the King good service, and acquired honor by the manner in which he acted.

Captain de Cabanac is at Fort Frontenac, where he has some good officers. He sees every day some Iroquois there, especially Onondagas, who, so to speak, occupy the front rank. Some of them even reside thereabouts who hunt, and supply the French with venison and game, for which they are paid in small wares, according to their custom. All the Five Nations appear quiet, and live in good understanding with the French. But being neighbors of the English, our rivals and enemies, they must be distrusted. Many of the Chiefs of that village came to see us; there is a number of them at Quebec who see a great many ships there.

The Mohawks began early in the summer to declare themselves, and to attack us; at the Cedars, the last settlement on the river going up, some fifteen (quintes) Mohawks, made an attack on as many men, women, girls and children, a portion of whom they carried away prisoners; others, who were unable to walk, they killed, and removed their scalps, which they have been as far as Orange to exhibit.

In the posts bordering on our frontier settlements we also have some small garrisons where some soldiers are stationed with their officers to maintain good order for the defence of those places. Some militia are adjoined to them, to increase the number. Lieutenant de Sablay commands at St Therèse; he is a veteran officer, considered capable of doing his duty.

Lieutenant de Rouville is at Chambly; a good officer, very vigilant and active, ever ready to do his duty exactly. Of late, there is only one officer in those small posts with a few Indians to act as scouts when they are willing to coöperate with us, for since the alliance contracted by all the Indians, they serve us so badly that they are suspected of having favored our enemies in their attack on us.

The enemy has frequently made his appearance at Chateau[guay], a small fort near the village of Sault St Louis; they have, however, killed only one woman, whose husband has been scalped, though he is not dead, notwithstanding he received several wounds as well on his head as on other parts of his body.

M. de Valterie, a brave captain and a worthy, quiet man, has had the command at Saut St Louis, with a resident officer under him. It is the largest village of our domiciliated Indians, and inhabited by Iroquois. One officer only is left in the other posts, the deputies having been withdrawn in consequence of the scarcity of officers among us. The Indians at that post had some difficulty in receiving that little garrison of twenty soldiers, owing to divers bad reasons that were alleged, into which certain secret interests entered. They live quietly there at present, only on condition that the General will withdraw that garrison so soon as peace shall be concluded; this feeling never existed before, and the majority is strongly of a contrary opinion, and [I am] very glad to see it.

his evenings with her. She became at length the channel through which the public patronage flowed. Péan in a short time saw himself worth fifty thousand crowns. Bigot, the Intendant, requiring a large supply of wheat, gave Péan the contract, and even advanced him money from the treasury with which the wheat was bought. The Intendant next issued an ordinance, fixing the price of wheat much higher than Péan purchased it. The latter delivered it to the government at the price fixed by the ordinance, whereby he realized immense profit; obtained a seigniori, and became very wealthy. Collections of Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, p. 63. He was afterwards created a Knight of St. Louis. Smith's Canada, I, 221. — Ed.

And since a very long time soldiers have constantly been there, with whom the Indians were well pleased, and [now] were any detachment ordered out, all the men would exclaim that their wives and children were abandoned; even the women join in the cry, which proves that evil councils prevail.

Lieutenant Dumui,<sup>1</sup> whose father had been appointed Governor of Mississippi, has been sent to command at the Lake of the Two Mountains. He is a prudent, wise and sedate man, and a very exact officer in all that appertains to the King's service. He has returned from there a few days ago, in consequence of indisposition with which he was attacked. He was well received by the gentlemen of St Sulpice, who superintend the Indians in the capacity of Missionaries, and on the part of all the Indians. His deputy, Sieur de Beaudicourt, a lad of discretion and mildness, and a good officer, remains there, in command, until further orders. He it is who carried the colors in the Chicachas expedition, and performed all those duties during that campaign with perfect correctness.

I can name some other good officers who have also faithfully performed and executed their duties, among whom are a number of gentlemen cadets, whom it has been more difficult to restrain than to stimulate. Of these are the three young Mess<sup>rs</sup> Bleins, grandsons of M. Raimbeau, Lieutenant-General of Montreal, who used to return only to go back, as well in winter as in summer. Such was their ardor to go in search of the enemy that they even incurred expenses, in order to muster Indians to accompany them on war excursions. When there is question of commanders for Indians, 'tis well to bear in mind that these never submit to observe any regularity on the march; that is to say, they are not commanded like the French, and ordinarily do as they please, and it takes a good deal of persuasion to induce them to march.

We must examine what sort of people these are, and the need we stand in of them. They are conversant with the forests and the paths through those vast wildernesses, and follow the trail of men, as of wild beasts; and whether in wet or dry soil, calculate on the autumn leaves, their number pretty nearly as correctly as if they saw them. Their knowledge, in this regard, surpasses all imaginable ideas; but they often abandon you when the fancy takes them, or they have got all they can. They act bravely when they please; risk much to secure the scalp of a man they have killed, which they have sometimes taken amidst a storm of musket balls, and are very adroit in surprising their enemies. They would be a great assistance to us, were they willing to serve us faithfully, and we are always in need of some of them. But with them we must always be the strongest, and be giving them [presents].

I think I have stated that they serve us badly ever since the Red skins made a treaty some years ago not to kill one another, and to let the whites act against each other, we have a certitude that they have favored the parties of our enemies who attacked us, without putting themselves to the trouble of defending us, but we do not suspect them of having struck us on those occasions up to the present time; 'tis presumed that such will be the case even among our domiciliated tribes.

The Hurons of the Upper country have, as has been seen, killed five Frenchmen at Sandosqué; the Sauteurs have defeated one French canoe and plundered the goods, and the other has escaped; the Outaouas have killed some; the Foxes at the Bay, the Scioux and the Sacs, in a word, all the nations, so to speak, have struck whenever an opportunity presented; we dissimulate, as we are unable to do anything else; their bad excuses are received as sincere and ours refuse to do the like (de le faire).

This Detroit conspiracy has proved it; efforts are making to re-plaster the matter as well as possible, in order to gain some repose. Sieur de Belletre is, as I have said, about to accompany the Rev<sup>d</sup> Father de la Richardie, who is going to Detroit. I am often guilty of repetition in collecting a few of the different facts, having no time to place them together in their true point of view. I am too much beset by different persons who think only of their own interests, and not at all of what is paramount. I hope his Grace will make allowance for my embarrassment, by procuring for me, in fine, the favor I take the liberty of soliciting, that is, my discharge agreeably to my necessities and services, and not to forget therein my wife.

The Rev<sup>d</sup> Father de la Richardie<sup>1</sup> left Montreal for Detroit on the 6th of 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1747, as I have already observed. It is to be wished that he may succeed. Things are in a bad condition in that country; their consequences may be unfortunate if we do not obtain a reinforcement of troops.

The expenses necessary to maintain trade, and which are very heavy, are not to be thought of, and those people are always craving without its being possible to satisfy them. The Rev. Father de la Richardie told me he was so infirm as to make him fear that his arrival would be very late, and that he should suffer considerably from the lateeness of the season, but that nothing had obliged him to attempt going but superior orders. Others have said, that when at Quebec he appeared to like to go, and that he goes thither only to show his importance (pour se faire valoir). He goes well equipped, in order not to lose his time, and will be sure to sweeten his troubles by the profits he will realize.

M<sup>r</sup> de Perrelle is an excellent officer; he acted as Adjutant at Rochefort and Isle de Ré. I continue to employ him, having remarked great capacity and special talent in him to discharge the duties of that office; he, moreover, is a very neat draughtsman. He has executed several designs of fortifications both in whole and in part, and has been very correct in their details.

Inclosed are the military operations performed by Lieutenant Herbin, Jun<sup>r</sup>., of the troops on the 7th of April, in the direction of the Dutch, with thirty Canadians and four Indians. They brought in four prisoners and six scalps to M<sup>r</sup> de Noyan, commandant of Fort St Frederic.

On the 22<sup>d</sup> April, with 50 Canadians and seven Indians, they took three prisoners and twenty scalps, and brought them to Montreal with a great quantity of English letters.

During the late troubles among the Upper Nations, there was imminent danger of being assassinated, not knowing the secrets of their hearts. They are, in truth, all very treacherous, without our being hardly able to distinguish the bad from the good, for, in fine, all are bad. It is very difficult to protect oneself against them. They are numerous, and are everywhere, frequently in the place where they are by no means expected, so cunning are those people.

Abstract, in form of a Journal of the most interesting occurrences in the Colony, in reference to military movements, and of the various intelligence received, since the departure of the ships in November, 1746.

1746. November. In our last letters in the fall we informed the Minister of the attack, by a party of Mohawks in the beginning of this month on Soulange, wherein 3 or 4 persons had been killed and 5 or 6 carried off. We also informed him that the second attack at Ile à la Mothe on the 12th of this month, on 15 carpenters employed in getting out some building timber, was made by 9 Indians, also Mohawks, on their return from Montreal, where they came as a deputation in the beginning of this month; in this last attack one man only was killed, three were wounded, and one taken prisoner by these Indians.

19th 100 Indians of the Acadian village who are wintering in the neighborhood of Quebec, are sent by the General under the command of Lieutenant de Villiers to Montreal to be thence distributed among the different garrisons established on our frontiers towards Fort St Frederic, and to be employed as scouts in observing the enemy, in case any movement be made in that direction.

25th The brigantine Le St Esprit, one of the vessels that was loaded with provisions for Bay Verte, has returned to Quebec, having been forced back by the ice. We reported this circumstance to the Minister by our letter to M. de la Jonquière of the 30th instant, copy whereof we have addressed him.

NOTE.—These despatches have not been sent from Beaubassin until the 7th of April, 1747, by Sieur Cheron, in consequence of the fleet having sailed when they arrived at Beaubassin.

3<sup>d</sup> December. A party of Abenakis belonging to Medoctet,<sup>1</sup> brings us in a prisoner whom they took 50 miles from Casco, a little before All Saints' day. He reports that there is considerable talk at Boston of an expedition against Canada.

At the close of this month the commandant of Fort St. Frederic sent 3 cadets and some Indians on a scout towards Fort Sarastau, to ascertain what was going on there, and whether the troops encamped at that place in the beginning of the month, were still there. They reported that there was no longer any camp, but that the fort had been enlarged by more than one-half; that the English had a large storehouse erected quite convenient to it, and that the garrison in the fort might consist of 300 men.

1747. January 13th We learn by couriers from Beaubassin that the fleet has returned to France in consequence of the sickness of the crews and the lateness of the season; that M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment, which had reached Port Royal, had retired to Beaubassin where he is awaiting orders; that the brigantine La Judith, which had been loaded with the rigging of the frigate La Marthe, was captured off Mount Louis; that the two vessels with provisions for Bay Verte have arrived there; that Sieur Lelarge, commanding a snow, had returned to Beaubassin, whence he was to sail in a few days; that M. de Saliés, commanding La Sirène, made his appearance off the East coast at the end of November, and had returned on learning that the fleet had sailed.

In the existing scarcity of salt in the Colony, the Intendant has resolved to send Sieur Perthuis, the elder, to Camouraska, where we are assured there are saline springs. He is to test them.

24th Sieur Perthuis, the elder, has returned; he brings samples of salt that he has made. It is an excellent but a feeble resource on account of the slowness and expense of the operations. Nevertheless, the Intendant issues orders for its manufacture; 'twill be always a trifling aid in case the vessels from France do not arrive in season.

The General is dispatching Captain de Lalorne, the elder, from Montreal, in company with Mess<sup>rs</sup> Dubreuil, Lalorne and Belestre, to visit all the Upper Nations and to invite them to come down next spring to Montreal, to fight the common enemy, should he make any attempt on this Colony.

30th We are sending expresses to Beaubassin. The General is determined that the detachment of Canadians, composed of about 300 men, which remained there, shall winter in that country, not only to protect the inhabitants of those parts against the English, but also in the hope that his Majesty will be at liberty to continue his designs against Acadia and succeed in executing them.

February 4th In consequence of what we have written to the Minister last fall, regarding the guards to be established next winter on the river at different points, we dispatch the man named Olivier with three others, across the woods to the Grand river, where he is to take a boat to proceed to Cape Desrosiers, as soon as the navigation will permit, with orders to observe the ships which will pass or appear off that coast, and give us notice thereof; we have handed him the extract of the news we have received, in order that he may communicate it to the captains of the King's ships, if any appear off Cape Desrosiers.

appearance, having been separated a few days before. It is supposed that this third vessel had been forced to continue her route to the islands.

24th We send back the couriers to Beaubassin; we direct M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay to adopt the best measures for the expulsion of the English from Minas, where they would not fail to form a new establishment with a view to cut off all our communication with Port Royal; that this is of so much the more consequence as we are always in hopes that his Majesty will make a new attempt on Acadia this year. We add, to dispatch a vessel to France as soon as the season will permit, to inform the Minister of his situation and of the success attendant on this expedition against the English at Minas. Uncertain of the circumstances in which M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment will be placed after the Minas expedition, and fearful that the enemy obliged him to return to Quebec by the River St John, we send to Lake Temisquata, in the interior of the country, 25 leagues from the St. Lawrence, about a hundred quintals of flour and other provisions to be forwarded at the very opening of spring to that detachment, should it have been obliged to quit Beaubassin.

March 5th After all the hostilities committed by the Mohawks on our borders around Montreal, the General did not hesitate to declare war against them, on the 8th of this month, in a council held at Montreal, which was attended by the major portion of the Iroquois of the Saut and of the Lake of the Two Mountains, who have accepted the hatchet against the Mohawks and promised to make use of it. The domiciliated Abenakis, the Nepissings, Algonquins, some Poutouatamis, Outaouas, Puans, Sacs, Illinois and Hurons, who were also present at Montreal, have done the same; all these Indians, with the exception of the domiciliated Iroquois, have gone out to fight in different parties to the number of 8 or 10, in the direction of Connecticut, Corlac and Orange. The General has detached, at the same time, M<sup>r</sup> de la Chauvinerie, interpreter of the Iroquois language, to the four other Iroquois cantons, with instructions to enable him to explain to them the motives of his late proceedings.

6th We are in receipt of intelligence from Beaubassin; we learn the details of the occurrence at Minas on the 11th of February last, which are as follows:

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay being unable to march, in consequence of a severe bruise he had received on the knee, on his journey to Minas, the detachment of Canadians, consisting of about 300 men, including French and Indians, under the command of Captain Coulon, started on snow shoes from Beaubassin on the 23d of January for Minas, to drive off the English, who had come to settle there. It arrived at Peguigt<sup>1</sup> on the 10th of February. The commander having reconnoitred the enemy's position, divided his force into 10 detachments, for the purpose of making a simultaneous attack on as many houses in which the enemy was quartered to the number of 500, instead of 250, as had been already reported. After having marched all night he found himself, at three o'clock of the morning of the 11th, in a position to commence the attack, which he did. The enemy had sentinels at each house, and kept good watch. Sieur de Coulon, shortly after the first shock, received a musket ball in his left arm, which obliged him to retire, from loss of blood. The ten houses that were attacked were all carried, with the exception of one only, which had cannon, and had been abandoned by the Micmacs, four of their men having been put hors de combat by the first fire. The command having devolved on Captain Chevalier de la Corne, he attacked and carried the house occupied by

Colonel Noble<sup>1</sup> and his brother, with M<sup>r</sup> Haw,<sup>2</sup> member of the Council at Port Royal. He remained in the house, and with a part of the detachment which rejoined him, prevented the approach of the enemy, whom he obliged to take refuge in a stone house, in which they had some cannon. The firing had been unceasing from the commencement of the attack in the morning until 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when the battle ceased. In this space of time the enemy have had 130 men, including 6 officers,<sup>3</sup> killed on the spot, 34 wounded and 53 taken prisoners. On our side, we have lost 6 men, to wit, 3 Canadians, a farmer from Port Toulouse, and two Micmacs; and had 14 wounded, including Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Coulon, and De Lusignan, a cadet. Captain How being dangerously wounded, requested M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne to send for an English surgeon to staunch his wound, the French surgeon being at the time engaged in attendance on M<sup>r</sup> de Coulon. This occasioned the sending of hostages on our part, and a suspension of hostilities until the English surgeon was sent back. It was then that two English officers came out of the houses and advanced with a French flag towards the house where Sieur Lacorne lay, who sent out to receive them. They proposed to him a cessation of hostilities until 9 o'clock the following morning. He granted them their request, but perceiving at a very early hour next day that they were leaving their houses, and collecting the cattle, he sent to notify them that if they did not return to their houses at once the armistice should terminate. M<sup>r</sup> Goldwhait,<sup>4</sup> the English Commandant, came to see Sieur de Lacorne, in company with another officer, and after having excused himself ordered all his men to retire, asked to capitulate, and submitted his terms in writing; Sieur de Lacorne agreed to a portion of these, after having taken the advice of his officers, and told M<sup>r</sup> Goldwaite to make haste with his decision, as a prompt renewal of the attack had been determined on. The capitulation was then signed, and the following is an abstract of the articles it contains:

The French detachment being formed into two lines, the English troops, to the number of 330 men, shall file off from the stone house into which they retired, within twice 24 hours, for Annapolis Royal, with the honors of war, 6 days' provisions, haversack, one pound of powder, and one pound of ball per man.

Those who have been taken shall remain prisoners of war.

The French will retain the two sea vessels they have taken.

The booty is not to be restored, as it was taken by the Indians.

The English sick and wounded in the house shall be conveyed to the River Aux Canards, and lodged by orders of the French Commander, and maintained at the King of England's expense, until in a condition to be removed to Annapolis Royal; and until they recover may retain their surgeon, and all shall be furnished with letters of protection.

His Britannic Majesty's troops actually at Grand Pré shall not be at liberty to bear arms at the head of the Bay of Fundy; that is to say at Minas, Cobequit and Beaubassin for the space of six months from the date hereof.

<sup>2</sup> EDWARD HOWE was afterwards, in 1749, one of Gov. Cornwallis' Council at Halifax. Haliburton's Nova Scotia, I, 139, 319. A Mr. Howe was killed near Beaubassin by Indians in 1750 or 1751, but whether he was the gentleman mentioned in the text we have not the means of ascertaining. Compare Collections of Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, p. 14, and Smith's History of Canada, I, 217. — Ed.

The King of England's troops thereupon marched out of their guard-houses, and the French troops took possession of them, as well as of Grand Pré, of all the provisions, warlike stores and artillery, consisting of two 4 pounders and 3 swivels.

This expedition has had a good effect on the minds of the Acadians at Minas,<sup>1</sup> who at present make no difficulty in furnishing the detachment with whatever refreshments it requires. The enemy quartered at Grand Pré on the farmers; took the tenth of their grain and cattle from them, and hoisted their flag on the church, which proceeding irritated the greatest portion of the people.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay adds, that he recalled the detachment to Beaubassin, which was the most convenient position to be guarded, and the one in which the provisions and ammunition are stored; that he sent an officer with a detachment to Chibouctou to receive the French ships that will appear in that harbor, and to inform them of what is occurring.

20th We send Sieur Aubert, a captain of a ship, to Rimousky, where he is to arm a biscayenne, to go to Cape Desrosiers at the opening of the navigation. He is the officer who is to have the command of the guard to be posted there early in the spring to watch the vessels that will pass, and to transmit and receive intelligence.

21st Ensign de Gannes, of the troops, has arrived from Fort St. Frederic. We learn that a party consisting of 30 Frenchmen and Indians, under the command of Lieutenant Herbin, had struck a blow near Fort Sarastau, killed 6 and took 4 Englishmen. The remainder, numbering 15, took to flight, and abandoned their arms; two of these four prisoners who remained behind at Fort St. Frederic, sick, have been examined there, and a third at Montreal. They report that there are 12 cannon at Fort Sarastau; 6 18's and 6 8's; that the garrison consists of about 300 men; that 5 or 600 bateaux had been built at Orange and about 100 at Sarastau, they think for Fort St. Frederic; that sickness prevailed all winter at Orange, where a great many people died; that it is still raging there and at Sarastau, where a great number have died this winter; that two pretty large vessels belonging to our fleet and pretty well loaded, have been taken and carried to New-York about two months ago; that the prisoners taken at Soulange last November by a party of Mohawks, have been conveyed to New-York where they have remained; those taken at Ile à la Mothe were carried to the same place by four Mohawk chiefs. And finally, that the 3 or 400 men who came last autumn to Sarastau were only to garrison the fort and protect it from the incursions of a large French force, of which they were apprehensive at that time.

22<sup>d</sup> We send back to Beaubassin the couriers who arrived on the 16th. We write to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay on different subjects appertaining to Acadia; we recommend him anew to dispatch a vessel early to France, if he have not already done so, to inform the Minister of the particulars of the affair at Minas, of the situation of the detachment, and generally of whatever he will be able to learn of the movements of the enemy.

Boston for Old England in the month of December, to solicit the command of the fleet destined to ascend the Canada river; that the English who were at Minas, were intending, at the time of their defeat, to march against Beaubassin for the purpose of driving therefrom our detachment, which, they understood, was still there; seizing that place and Bay Verte, where they expected to go on board the ships which were to arrive there in the spring and convey them to Quebec. These prisoners say, and the same is stated by Acadians returning from Port Royal, that two English ships on their way from Boston to Port Royal, at the close of the season, were wrecked on Menane island and Mount Desert; that of 800 men who were on board of each, only 40 escaped, who wintered on the spot; and that a vessel has been dispatched from Port Royal to Boston, which was to pick them up on the way. We presume that these troops were to join the 500 men who came to Minas to seize all the posts in Acadia, and so deprive us of all means of renewing any attempt against that Province.

April 8th We dispatch Sieur Depleine to establish, as usual, signal fires and smokes all along the South shore, from Rimouski to Quebec, to give notice in case of the approach of an enemy's fleet. We issue orders at the same time to the inhabitants along that shore, to prepare huts and parks in good season, in the rear of their lands, for the security of their families and cattle, in case the enemy should make any attempt, and as soon as the enemy's fleet will be discovered, to repair themselves to Quebec with their arms, blankets and one month's provisions.

Orders are, in like manner, issued to the Captains of St. Barnabé, Green island, Camouraska and River Ouëlle, to stop any English packet boats that might land, take the letters and send them to us, and detain said packet boats until the receipt of our answer.

13th The General sends Lieutenant de la Naudière to the south side of this government, to enrol 175 men, to be sent to Isle aux Coudres, as soon as advice shall be received of the enemy's fleet, for the purpose of properly working the five rafts which have been constructed on that island and its neighborhood. He is to search for and impress the necessary transport for that service.

21st We receive letters from Sieur de Joncaire, resident among the Senecas. He informs us that the Five Iroquois Nations have accepted the hatchet from the English; they took it (they say) only to get rid of them; that the attack on Soulange was made by a party of Mohawks, with whom was one Onondaga, and that the affair of Isle à la Mothe was the work of Mohawks who have been to Montreal last fall; that there are ten French prisoners, the proceeds, no doubt, of these two attacks; that there is a secret understanding between the Five Nations and our domiciliated Iroquois, to allow the whites to fight each other without interfering with them on either side; that the Dutch, with whom he had conversed, had assured him of the capture of a large ship belonging to M<sup>r</sup> d'Enville's fleet, whose chaplain's name was M<sup>r</sup> Le Major; that the spy sent in February by him, Sieur Joncaire, to Orange, has reported to him that the artillery destined for Fort St. Frederic, had left on the 15th of that month; that it consisted of twelve guns and 2 mortars, and that more than 200 persons have died at Orange of the fever.

21st Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel inform us of the different precautions they are adopting against surprise, and to protect the Montreal frontier. They have established guards in the different outposts, to secure our settlements from insults both of the enemy and of the Mohawks, who might be tempted to strike a blow in that direction.

27th We dispatch two well armed biscayennes with 4 months' provisions to Cape Desrozier, to reinforce the guard posted there under the command of Sieur Aubert.

We send Sieur Masse, a ship-captain, to Cape Chat, to command the guard to be posted there; we have furnished him the same as last year, with the signals the King's ships are to make, if any appear in that offing. He is to note all the vessels that will pass, and advise us of them.

27th We also dispatch Sieur Rouville, Lieutenant-General of the District of 3 Rivers, to command, as usual, the guard at St. Barnabé. He has the same signal.

We destine Sieur Cartier to command and manœuvre the fire rafts of Ile aux Coudres, The Little river, Bay St. Paul and La Gribanne,<sup>1</sup> and to float them against the enemy's ships when they enter the river. The General issues to the captains of these 4 small settlements, similar orders to those of the South shore, to stop the packet boats; also, to the inhabitants of said settlements to build huts in the rear of their lands, to secure therein their families and cattle against all hazard.

The General issues like orders to the captains of the five parishes of the Island of Orleans, explains to them the necessity of abandoning their settlements should the enemy ascend the river, in which case, and on the receipt of the first intelligence, they are to send their families and cattle, and the greatest quantities of provisions possible, to the North and South shores, according to the situation of the parishes; that 40 bateaux will then be sent them to facilitate this removal, and to intimate, moreover, to the settlers the adoption of measures beforehand for the construction of holes (caches) in the woods, to contain what they will not be able to remove.

May 4th We receive letters from Beaubassin. They contain nothing of interest.

7th A party of Abenakis, belonging to Becancourt, bring us in a prisoner<sup>2</sup> they took at Whiscasick, a village 150 miles from Boston, and 15 miles from the sea. Reports that he learned, personally, from a Captain of a merchantman at Whiscasick, that Admiral Warren was expected every day from Old England, with 18 ships of war, exclusive of transports, for the expedition against Canada; that a master of a vessel which arrived at that place has reported, that two French men of war, complete wrecks, were taken near Martinico, belonging to the French fleet that had come to Chibouctou; that he had heard that men were enlisting at Boston, and that several men of war were in that port, and that General Martin had done much damage in France.

Lieutenant Herbin arrives with three more prisoners, one of whom he took in the neighborhood of Sarastau, in a journey he made at the end of April. This prisoner reports that there are about 300 men in that fort, but many are sick; that the garrison is greatly dissatisfied, not having been paid, and being almost entirely out of provisions; that he had heard that a French ship had been taken and carried to New-York last winter; that there may be 100 bateaux at Sarastau; does not know how many there are at Orange.

<sup>2</sup> Captain JONATHAN WILLIAMSON was an emigrant from the West of England, where he was born in 1718. He was one of the earliest and most respectable settlers in Wiscasset; had already been taken prisoner in 1746, and detained in Canada six months. After his second capture he remained a prisoner until 1748, when he was exchanged, and returned home by way of Boston. Williamson's Maine, II, 245, 252. He died in 1798. Wiscasset is situated in Lincoln county, Maine, on the western branch of Sheepscot river, about twenty miles from the Island of Seguin, which lies two miles off the neck or point of land that separates the entrances into the Rivers Kennebec and Sheepscot. 1 Massachusetts Historical Collections, VII, 164, 170. — Ed.

Sieur Herbin handed us some letters written in English, which had been found in the clothes of an officer at Sarastau, who had been killed, and who commanded a small detachment that was going to Orange; some of the letters mention an expedition whereof M<sup>r</sup> Livingston, the Commandant of this Sarastau,<sup>1</sup> is awaiting the result and execution; he adds that all his soldiers are ill; that the garrison is in a miserable condition; that about 100 men only are fit for duty; that he is in want of every succor, and expresses himself in these words: Were we killed in this expedition against Canada 'twould have been an honor for us. That the fort is in the worst condition that can possibly be imagined, and that he pities the man who is to come to relieve him. In another letter this officer says, I am content, as far as I am, myself, concerned, and would be so were I at the Carrying Place, and could I be of any use. [Note. Wood Creek (Rivière du Chicot) is the only spot in the neighborhood of St Frederic known as the Carrying Place.] Another letter written to Captain Trente at Saratoga says: The old story is always afloat. [Note. This is, doubtless, the expedition against Fort St Frederic.] That the clothes for the new levies are at Orange; that a general meeting had been held there on this subject; that some propositions were not agreed to; that the articles concluded on were sent to the Governor of Boston; a certified statement at the foot of a muster roll of Captain Trente's company mentions that the soldiers composing it have been levied by that Captain for the expedition against Canada.

7th We learn by a courier just arrived from Montreal that in the last days of April a party of Mohawks and English had fallen on 21 French scouts near Fort St Frederic, and killed and scalped five of them; Sieur Laplante, an officer, had been very badly treated on that occasion, having received 7 gun shot wounds. This unfortunate occurrence was the result of too much confidence on the part of the French, who have been surprised.

11th The Deputies from Sault St Louis have returned; we have satisfied their demands respecting the stone inclosure they formerly requested for their village. A garrison, composed of an officer and four soldiers, has been stationed there.

Our uncertainty respecting the enemy's designs against this country, whether by land or by sea, the extraordinary consumption of provisions daily occurring in the Colony by the domiciliated and foreign Indians, who have wintered in the neighborhood of Quebec, for whose support provision has to be made, the hope which we always entertain of the possible arrival of ships at Chibouctou, this year, to execute operations already projected, to which fleet it will be necessary to send supplies of provisions; the necessity of providing for the subsistence of the Canadian detachment at Beaubassin; all these considerations have determined M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart to purchase all the vegetables and wheat that come down from Montreal to Quebec, belonging to the merchants who trade in these articles; he has the wheat manufactured into flour, so as to be prepared for every event; the merchants of Quebec, on the other hand, are notified that absolutely no provisions will be exported this year for the islands.

12th We send a small vessel to Mount Lewis, 80 leagues from Quebec, to take on board 30 minots of salt which were left there last fall by a citizen of Quebec. The Colony is in absolute want of this article, and we have, as yet, no news of any vessel in the river from France bringing us a supply of it.

14th We learn that M<sup>r</sup> de Niverville, an officer who left two months ago with a party of French and Indians, consisting of about 60 men, has returned to Montreal. He brings no prisoner, his party has only a few scalps, but he has committed great depredations in the enemy's country, and this is what occurred on his march :

He proceeded, first to attack a fort on the height of land opposite the mountain called by the Indians Oquari.<sup>1</sup> He fought there during 4 days, at the end of which the fort<sup>2</sup> asked to capitulate ; the Lieutenant<sup>3</sup> came out, and Sieur de Niverville granted him quarter for all his people who would be prisoners of war ; whilst this Lieutenant was conveying the answer to the fort, our Indians becoming impatient, fired some shots on the other side of the fort, which prevented the English surrendering ; Sieur de Niverville has been obliged to retire with his force and to try his luck elsewhere beyond Dearfields, and below the White river ;<sup>4</sup> and after having gone past several abandoned forts and hamlets, as far as a sort of village, situated near a fort, where, in like manner, there was not any person, but, which doubtless served as a place of refuge for the inhabitants in case of alarm, he ambushed his men in that place in the hope of striking a blow, and for fear of creating the least alarm, arranged with his Indians not to fire unless the enemy were more than 8 or 10 ; if less, they were to be attacked, tomahawk in hand, so as to take them alive ; finally, two of the enemy made their appearance, but the young Indians, in emulation, one of the other, fired 30 shots at them, and alarmed the whole country ; they were obliged to be satisfied with these two scalps, and to think of a retreat ; on their return they burnt within 30 or 40 leagues, 5 small forts that were abandoned, 3 meeting-houses, about 100 dwellings, mostly of two stories, furnished even to chests of drawers, the decorations of which the Indians carried off ; several fine barns, and killed 5 @ 600 sheep and hogs, and about 30 horned cattle. This devastation is well worth a few prisoners or scalps.

16th We learn that Sieur de la Chauvinerie, Iroquois interpreter, whom the General had sent as a deputy to four of the Five Nations, returned to Montreal on the 13th instant, with 12 or 15 Onondagas, exclusive of the women and children the Chiefs of that Nation gave him to convey back to Montreal in safety, whilst all the Chiefs of all the villages have assembled to come down forthwith. This officer gives assurances of the perfect neutrality of the Onondagas, Senecas, Tescarorins, Cayugas and Oneidas ; that they are all very well disposed towards us ; that they are at variance with the Mohawks, the English and the Dutch ; more than that, they have not had any correspondence with them since the council was held last fall at Orange. The interpreter of the Dutch followed them into the villages, to induce them to make use of the hatchet they had accepted. The Iroquois would not listen to him ; they took the War Belt they had received in the council, and broke it under a large stone, and wholly rejected it. The interpreter has returned home. Such is the account the Indians have given to Sieur la Chauvinerie. Six Onondagas set out this spring for a meeting appointed at Orange, by the council of the Fall, but the Mohawks and English stopped them at a new settlement,<sup>1</sup> before coming to the Mohawk village, and told them they should speak henceforward only at that place, and not go to Orange. The Onondagas returned home. Some Indians of that nation told Sieur la Chauvinerie that a great many people had died at Orange, Corlac, and even among the Mohawks. (There is reason to believe that they are unwilling to let the 5 Nations see the bad state of their affairs.) The Governor of Philadelphia has offered considerable presents to the Flat Heads to take up the hatchet. The Chief of that tribe, who is Sovereign, laughed at him.

<sup>2</sup> Called, at this time, "Number 4." In 1786 a committee of the General Court of Massachusetts recommended the laying out a range of townships between the Merrimack and the Connecticut, and on each side of the last mentioned river. These townships were numbered 1 to 9. Of these, "Number 4" was afterwards called Charlestown, in honor of Admiral Sir Charles Knowles. Collections of the New Hampshire Historical Society, IV., 102, 103, 113.

<sup>3</sup> Captain PHINIAS STEVENS, of Charlestown, New Hampshire, was a native of Sudbury, Massachusetts (whence his father moved to Rutland, New Hampshire), and at the age of 16 was carried off by the Indians to Canada ; he volunteered to join the projected expedition against Canada in 1746 ; was afterwards ordered to the frontiers and employed either at Fort Massachusetts or at "Number 4," and at the latter post made the gallant defence in the latter end of March, 1747, against Niverville, whom the New England authorities persist in calling Debeliné. Belknap's New Hampshire, III., 192 ; Dwight's Travels, II., 90 ; New Hampshire Historical Collections, I., 184 ; IV., 109. For his bravery on this occasion he was presented with a valuable sword by Commodore Knowles, and continued in the command of the fort until 1750. In 1749 he was sent to Canada with letters from Governor Shirley, and has left a journal of his visit, which is printed in New Hampshire Historical Collections, V., 199. On the incorporation of the town of Charlestown, in 1750, he was elected one of the selectmen, and died in 1756, in the service of his country.—Eo.

M<sup>r</sup> de la Chauvinerie also reports that the 5 Nations have offered all possible insults to the people of Orange, pending the Council in the Fall; they killed their oxen, cows, horses at their doors, within the town, and threw ashes on the members of the Council.

The Onondagas stated, on arriving at Montreal, that they had been detached from their village to conduct Sieur de la Chauvinerie in safety, but only were preceding the Chiefs of the 5 Nations, who were assembled for the purpose of coming down, and that they would all come to offer their bodies to, and run the same risks as, their Father.

19th We dispatch expresses to Beaubassin. We write to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay not to quit Acadia, unless forced, or so ordered by the Commander, who will be sent from France, or by those whom the General will send him. We continue to communicate to him news from our parts.

May 20th A courier from Montreal is arrived. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel write us that two Mohegan squaws, who have been taken at Corlac, by a party of 22 Iroquois of the Saut, report that the English have abandoned all their small forts, and withdrawn all the families into the town, or large villages, with a view to collect all the men at Orange, in the design of coming to attempt an attack on Fort St. Frederic; that all these people are collected from Orange as far as the Fort of the Half moon, which is midway from Sarastau; that the Commander of this army was to set out on his march from Orange six days after that on which these squaws were taken.

These two women also assure, that this body of troops is led by Mohawks and other Indians, who were told by the Commandant not to fatigue themselves on this campaign, as he should confine his operations to Fort St. Frederic, which he would take with less trouble than he did Cape Breton; that he should form a considerable settlement there, so as to be able to come to Canada next year.

We learn, likewise, that a party of Mohawks, consisting of 7 men, have just made an attack a league and a half from the Fort at Chateaugué, on a house occupied by a man named Brindamour, his wife and child; the last escaped by throwing itself from the top to the bottom of the hill, and went to alarm the fort; during this time the woman was killed and scalped; the man, after having warded off seven musket shots, finally fell by the sword and the tomahawk; the Indians abandoned him after having removed his scalp; this man was brought to the hospital at Montreal; it is hoped he will recover from his wounds. (Note. This man has providentially been cured.) A detachment was sent from Chateaugué fort in pursuit of these Mohawks. We are also informed that another party, consisting of 13 or 14 Mohawks, has been

21st From all that we have already learned of the enemy's movements in the direction of New England, conjoined to the report of Sieur de Niverville, who found the forts and houses he passed, deserted, we are to presume that the enemy are really making preparations to attack Fort St. Frederic. The Onondagas, who have come down to Montreal, have again said on this occasion, that the Mohawks and Dutch object to their passing the line they had drawn above Corlac, and to their coming to Orange. It is to be hence concluded, that the enemy do not give the Onondagas any credit for favorable dispositions towards them; they were unwilling to give them any cognizance of the preparations making there, and notwithstanding all this, the Onondagas constantly assert that they intend to come here next year. It appears, besides, from M<sup>r</sup> Livingston's letter, whereof mention has already been made, that the enemy propose coming by the Wood creek carrying place. That creek was incumbered last August by the detachment under the command of M. de Rigaud, but it is not sufficiently obstructed to stop the enemy a long while, and to afford us time enough to oppose their designs. Under these circumstances we considered it indispensable to adopt the most effectual measures to reinforce Fort St. Frederic, in case of its being attacked, as is probable; or to ravage the New England settlements, in case the enemy do not make any movement in that direction. The General issues his orders in consequence, for the levying at Montreal of 5 or 600 men, and even more, if possible, and for trying to unite to them the Upper country Indians now at Montreal. He sends orders, in addition, to Three Rivers for the levy of 100 militia and 30 to 40 Indians of the two villages; and to equip, forthwith, this detachment, to which is conjoined 30 or 40 Indians belonging to the River St. John and Acadia, who have wintered in the neighborhood of Quebec. The General could not make up his mind to detach any settlers from the government of Quebec, being apprehensive that the first news will inform him of a meditated attack on Quebec by sea. The Marquis de Beauharnois has appointed M. de Rigaud, town Major of Three Rivers, to command the detachment. He has orders to repair direct to Fort St. Frederic to oppose any attempts the enemy may make on that Fort, and in case he ascertain for a certainty, by scouts he will send out, that the English are not making any movement of that nature, he is to direct his march towards New England and against such place as will appear most advantageous to him, particularly against Corlac, or even against the village of the Mohawks, exposing his men, however, as little as possible.

21st The most of the voyageurs destined for the (Indian) posts are actually arrived at Montreal and ready to start. We have great reluctance to interpose to the Upper country trade any obstacles whereby the Colony would be deprived of a considerable commerce. But this profit does not enter into any comparison with the preservation of the country, for in saving the Colony we save all; therefore, we shall not hesitate to issue orders at Montreal to employ in M. de Rigaud's detachment these voyageurs, or at least such of them as have deferred their departure; except, only, we add, the canoes of the West sea,<sup>1</sup> of the Ouyatonons and of the Miamis.

24th A party of Indians belonging to Pannaouamské brings us an Englishman who was taken prisoner near Fort St. George 17 days ago; he is 64 years of age, and by trade a shoemaker. They had no news from Boston at that fort since last fall.

Evening of the 28th. Sieur Lagroix, taken on the 24th of July, 1745, in a King's schooner, at the mouth of the Little Brador, returned with 5 other Frenchmen who were sent back from Boston to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, in exchange for M<sup>r</sup> How, who was taken prisoner at Minas and sent home on his parole.

Sieur Lagroix left Boston on the 8th of April, with a pass from Mr. Shirley; he reports that the English had made preparations and collected provisions last July and August for an expedition against Canada, as they gave out; even the people of his suite have been employed in packing biscuit into dry casks. They then merely mustered 6 or 700 men from the country; since winter, he has not heard when this expedition was to take place. Sieur Lagroix has counted 50 to 60 vessels, bateaux, schooners, snows, &c., in Boston harbor. The English do not deny that a great number of them have been taken by the privateers of Martinico and those of France.

Evening of the 28th. Goods are exorbitantly dear at Boston; the pound of bread is worth 3 shillings, which is equal to 12 sous of our money, and meat is one shilling dearer than bread. Paper money is so common and so discredited there, that Lagroix assures us when he was first put in prison, he changed a dollar for 25 shillings, and at his departure he got 50 shillings for them.

The English sent this spring some people to Louisbourg to replace those that died. These were so numerous that the first cemetery at the Maurepas gate was full, and they were carrying their dead to the White Point.<sup>1</sup>

Mutiny and disorder had prevailed at Louisbourg; the soldiers are dissatisfied with the Governor; the English say that the conquest of Ile Royal is fatal to them, ruinous to their people and provisions.

That the battle at Minas created great sensation at Boston; the English have put it in their gazettes; they were about to levy 2000 men to destroy or drive off the Canadians at Beaubassin, and to revenge the death of Colonel Noble, who has been sincerely regretted.

Sieur Lagroix says that the English did intend, in the very beginning of this winter, to attack Fort St. Frederic; they have sent a vessel from Boston to New-York freighted with artillery, bombs, snow-shoes and other stores; if there be any expedition, 'tis his opinion that it will be against that fort.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> Shirley and Waren conversed in Lagroix's presence about the Canada expedition; the places where they could winter their ships; spoke of Tadoussac Cove, St. Patrick's Hole; that they would post themselves on the Island of Orleans, to prevent any succor being received from France; that they would land at St. Joachim and lay waste the country as far as Quebec, and that they were aware we had fire rafts. They say, on this occasion, they would leave their large ships at Bic, and would send up schooners, bateaux and other small craft by the south.

Evening of the 28th. Sieur Lagroix handed to the General a letter M<sup>r</sup> Shirley wrote him, dated the 18th of March, O. S., in which he proposes, among other things, a cartel for a general exchange of prisoners.

Sieur Lagroix hands us two letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, the first dated the 12th of April, wherein that commander informs us that he is in receipt of news from Chiboutou of the 28th of March; that only one English vessel had made her appearance at that place; that she had fired on 4 Acadians who had abandoned a pirogue, which the English subsequently carried off. On the 28th of March, 2 large ships were seen sailing in the direction of Ile Royal; he adds, that the vessel he designed for France, sailed on the 7th of that month of April, by which opportunity he had transmitted a report of every occurrence in Acadia, since the preceding autumn. Sieur de Ramezay informs us in his second letter, dated the 1st instant, that the English had come on the 12th of April to Minas with a 24 gun brig, commanded by M<sup>r</sup> Rowsse,<sup>1</sup> and two armed schooners and 300 men. After being assured by the Acadians that there were no more Canadians in that place, they landed to the number of 150, posted themselves in the stone house which they formerly occupied, hoisted their flag for an hour only, told the settlers that they re-took Grand Pré by force of arms. The enemy retired after a sojourn of four days, without landing anywhere else. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay transmits us a return of the provisions remaining at Beaubassin for the subsistence of the detachment and Indians at that place; he estimates having enough at most for one month; adds, that he is obliged to feed a number of strangers from the Island of St. John and elsewhere, who have abandoned their settlements; that if he do not receive supplies of provisions in the course of this month, he will be forced to conclude on returning. This last circumstance has greatly surprised us; we have always calculated according to the different quantities of provisions that reached Beaubassin last fall, that the detachment had, at least, one year's supply. In truth, the other settlers from the environs have augmented the consumption. Sieur Lebé, the Intendant's deputy, writes to him, in the month of March, that a great deal of provisions had to be in store, inasmuch as they had to be sold to all those who applied, in payment of the King's notes which were scattered throughout Acadia.

Evening of the 25th. He again informs him, on the 1st instant, that the consumption of provisions is considerable in consequence of the number of strangers, exceeding 600, whom they were obliged to assist, so not to be left to perish of hunger; that, notwithstanding this great outlay, the resolution that had been formerly taken to return, within a short time, to Canada, had caused the destruction of a large quantity of provisions and effects; that he was, at present, entirely out of everything. We fear that M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay will be obliged to resolve on returning. However, we hope by the measures that officer will have adopted for economizing the provisions, that he will be able to wait for those we are to send him, and for the transmission of which M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart is about to make immediate arrangements.

29th Arrived, the schooner L'Aimable Marthe, Captain Simonin, which sailed from Martinico the 15th of April. This Captain gave the letters intrusted to his care to Sieur Aubert at Cape Desrozier, who has dispatched a canoe to bring them to us. Sieur Simonin has informed us that the three vessels loaded with provisions for the King's account, which sailed from Quebec last fall for Chibouctou, had arrived at Martinico; that a ship had arrived 3 days before he left, with news that peace had been concluded between the King of France and the Queen of Hungary. Sieur Simonin has handed over to us 4 prisoners belonging to a prize he took on his voyage.

The 200 men, levied by M<sup>r</sup> de Beaucourt for Fort St. Frederic to be employed on scouting parties which are indispensable under existing circumstances, are to set out on the 25th under the command of Chevalier de La Corne, who is to return immediately on the arrival of that detachment at the fort.

Another levy is being made for M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud's detachment, in the equipment of which every diligence is used.

The Mohawks have recently made another attack at the Buisson, 9 leagues from Montreal, where they have seized and carried off 3 men, viz<sup>t</sup>, one Delisle, his son, and the last surviving son of the man named Montreuil, previously taken at Soulange; some Nepissings and Iroquois of the Lake have gone in pursuit of them, but in vain.

The Mohawks struck another blow at the same time at the Little Rapid, a league below Chambly, where they have killed a child, and taken 2 men, 2 women and 4 children. Lieutenant de Vassant, commanding a guard at St. Thérèse, immediately sent a detachment to the River Aux Sables,<sup>1</sup> to intersect the passage of the enemy; but it returned without having discovered any trail; this led to the suspicion that the enemy are encamped above Chateaugué. M<sup>r</sup> de Beaucourt, in consequence, detached Lieutenant St. Pierre, with 80 voyageurs and citizens by the Cascades to Lake St. Francis, so as to surprise them, and return by Chateaugué. Eight Abenakis of Missiskouy, have followed this officer; word has been sent to those of the Lake to go and meet him at the Cedars; it was not thought proper to invite the Iroquois of the Saut, as 'twas feared at Montreal that they are treacherous, and favor the Mohawks in their incursions on our settlements; they are even suspected of giving the enemy notice when we are in pursuit of them, by firing three shots when the detachments are approaching their camp. On this subject well studied messages have been sent to them, which they have respectfully received, and have come to Montreal to answer, in a Council held on the 25th, when they gave very lame excuses, and presented a War Belt, in the name of the entire village, in presence of some Onondagas, to affirm their intention of going to attack the Mohawks; promising to behave better in future. They were told, in reply, that their promise was considered sincere, but constant and palpable proofs were necessary to confirm it, and to this end several joined M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre's detachment.

Those gentlemen inform us that the government of Montreal is wholly stripped of people, by the different considerable levies necessary to be made, as well for the guards on the frontier posts, and for the detachments sent to Fort St. Frederic, as for the convoy of the canoes of the hundred (du cent), which employ a great many men. Wherefore they request us to send to Montreal 300 men, from the government of Quebec, to garrison the posts and guard houses. This will enable them to furnish M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud with a larger detachment, by adding to it the militia in the different posts.

The merchants of Montreal are very reasonable on the subject of the postponement of the departure of their canoes for the Upper country. None of them expect to get away before we receive some favorable news. The majority of the voyageurs destined for these canoes are daily employed in the different detachments sent out in pursuit of the Mohawks.

The Onondaga deputies have, of their own accord, requested to come down to Quebec, which renders it probable that they do not entertain any evil intentions. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel have induced them to send a portion of their people back to the village, so that their brethren may not be uneasy, and to advise them that the deputies have been well received. These Indians have agreed to the proposition, and promise to tell the Mohawks to stay the fury of their people; this cannot fail to have a good effect.

We learn, by the same channel that the canoes of the Hundred (du cent) heretofore sent to Fort Frontenac, with provisions and goods, had safely reached there, and were about arriving at Montreal.

We also learn, through another channel, that the late attacks of the Indians at the Buisson and the Little Rapid, had caused a number of people of the River Chamblé to abandon their settlements, and to remove their families to the North shore, where they feel more secure. Should these Indian incursions continue they will seriously injure the southern settlements, in the government of Montreal, but we hope that the frequent parties, sent in pursuit of the Indians, will eventually relieve us of their troublesome importunities.

29th We send back the courier to Montreal to notify Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel that the General is issuing his orders for the levy of the 300 men they require, and that these will be soon sent them.

31st Another courier arrives from Montreal. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel inform us on the 28th that by intelligence received from the Upper country posts, they learn that the 5 Nations are behaving well at Forts Frontenac and Niagara, and that the Senecas have also assured M. du Plessis, the Commander at this last post, that they would not intermeddle in the affairs of the Mohawks, even were these to demand aid. So much the worse for them, say they, if they get into trouble with our Father; that officer was expecting the Chief of that Nation.

We learn by the same occasion, that a farmer named Desloge, who lived at Ile Perraut, within two leagues and a half or three leagues of the fort, has been carried off by the Mohawks, with his wife and seven children, without any person being aware of it; his son who settled within half a league of his farm, was to see him on the previous Monday, the 22<sup>d</sup>. No news has been heard of him since, and the neighbors discovered only on the 27th that the house had been rifled, and that no person was in it.

Great activity prevails at Montreal in fitting out M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud's detachment, which is composed of 400 Canadians recently levied there, of the 200 who have already started for Fort St. Frederic, and of the 100 others levied at 3 Rivers, exclusive of all the Indians, those sent from Quebec, domiciliated Abenakis and Iroquois, &c., making, in all, eleven to twelve hundred men.

June 1st The Onondaga Indians came down to Quebec to-day, only 9 in number, the other 20 having been sent back to their village in consequence of what they had projected; we shall detain the latter as long as possible, until we see what course things will take among the other nations. We will treat them well, and have some festivities occasionally prepared for their amusement.

3<sup>d</sup> The express entrusted with the letters from Martinico has arrived at last; there is nothing of interest in those letters, but we have received several New England Gazettes, which this captain has intercepted in the prize he has taken. Some of them make mention of English expeditions in Europe, attended, apparently, by no very great success; others treat of different objects. The following are of the most interest:

There are two paragraphs from Louisbourg. One states that Governor Knowles<sup>1</sup> had a stroke of paralysis, and was seriously ill; another, that he has recovered and was about to leave for England immediately. This is all the papers contain respecting Louisbourg.

A number of persons, including several lords and others, accused of high treason, have been executed in England on account of the Scotch rebellion.

The affair at Minas last February is related at length in the Gazette of the 16th of March, but they admit only 70 men killed and 60 taken prisoners, and add, that on our side we have had 20 men killed and as many wounded. The English regard this expedition as the most daring that could be made.<sup>1</sup>

An article dated New-York, 3rd February, says: We learn that the brave Commodore Lee has returned from Antigua without once approaching the fleet convoyed by Le Magnanime. It was currently reported that he had received 5 ₤ cent from the French for allowing it to pass; it is to be hoped that this general will receive, on his return to England, the reward he merits.<sup>2</sup>

Another extract, of which the following is the tenor, has appeared to us of more interest:

New-York, 16th of February. Captain Witer, who arrived from Carraccas on Thursday last, touched at Turks' island, and took on board the effects taken out of a French transport destined for Canada, which was captured by the Castor, Pollux and Triton, privateers. These articles consisted of cordage, muskets, swords, soldiers' clothing, shoes, hats, camp-kettles, church bells, soap, oil, and divers other effects.

This news is confirmed in a Pennsylvania Gazette of the 12th of March.

Article, dated Philadelphia, 10th of March.

We learn from New-York that one of the ships captured by the Triton and Pollux, privateers fitted out at New-York, whereof we have already made mention, had arrived at that port on Thursday last.

NOTE.—From the place where the vessel in question was captured and the nature of its cargo, we doubt not but it was Le fort Louis.

The same express from Cape Desrosier hands us a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Aubert, who is on the lookout at the said place; he reached his post on the 27th of April, and found Sieur Barré there, who had organized a guard, pursuant to the orders we had already given him. Sieur Aubert sends us copy of his journal, which contains the declaration of one Jean Chicouanne, a resident of Point St. Peter, Malbay, who has reported that on doubling the (Island of) Forillon on the 24th of November, on his voyage from Quebec last fall, and when Gaspé bay had just opened to his view, he perceived a vessel in said bay, bearing N. N. W. from him; the wind N. E., and, according to the account given him by one Arbour, a resident of that bay, that vessel had been two days tacking in said bay, her white flag hoisted, and when near shore occasionally firing a gun, and that she anchored every night at the Barachois,<sup>3</sup> St. John. Said Chicouanne has added that this ship might be about 250 @ 300 tons, but he had not seen her close enough to distinguish the number of guns she might have; asserts she was deeply loaded or well down (bien ras), to all appearance; that the wind always continuing north or northeast, a great deal of ice along the shore, nobody having gone on board this vessel, she determined to sail on the 3rd of December; fired one gun, hoisted a white flag and shoved out her broadside, the wind being north, the Cape wearing southeast, and disappeared. This ship must have been an English privateer.

This same Chicouanne has again reported that being hunting at Point St Peter on the 29th of April last, he remained there more than three hours examining the manœuvres of a three-masted, but apparently small, vessel that he had discovered. She steered towards (portrait son bord dans) Gaspé bay, the wind being northeast, the cape north-northwest. He kept her in sight as far as the other side of Whale head, which is inside Point St Peter,<sup>1</sup> where she tacked, the cape bearing E. S. E., and disappeared. This must be an English ship.

3<sup>d</sup> We receive letters from Montreal. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel inform us on the first instant that M. de St. Pierre's journey has been fruitless in consequence of a bad move of the Iroquois of the Saut. This officer had discovered a settlement formed by people of the Saut at the mouth of the River St. Louis, at the head of Lake St. Francis, the place where the Mohawks pass when they are coming to attack our settlements, which has created the suspicion that these same Indians might favor the Mohawks. What more surprised them was, that some of the Saut Indians who accompanied M. de St. Pierre endeavored to take the lead when they supposed themselves near the Mohawks, and were so bold as to fire the three shots again as a signal, which have been repeated whenever these Indians have been pursued. These gentlemen have sent some messages, expressive of their displeasure, to the people of the Saut who received them with much attention and have promised to behave better in future. M. de St. Pierre has brought back with him the Indians who had settled at Lake St. Francis, and had broken several bark and elm canoes there which had been constructed by Mohawks.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel add, that M. de Muy, commanding at la Prairie, informs them that two couriers are arrived from a party of Saut and Lake Indians, who have had one man killed and one wounded. These two messengers report that the party had struck a blow in the vicinity of Corlac, where they have taken one prisoner, who states that Toyennoguen, the Mohawk chief who deceived us last year, had set out with seventy braves to make an attack on the settlements around Montreal.

5th The three hundred Canadians levied in the district of Quebec, have sailed this day for Montreal, where they are to serve, either in the frontier garrisons or as scouts, or otherwise.

We receive a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Tonnancourt, dated the 4th of this month, wherein he informs us that the Indians of St. Francis had just arrived to the number of eighty warriors; that they are like lions; that they all demand to be equipped so as to avenge the blows the Mohawks have struck both on us and on them; that M. Begon has done all in his power to oblige them to guard their village, but they had answered that they had left forty warriors there, who sufficed to protect it; that they were desirous to take advantage of the fine season to drive off these insolent Mohawks, the most treacherous of all the nations, whose friends the Indians of the Saut Saint Louis, had better be careful, otherwise they should not spare them.

We dispatch expresses for Beaubassin, to advise Mons<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay of the approaching departure of the vessel that M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart is loading with provisions and ammunition for his detachment. We advise him that we hope he will have stretched the provisions until the arrival of the vessel now in course of dispatch; also, that we have been informed of the necessities of the detachment too late to provide assistance for them as promptly as was desirable.

6th Messengers arrive from Beaubassin. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay writes us on the 12th of May. He informs us that he has just received news from Louisbourg of the 25th of December only; that sickness was prevailing there and carried off 6 @ 7 persons a day; that only one bomb-ketch had wintered there; that he was also in receipt of news from Chibouctou, in which port only two English vessels had made their appearance, but did not land. We continue to have scouts and pilots there; that he has just been informed that four deserters from Port Royal had set out for Minas, who, having lost their way through fear of being pursued, three were forced by hunger to return; the fourth, who is a sergeant, arrived very ill at Minas. (He intended to send for him.) He learns, at the same time, that the sickness has penetrated the fort, where great numbers are dying.

This officer adds, that M<sup>r</sup> Coulon suffers considerably from his arm, which utterly incapacitates him from rendering any assistance when occasion requires; he, therefore, requests the General to send him an officer to replace M<sup>r</sup> Coulon. He has not one month's provisions in store; there is, however, a good deal of rice and peas, with which he has just assisted one hundred families of the Island of St. John, thirty of whom have come to represent their wretchedness to him. The detachment is in want of everything, particularly of shirts, stockings and shoes.

Contrary winds have retarded until to-day the departure out of port of the schooner L'Angelique, Captain Gosselin, of sixty tons burthen, which we send to Bay Verte, with provisions, munitions and goods for the detachment. She sailed with a good breeze from the southwest, and we hope will have a quick passage. The Captain is to take good care to arrive at Bay Verte; he has orders to touch at one of the ports on the southwest point of the Island of St. John, whence he is to send a scout to Cape Tourmentin, to ascertain whether there be any danger in entering the bay. M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay is advised of all by the couriers whom we sent him on the 5th instant.

11th A. M. Messengers have arrived from Beaubassin. We are in receipt of M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's despatches dated the 28th ultimo. He informs us that an English craft, carrying eight guns and as many swivels, came to the head of Beaubassin bay; that he kept his people on the defensive during two days, but no persons came on shore; that since the 22nd of May, the detachment has no more provisions than will suffice to return, in case he be forced to leave precipitately. The Commandant has, consequently, been obliged to notify the settlers of Beaubassin, that he was about to go back, unless they adopted measures to furnish him with necessaries for the subsistence of his troops; whereupon they made some efforts and gave a supply of bread for fifteen days, and a little more meat, on which provisions the detachment was then subsisting in the hope of the arrival of succors from Quebec, before the consumption of those supplies.

Three settlers, whom he had sent express to learn news from Louisbourg, arrived at Beaubassin on the twenty-second of May. They have been at St. Esprit,<sup>1</sup> whence they sent three men to Louisbourg, who, on returning, assured them that there were, in that port, only one bomb-ketch, three schooners and two bateaux, which had recently arrived from Boston, where, it continues to be reported, a great famine prevails; that the English had lost about 500 men at Louisbourg between the fall and Christmas; since which time, however, sickness has pretty well ceased; that the garrison consists of about two thousand men; that the English publicly report at Ile Royale that they will come this year to Canada, and will force the Acadians on board their ships. They appear dissatisfied with the latter, whom they accuse of having taken up arms against them in the battle of Minas.

There was nothing new at Chibouctou, on the 18th May, except two small English vessels which go out in the morning and come back at night, without landing.

Intelligence has been received that three vessels had appeared on the 24th of said month within six leagues of Bay Verte, in the direction of Port Lajoie.<sup>1</sup> M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay sent a detachment of Frenchmen on the scout. On being informed in the evening that these vessels had entered the bay, he sent off a second detachment, composed of all the Indians, who would have been in time to receive them had not these privateers, not knowing that our vessels lay hid in a little river, retired in the course of the night towards Tamigouche. They have not been seen since. He learns from M<sup>r</sup> De Senclave,<sup>2</sup> the missionary priest at Port Royal, who wrote him on the 6th and 17th of May, that news had recently been received from Boston to the effect that a vessel, arrived at that port, had reported that Admiral Waren had sailed from London with fifteen vessels of war for the Canada expedition, which was placed under his direction; that he is expected to bring orders from the Court of London for that expedition; that it is the opinion at Port Royal that forces will be sent from Boston to Minas and Beaubassin; that 'tis thought, however, that no movement will be made in this matter until after this Admiral's arrival; that news had been received at Boston of the return to France of seven men of war and several transports belonging to the Duke d'Enville's fleet; that the English captured L'Ardent, Le Mercure and Le Mars, belonging to that fleet. It appears from this same letter, that the vessel which had arrived at Beaubassin came from Boston without touching at Port Royal, where it afterwards entered. This circumstance leads M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay to suppose that this vessel had come to see whether the detachment of Canadians was still at Beaubassin so as to bring a superior force there and execute their original design against the inhabitants. This Commandant adds, that he is under the necessity of giving us notice that should he not receive news from France or further orders from the General before the beginning of June, he will be under the necessity of immediately setting out for Canada, which he will be able to defer until the 6th of said month, when it will be no longer in his power to remain for want of provisions; in which case he proposes to leave an officer at Beaubassin with thirty men and some Indians to block up all the roads and deprive the enemy of the knowledge of his departure.

13th The General sends Captain de Fouville to Beaubassin to replace M<sup>r</sup> de Coulon, whom M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay is to send back; he adjoins Lieutenant de St. Vincent to him. We reply, by this opportunity, to M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's letters of the 25th ultimo. We always expect that this Commandant will have found some assistance at Beaubassin to enable him to wait for the relief we have sent him by the schooner which sailed on the 9th instant.

14th A party consisting of 14 Pannaouamské Abenakis have arrived, who struck a blow in the vicinity of Fort Saint Georges on fifteen Englishmen, twelve of whom they killed, captured two, whom they have brought to us; the fifteenth escaped.<sup>3</sup> These two prisoners do not know anything new.

<sup>2</sup> Reverend JEAN BTE. DESENCAYES belonged, originally, to the diocese of Limoges, in France. He is represented as having come to Canada in 1728. Liste Chronologique, No. 506. He was parish priest of Port Royal as late as 1753 (Collections of Literary and Historical Society, Quebec, 1838, p. 32), soon after which date he returned to France, worn out by age and labor. Rev. Mr. Tuschereau's MS. Notes on the Missions in Acadia.

<sup>3</sup> A large company of about 100 (Indians) next made their appearance in the territory of Sagadahock, and on the 26th May commenced a furious attack on the fort and people of Pemaquid. Five soldiers of the garrison and five recruits belonging to Purpoodeuck were killed, and three others, who were inhabitants of Falmouth, were taken prisoners, Lovel and a lad only escaping. Williamson's Maine, II., 252.—Ed.

18th Captain Vitré, of the St. Jaques, arrived from Bay Verte with seven militiamen, of whom two or three are sick, and eleven prisoners who were taken in the affair at Minas.<sup>1</sup>

19th Sieur Beaujeu de Villemonde arrives from Beaubassin; he delivers us a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, who writes us on the sixteenth instant, that he is at Rimousky with his entire detachment of Canadians and prisoners; that he left Bay Verte on the 5th, being unable to remain any longer without exposing his detachment to the danger of perishing of hunger, some of whom even are very sick.

We learn at the same time that Sieur de la Fontaine, who is returned from his post at the North, had seen off Manicouagan a Snow from Bourdeaux, Captain Ducasse, which had sailed on the 20th March, and told him that she was the bearer of the first despatches from Court.

21st We receive an express from Montreal. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel inform us that the Mohawks had made another attack at the upper end of the Island of Montreal, on two or three houses beyond Fort St. Anne, from which they had taken and carried off three women; that Chevalier Lacorne had been immediately sent off with a detachment of one hundred men, and had arrived at Soulange on the morning of the sixteenth; that this officer had seized a canoe full of the enemy, to the number of six; to wit: five Indians, whereof 4 were Senecas and 1 Oneida, the sixth was a Dutchman, who speaks French and is dressed like an Indian, wearing even a scalp-lock. The three women taken on the previous night have been found in the canoe and liberated.

These prisoners have reported that they had started 35 days ago from the Mohawk village to the number of 43, in 7 canoes; had separated at Lake St. Francis. The other six canoes had gone to Iles à la Paix, near Chateauguë, for the purpose of crossing thence to the head of the Island of Montreal. On this intelligence Lieutenant St. Pierre was dispatched without delay with a second detachment of 150 men, and joined Chevalier de la Corne at the foot of the Cascades, where the two detachments formed a junction. Four of the enemy's canoes which had been discovered, fell on the night of the 17th and 18th, into an ambush laid by these gentlemen, who had forbidden any to fire before these canoes were pretty close; but one Canadian, who was too anxious, having fired, all our people, who were then discovered, were obliged to fire in the dark, not knowing where to aim. Sieur Le Duc, a voyageur, has been killed by one of them. Sieur Godefroy, a brave and strong young man, having thrown himself on the bow (la pince) of one of the enemy's canoes which was nearest the shore to stop it, received several mortal gun shot wounds from them. This canoe was the only one taken; on board it were found two men killed and nine who are prisoners; of these, three are Dutch and six Indian; the three other canoes of the enemy having put off and gone ashore in order to escape, our people pursued them, but were obliged to return to Montreal, having concluded, from the enemy's trail, that it was impossible to overtake them. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel add, that the Indians of these three canoes went away without provisions, powder or shoes, and had left even their clothes behind. 'Tis expected that some of them will perish by the way. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Corne and Saint Pierre give great praise to the Indians of Saut Saint Louis, who have behaved creditably on this occasion. Thus, they are determined to do what is expected of them. On the next day another canoe belonging to the enemy was discovered upset, floating on the water without any one being able to tell what became of those on board. Those prisoners, to the number of 15, have been conducted to Montreal where the Mohawks and other Indians have been imprisoned and put in irons. When the last of the enemy's canoes was attacked, a Saut Indian seized a Mohawk who was running towards the woods; all these prisoners are to be sent down to us at Quebec, where we shall have them guarded until circumstances change in respect to these nations.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel also inform us of an accident that has happened to one of our bateaux, which on her way down was wrecked in the Saut St. Louis. Nine or ten of the 25 men on board were drowned.

The inhabitants in the government of Montreal are more than ever on their guard; some detachments are always on the scout.

M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud was still at Thérèse on the 18th instant, where he was still recruiting for his detachment, which will consist of 11 @ 1200 men, including French and Indians and the 200 men that had set out some time before him.

By the same courier we receive letters from Captain de la Corne, who was detached by the General to all the Upper Nations; he writes us from Michilimakinac, on the 6th of May, that all the nations whom he had visited had voluntarily and readily offered to go down to Montreal, and that he had not met any difficulty in his mission, in which he succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations. He expects to arrive at Montreal on the 20th of this month at soonest; he does not tell us the number of Indians, nor the names of the tribes that are to follow him.

We receive also letters dated Fort St. Frederic, the 6th of this month; there is nothing new at that place, at least of interest; M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron, the Commandant, merely mentions his sending a detachment of 40 @ 50 Frenchmen and Indians on a scout towards Sarastau, to ascertain what is passing at that fort.

23<sup>d</sup> M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay arrives in the brigantine le Soleil Levant, with militiamen and prisoners.

A courier dispatched by M<sup>r</sup> de Rouville from Rimouski, brings us the earliest intelligence from Court, wherewith Sieur Ducasse was entrusted; we receive by these letters the first orders from his Majesty.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Fouville and St. Vincent have returned. They had learned at the Temisquata portage, the return of M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment.

Arrived the schooner La Marie, Captain Laronde, one of our vessels coming from Bay Verte with . . . . .

24th Arrived, also, La Ste. Julienne, Captain Monségur, the third vessel from Bay Verte, with 60 militiamen.

Arrived a courier from Beaubassin, with letters from Father Germain, dated the 7th instant. He acknowledges the receipt of our despatches of the 17th May; but M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay, who left on the 5th of May, had no knowledge of them. Sieur de Repentigny, who has remained at Beaubassin with a detachment of 30 men, did not expect to leave before the 20th or 25th instant. We wish much that the schooner with the provisions may arrive at Bay Verte before his departure, so as that he may receive those supplies and place them in security; otherwise, Sieur Gosselin will be greatly embarrassed as to the course he will have to adopt, should none of our people be at Beaubassin. This circumstance causes us much uneasiness, having reason to fear that Beaubassin may be wholly abandoned. The English, who are already at Bay Verte, might return to the charge, and having no force to oppose them, will find no difficulty in seizing our schooner, which is not able to make any defence.

The Acadians are now more exposed than ever to the resentment of the English ; the latter are aware that some of them had borne arms in the affair at Minas, and that several among them favored the French expeditions.

26th We dispatch expresss to Rimouski, Cape Chat and Cape Desrosiers, to advise the commanders of these posts of the departure from France of a fleet for Canada under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière, so that we may be seasonably informed of its approach, in order to have an opportunity of sending it, in advance, some refreshments, of which the crews and troops on board will possibly be in want.

We send the same message to Sieur Cartier, the commander of the Fire rafts at Ile aux Coudres, so that he may not make any movement with these rafts until he be certain that the ships, which will probably appear in number, are enemies.

We receive letters from Montreal. M<sup>r</sup> Michel writes us, on the 22nd, that M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud marched on the 19th instant from St. Thérèse with his whole force, consisting of about 600 French and 300 Indians, exclusive of the 200 French already arrived at Fort St. Frederic.

We send the necessary orders to Montreal, for the dispatch of the canoes destined for the posts of the Upper Country, which it is impossible to detain any longer in view of the necessity that exists of sending goods to the Indians who are absolutely in need of them. These canoes are to be convoyed by about 100 Frenchmen and Indians, for fear of surprise, principally from the Mohawks. Ensign Dubuisson, who commands this convoy, has orders to escort the canoes as far as Niagara. On his arrival there, he will leave half his detachment at that post, to provide the necessary firewood for the garrison, and pursue his voyage with the remainder of his men as far as Detroit, whence he will conduct the canoes destined for the most distant posts and places.

26th at night. The man named Douville arrives in a bateau, from Bay Verte, with 11 prisoners and 5 militiamen. This is the balance of the Canadian detachment that wintered at Beaubassin, except thirty, who have remained there under the command of Sieur de Repentigny. All these militia returned in a very wretched condition, and almost wholly naked, with nearly 50 sick. Two of them died on the voyage from Bay Verte to Quebec. We have these militia well treated to recruit them from the fatigues of the voyage, and pay them 30<sup>u</sup> each, in lieu of pay and clothing. This economizes so far the goods remaining in the public stores.

The prisoners arrived from Beaubassin to the number of .... are partly sick ; they have been placed with their comrades in their new lodgings.

Arrived, a schooner from Martinico, Captain Boulau ; sailed from Trinity the .. May, loaded with Rum and Molasses. Saw no vessel in the Gulf.

28th The Indians taken by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Corne and St. Pierre, have been brought to Quebec to the number of 10, viz<sup>t</sup> 4 Senecas, 4 Oneidas, 1 Mohegan (Loup), 1 Mohawk and 4 Dutchmen, dressed like Indians. We sent word to all the Indians around in Quebec, to the number of 300, who were in attendance on the arrival of these prisoners, and have observed the ceremonies usual on like occasions. They promenaded them through the entire town, made them dance and sing ; we had these prisoners removed to the jail where they are safely guarded and in irons. One Mohegan has remained behind at Montreal sick, and one young Mohawk taken by those of the Saut.

29th We receive couriers from Beaubassin. Father Germain acknowledges, on the 10th inst the receipt of our despatches of the 20th and 24th of May. He informs us that there is nothing new since he wrote last; that he does not intend to quit Beaubassin, until all hope be abandoned of receiving in Acadia some news from France, or 'till we recal him. We have, at present, some reason to hope that Sieur Gosselin, Captain of the schooner L'Angelique, having arrived at Cocagne,<sup>1</sup> or some port of the Island of St. John, will have communicated his arrival to Father Germain.

30th We dispatch couriers to Beaubassin; we write Father Germain that we expect, according to his last letters, that he will be found at Beaubassin on the arrival of Sieur Gosselin, who will have immediately informed him of the circumstance; that in such case we feel no uneasiness about the disposition he will have made of the schooner's cargo; that should we be in time to indicate to him the employment of the cargo, it is desirable that he should sell at least a good portion of it, either for money, or notes he will have taken up; that, moreover, the French settlers from other parts (étrangers) will stand in need of provisions and clothing, and he will be under the necessity of relieving them; that the same will be the case with the Indians, as well his own as those of Father Lacorne, and even with the Micmacs who must be naked; that, therefore, he will find opportunities in one way or the other, to employ the provisions and merchandise in a manner suitable to the interests of his Majesty, his subjects and his allies, and to the maintenance of friendly dispositions among the last. We add, that we cannot prescribe any more positive rule to him, and that we submit the whole to his prudence.

July 1st 8 o'clock, P. M. Midshipman de Réal Boscal is arrived. He landed yesterday at the Pilgrims from the frigate L'Emeraude, commanded by M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière de Taffanel. This officer informs us of the unfortunate encounter M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière had with 16 English men of war, to which he gave battle;<sup>2</sup> he could not furnish any positive information about it, being at too great a distance; he adds, that he is in the river with 7 merchantmen, transports, &c., in which there are 14 officers, 150 soldiers and 30 Swiss, and that he had seen 3 more some days after the battle.

4th We receive a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Michel, dated the 28th ultimo, wherein he advises us that he learns at the moment, from M<sup>r</sup> de Sabrevois, commandant at Ile Perrot, that the deputies of the Five Nations, with the exception of the Mohawks, had arrived at his post to the number of 75 Onondagas, Oneidas, Tuscarorins and Cayugas, and that M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire was to arrive at an early day at Fort Frontenac with the Senecas in, probably, an equally large number. The Onondagas have kept the promise they had given to M<sup>r</sup> de la Chauvinerie. We expect to see all these Indians at Quebec; there will be question of negotiating with them, and principally respecting their people whom we have prisoners.

5th The frigate L'Emeraude, the ship L'Auguste and Le Brillant, freighted for the King, and Le Louis Auguste, have cast anchor this morning in the harbor.

Messengers are arrived from Beaubassin. Father Germain writes us on the 20th June, that he had learned on the 18th that the schooner L'Angelique, Capt<sup>n</sup> Gosselin, had arrived in a little harbor on the Main, named Cocagne, 15 to 18 leagues distant from Bay Verte. This missionary caused that vessel to remain in that harbor until he should receive orders for the disposal of the cargo ; he has merely drawn some effects for the wants of the detachment of 30 men. Sieur de Repentigny expects to remain at Beaubassin with his little force until he receive further orders ; M<sup>r</sup> Desenclave, the missionary priest at Port Royal, writes to Father Germain, 7th of June, that M<sup>r</sup> Knowles, Governor of Louisbourg, was then at that fort with two vessels of war, but the object of his arrival was not known.

6th The ship La Renommée, Captain Trolon, freighted by the King, anchored this morning in the harbor.

7th Expresses arrive from Acadia. Sieur de Repentigny and Father Germain inform us, on the 23<sup>d</sup> June, that they have just learned by two settlers from Minas that 10 or 12 Acadians who left Port Royal on the 17th of said month, had reported at Grandprée that M<sup>r</sup> Knowles, who had remained in the basin with his ships since the 10th, had, on the 15th, embarked for Ile Royal on board a vessel which had just arrived ; that this same bateau had been dispatched from Boston by Mr. Shirley to inform M<sup>r</sup> Knowles that Louisbourg was already besieged ; that these same settlers report that two Acadians of Port Royal, named Suret and Poirier, have assured them that they had heard from the mouth of Dion, the pilot of the bateau in question, that the French had effected their landing on the 2<sup>d</sup> of June ; they add that this Dion was engaged to convey, by day or night, the Governor to his post in a bark canoe with which he had taken care to provide himself. We have paid no regard to this news, and if it be true that a fleet has appeared before Louisbourg, it is probably only that of Admiral Waren, who is expected a long while in those seas, with 12 or 14 men of war destined, say the English, for the Canada expedition.

We have reason to presume that when the Minister will have been informed of what had occurred to M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière on the 14th of May, he will be anxious to learn what has become of the frigate L'Emeraude and the two merchantmen freighted for the King's account, which had separated from the fleet. This circumstance induces us to dispatch the schooner L'Aimable Marthe, Captain Simonin, to France, to inform him of the arrival of some of those vessels and of the succors we expected.

8th We receive an express from Montreal. M<sup>r</sup> Michel informs us, on the 4th, that five Malecites Indians of M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud's detachment had just arrived with an English prisoner ; they report that M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud had, on arriving at Fort St. Frederic, detached M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc with 200 Frenchmen and Indians on a scout to Sarasto ; that on coming to the vicinity of this fort he had sent 5 men towards it to ascertain what was passing ; that one of these scouts having inadvertently discharged his gun they were discovered, which made him think of sending all the Indians back. M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc profited by this conjuncture to make a feint, by showing 15 men in front of the fort in order to induce the enemy to come out, whilst our people waited for them in ambush and concealed. This having been executed, M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc saw 100 men leave the fort ; he surrounded them, and, according to the report of these Indians, took 41 and killed 29 of them ; others were drowned, and they assert that only 15 or 20 had reëntered the fort. The English prisoner reports that the English were in want of provisions and necessaries, and were beginning to despair of Admiral Waren.

We are informed also that the 4 Nations of Iroquois had arrived at Montreal to the number of 70 men, women and children ; there remain but the Senecas, who, 'tis said, are on the road. The former appear well disposed and censure the conduct of those who have been taken ; they assure us that those prisoners joined the war party contrary to the advice of the villages, which warned them to be on their guard against the intrigues of the Mohawks and Dutch, who had seduced them whilst they were in liquor.

We learn by a letter of the 6th that M<sup>r</sup> de Lacorne, the elder, had just arrived with 192 Indians from Michilimakinac, River St Joseph, and the Baie, about 80 of whom are women and children.

The ship La Chimerre, the snow Le Dragon, and the brigantine L'Aimable Jeanne have cast anchor in the harbor.

9th The 9 Onondagas who are here for the last 40 days, have finally left on their return home. They learned with pleasure the arrival of their chiefs, and those of the other cantons, at Montreal; we made them many presents, and they appear to have left satisfied; we expect that those who are at Montreal will be desirous to see the General and will come down to Quebec.

10th The 5 Malecites Indians of M<sup>r</sup> de St Luc's party have just arrived with the prisoner they took in the action. He confirms what occurred in St Lacorne St. Luc's adventure, and adds that no more than 150 men remain in the fort; that 21 months' pay was due to the soldiers, which excited general dissatisfaction. He was at Orange about 20 days ago; he says that 40 companies of 100 men each had been formerly levied in the provinces of New-York, Pennsylvania, Jersey and Maryland, and they are now reduced by desertion to 40 or 50 discontented men; that these companies were dispersed in different forts; that the one at Half-moon, between Orange and Sarastau, has been abandoned, and that Admiral Waren was no longer expected. We will be able to be more certain when we shall have seen the other prisoners.

12th We dispatch, to-day, the schooner we are sending to France, under the command of Sieur Simonin. We inform the Minister, in our letter of the 7th and 10th, of the arrival of a part of the fleet separated from M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière's squadron, and of the most interesting occurrences in the country since the spring. Sieur Simonin has orders to make the first French port, where he will hand our despatches to the Intendant, or Harbor-Master, to forward them to the Court, by an extraordinary courier.

7 English prisoners are sent down to us from Montreal; one of them is an officer; they are the result of Sieur St. Luc's attack.

13th Five or six Abenakis, belonging to M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc's party, bring us an English prisoner taken in the same affair.

16th Sieur de Repentigny writes us from Beaubassin that he has just received, by a farmer coming from St. Esprit, intelligence from Louisbourg contradicting those contained in his letter of the 23rd June. This man had had a conversation with some inhabitants of St. Esprit, who were returning from Louisbourg and had arrived on the 15th of June, who told him that the Governor had not got back there;* that the English continued of the opinion that a considerable French Fleet would sail, but they knew not when, nor whither; that Admiral Waren was waiting to learn what course this fleet would steer to oppose it vigorously. This same farmer has brought to Beaubassin, from Ile Royale, 3 deserters, who had left on the 15th of May; they report nothing more precise; they only confirm the general discontent of the garrison, which consists of about 1500 men.

The General receives, by way of Acadia, a letter from M<sup>r</sup> Knowles, Governor of Louisbourg, dated Annapolis, the 27th May last, where he then was. He proposes to M<sup>r</sup> de Beauharnais to send to Louisbourg the English soldiers taken last year at the Island of S<sup>t</sup> John, who he has learned had been sent to Quebec; and proposes that he add as many other prisoners to them as he shall deem proper, on condition of giving in exchange as many, grade for grade, or to promise to do so when M<sup>r</sup> Knowles shall have any in his possession.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel write us the 13th, that they had just received a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud, dated Fort S<sup>t</sup> Frederic, the 8th instant, informing them that a party of his Indians abandon him; that the diversity of sentiment among them totally changes the plans he had laid down respecting his voyage; that he has determined to proceed to the head of La Grand Baie,<sup>1</sup> where he will be in a position to execute his instructions, which are mainly to protect Fort S<sup>t</sup> Frederic; that he will send out frequent scouts to watch the enemy; that after having taken all these precautions, he will determine on what course he is to pursue in his subsequent proceedings.

These gentlemen write us on the 15th that they have heard and answered the Indians whom M<sup>r</sup> de La Corne had brought down; that they intend to send them off immediately with that officer to join M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud, or to make a special attack, should they not find him. These Indians number about 90, including those who have come down with M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne and the others who have wintered at Montreal.

The vessels lately arrived from France bring very little salt; it is distributed in the ratio of only a quarter of a minot to each family. We dispatched, 6 weeks ago, 4 small armed vessels to the north coast of Newfoundland in quest of that article. We are informed that two of these 4 have put back to Gaspé, where they are to take in codfish. The apprehension that the King's ships belonging to M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière's fleet, which were loaded with salt, will not reach us this year; the indispensable necessity of curing considerable provisions, for the movements which are daily occurring, and for the support of the people; all these motives have determined us to dispatch a vessel of 80 tons to Newfoundland for a cargo of that article, if any can be had in the different harbors, where the ships from St. Malo formerly fished. This vessel is fitting out, and will be ready for sea in 8 or 10 days.

17th Arrived, the snow L'Amiable Jeanne, Captain Iriard, which also had separated from the fleet.

18th We send back some of the couriers who arrived within a few days from Beaubassin; we expect that Sieur de Repentigny is on his way back with the rest of his detachment.

19th Father Maurice Lacorne, the Missionary to the Miramichi Indians, has just arrived by land; two English privateers having, on the 30th ultimo, captured, within 8 leagues of Gaspé, the vessels in which he had embarked, he is content with having been able to escape on shore with his crew, numbering 10 men. The privateers consist of a large snow of 20 to 30 guns and a bateau.

20th We are in receipt of letters both from Montreal and Detroit; those from Detroit are very interesting. Chevalier de Longueuil, commanding that post, writes us, on the 23<sup>d</sup> June, that some Hurons of Detroit, belonging to the tribe of the war chief Nicolas, who, some years since, had settled at Sandoské, have killed 5 Frenchmen who were on their return from the post at the White river, and stolen their furs; that all the Indians of the neighborhood, except the Illinois, had formed the design to destroy all the French of Detroit on one of the holidays of Pentecost, and afterwards to go to the fort and subject all to fire and sword; that some Hurons, having struck too soon, the plot had been discovered by a Huron squaw who came to give Chevalier de Longueuil notice of it; that this conspiracy is the fruit of the Belts the English have had distributed among all the tribes by the Iroquois of the 5 Nations; that on this notification he caused all the settlers to retire within the fort in order to be prepared for any new treachery. The Outaouas have spoken at Detroit, and have given assurances that they had no participation in this bad business. Other Hurons of Sastaredzy and Taychatin's* tribe came, also, to speak to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, and have, in like manner, assured him that they had no share in the misconduct of Nicolas' people, meanwhile, asking pardon, they endeavor to exculpate themselves, and propose settling near Detroit. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil has given them no positive answer, and has referred them to the General. Nicolas' tribe continues, nevertheless, to reside at Sandoské,** where, says M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, they doubtless expect not only to maintain themselves but even to harass Detroit by small war parties. They have attached to them several families of vagabond Iroquois, Loups, &c. 'Tis even asserted that there are some Saut Indians among them. Father Potier,<sup>1</sup> the Jesuit Missionary, has abandoned the village on Bois Blanc island,<sup>2</sup> and retired to Detroit, where he is to remain. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil adds, that if the Nations do not declare in our favor, even though they remain somewhat inactive, it will be out of his power to get the harvest saved; that already the cattle of several of the farmers have been killed and carried off by the Sauteurs, some houses in the country pillaged by unknown Indians; that the chiefs, 'tis true, disapprove highly of the misconduct of these wretches and endeavor to restrain them, but that affords no assurance of their good intentions.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beacourt and Michel, in sending us the letters from Detroit, inform us of the arrival of M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre, who was sent last winter with M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne; he brought with him 8 or 10 Outaouas of Detroit, 4 Hurons of the same place, among whom are Sastaredzy and 2 Senecas, and some Hurons of Lorette, who acted this winter as his guides.

Private letters mention the murder of the 5 Frenchmen, with circumstances which show that the Hurons of Sandoské have perpetrated the greatest cruelties on this occasion.

22<sup>d</sup> We answer M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, informing him in detail of all the precautions he has to take in his future negotiations with all the Detroit tribes for the restoration of peace, if

<sup>1</sup> LOUIS ANTOINE POTIER, in the Liste Chronologique, No. 609. Mr. Shea gives the name Peter Potier. The former authority fixes his arrival in Canada in 1742. He was at St. Joseph's in 1751, and frequently visited the Illinois country down to his death, which occurred at Detroit 16th July, 1781. He is called the last Jesuit in the West. Shea's Missions, 378, 432, 501.

*** A Mohegan, named Germaneau, had deserted from Mr. de S<sup>t</sup> Luc's party; the other Indians were afraid that they should be surrounded by the enemy with a stronger force than ours, the said Germaneau having gone to Orange, where he had given an account of the condition of our forces.—Ed.

possible. We have great confidence in the adroitness of this officer to place the nations again in our interests. In regard to the Hurons, the General sends Messages whereby M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil is to demand of them the surrender of the murderers, to be disposed of according to his pleasure; meanwhile they must declare against the English, who instigated them to commit the crime; they must attack them, and furnish proofs of their repentance by a great many prisoners; that, otherwise, their Father will become their sworn and irreconcilable enemy. We send orders to Montreal to dispatch immediately the canoes for Detroit and the other southern posts, with the convoy; this is of great consequence in order to place M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil thereby in a position to act. This convoy will take the route by Niagara, where Sieur Dubuisson had orders only to land 20 men of his convoy, to cut wood for the garrison belonging to this fort, and to continue his voyage to Detroit with the remainder of his escort, so as, thereby, to secure the arrival of the canoes. We leave M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil at liberty to retain at his post all the people belonging to this convoy, and even the voyageurs and servants, if there be cause to fear any treachery on the part of the Indians; but he must not take advantage of this permission except in case of absolute necessity, and then it would not be just to subject the voyageurs and farmers to the expense of wintering there. Wherefore, we advise this officer, before hand, that we shall defray it.

The ship St. Ursin, Captain Paris, has anchored in the harbor.

23<sup>d</sup> The deputies of the 5 Nations, to the number of 61, accompanied by 4 Iroquois of the Saut and 2 of the Lake, have just arrived on business; we are expecting the Senecas, whom Sieur de Joncaire is to bring down.

Cadet Langi, dispatched by M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud, is arrived. That officer, he informs us, has returned to Montreal with his entire detachment.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel inform us, on the 21st, that 66 warriors of the Lake of the Two Mountains, have just brought in 6 prisoners, of whom one is a young man, 3 are boys, one a woman and one a child, whom they took near Orange. These prisoners say that Admiral Warren continues to be expected, and when he will be near Quebec with his ships the English are to make a simultaneous attack on Montreal, by way of Fort S<sup>t</sup> Frederic, which they expect to carry in passing.

24th Sieur Belestre arrives from Detroit with 8 Outaouas Chiefs, 4 Hurons (Sastaredzy, the principal Chief, and Tayachatin, another Chief, are among the latter), 2 Senecas and 8 other Indians, some of whom are Hurons, from Lorette, who accompanied him last winter to Detroit. 8 other Outaouas, whom M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre brought along, have remained at Montreal, and are to join the party commanded by M<sup>r</sup> de La Corne.

26th We send Sieur Langi back to Montreal, whither we transmit orders to send 50 @ 60 Frenchmen and 30 @ 40 Indians to Fort S<sup>t</sup> Frederic; these ought to be more than sufficient to cut wood for the garrison next winter, M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud having had the greater portion of it cut by his detachment.

In the evening. An express is arrived from M<sup>r</sup> Aubert, the commander at Cape Desrosier, who sends us what Sieur Barré, a resident of the Grand river,<sup>1</sup> wrote him under date, the 5th of this month. This individual informs him, that on the 2nd inst., 3 English vessels, to wit, a schooner, a snow and a sloop (that is Father Lacorne's), had passed Point Verte under a French flag and streamer; that said Sieur Barré had fired a gun at them; next inquired of them whence they came; they answered him that they were from Guadeloupe, and were looking for a pilot to go up the river; Sieur Barré told them to send a boat ashore, when he should ascertain who they were and send a pilot to them. This they did not do, whereupon Sieur Barré caused the fishermen, who had collected there to the number of 30 @ 40, to give them a volley of musketry. The enemy made no reply; the schooner steered towards Pabo, but being annoyed by the discharges of musketry, was obliged to alter her course after firing two guns, and came to an anchor within pistol shot of the shore, where she furled her sails and discharged several guns and swivels, as well as some musketry. The Snow, which was farther off than the schooner, kept up a continual fire of 4 pounders; the little bateau kept always off. Sieur Barré did not cease firing at the two vessels, especially at the schooner, which was the nearest. The contest lasted 6 @ 7 hours, when the night fell; these vessels then hauled off. They were within ear shot; wished Sieur Barré good night, and assured him that they would return in the morning to him, which, however, they did not do. Sieur Barré assures, that these two vessels have fired as many 300 cannon and swivel shots, exclusive of musketry, and that he, on his side, fired more than 80th of ball within pistol shot. He thinks that he diminished the number of the schooner's crew, having seen the snow's boat coming to her three times full of people, and returning only with the crew. Sieur Barré asks ammunition from Sieur Aubert, as he apprehends that the English will return to the charge. At the same time that M<sup>r</sup> Aubert transmits us Sieur Barré's letter, he informs us that the latter had on the 8th instant, descried, about 5 leagues off, a 3 masted ship, the form of whose sails he could not distinguish, as she passed at a distance of about two leagues; she appeared to him to be steering South, on the starboard tack, carrying foresail and spanker; she changed course two hours after, the cape bearing E. N. E., the wind blowing N. E. pretty fresh. This ship, though at a distance, appeared to him very large. At  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 9 in the morning she was hull down. He is of opinion that this vessel was English. In communicating Sieur Barré's adventure to us, Sieur Aubert states that he has very little ammunition, and is unable properly to assist Sieur Barré under existing circumstances, and requests us to send him (M<sup>r</sup> Aubert) immediately some ammunition as well as provisions for the people at his post, as his supply is nearly exhausted.

We dispatch a biscayenne to-day with provisions for Cape Desrosiers, on board which we have put 200th of powder and ball in proportion; we write to Sieur Aubert to divide the ammunition with Sieur Barré, to enable him to retain his position at Grand river, should the English return and attack him. We express, at the same time, to Sieur Barré our satisfaction of his conduct in his affair, and exhort him to continue to oppose the attempts of the English, should they renew them at Grand river and its vicinity.

29th The vessel we have fitted out for Kerpont<sup>1</sup> to procure a cargo of salt, has not been able to get off until to-day. Sieur Boucherville, captain of this vessel, has orders to coast along the North shore, and to avoid all encounters. On arriving at Kerpont, he is to apply to the Malouin and other captains who fish there, to procure him his cargo, or, at least, to point out to him where he will be able to obtain it.

We jointly address them a circular letter, exhorting them to assist in relieving the necessity of the Colony in this article, by mutually contributing to the loading of Sieur Boucherville, reserving to ourselves to report to the Minister the manner they will act on this occasion, when such vital assistance is in question.

August 2<sup>d</sup> The schooner L'Angelique, Captain Gosselin, sent heretofore to Bay Verte, returned to-day with a part of her cargo; she sailed the 18th ultimo. We learn that Sieur de

Repentigny was to start, two days after, for the River St. John with his detachment, pursuant to the orders he had received. Father Germain's health appeared to be improving.

Two English prisoners who were taken by the St. Francis Indians in M<sup>r</sup> de St. Luc's attack on Sarastau, are brought down from 3 Rivers.

The ship le Philibert has anchored in the harbor; she formed part of M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière's fleet.

3<sup>d</sup> We are in receipt of letters from Montreal dated the 31st inst.; the convoy for Detroit has set out at last, not without considerable difficulty on the part of the farmers employed in that service, in consequence of the risks, and under the apprehension that they are to winter at that post. Threats, and even castigation became necessary to oblige them to march.

4th Died, Sastaredzy, grand Huron chief of those who came down from Detroit with M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre.

7th The ship La Vierge-de-grace, Captain Larregni, fitted out as a packet, sailed to-day for Boston with 180 English prisoners.

8th Sieur Lebé, storekeeper to the Acadia detachment, is arrived; he informs us that Sieur de Repentigny will arrive in a few days with his detachment. Father Germain continues convalescent and remains at Beaubassin with a guard of 50 @ 60 Micmac Indians.

200 Indians, men, women and children, arrive from Father Lacorne's mission; they come in quest of their supplies. They must be clothed, and we will send them back as soon as possible. We are over-crowded by all these people.

9th We receive letters from Cape des Rosiers. Sieur Aubert informs us that about 2 o'clock of the afternoon of the 17th ultimo, the wind being N. and N. W., a ship was distinctly seen coming down from the North, about five leagues off. The wind falling at twilight she was lost sight of about 6 @ 7 o'clock in the evening. He saw nothing afterwards until the 20th, when he wrote us that he had been informed, by a settler who remained two months at Grand river, that 11 English prisoners, on board a Bayonne vessel, commanded by Sieur Samson, who was fishing at Port Daniel,<sup>1</sup> had escaped in one of the ship's boats which they had carried off; that it appears certain that this Captain had purposely connived at their escape to save whatever expense they might be; for going ashore with his hands to work at his fish, he left only two men on board with a boat, which the prisoners carried off in open day with what provisions they required. It is not known what route they took.

9th The Hurons of Detroit have spoken in Council. They have requested, among other things, that Father Larichardie, their former Missionary, should return with them in order to labor effectually in the restoration of tranquillity among that nation. We concluded that this could have only a good effect, under existing circumstances, considering the derangement of affairs at Detroit, and the special confidence these Indians repose in this Missionary; we therefore have not hesitated to grant them their request. Father Larichardie readily consented to the arrangement; he is to leave in a few days for Montreal and proceed thence to Detroit. The General has just appointed Ensign de Belestre to command at the River St. Joseph. He will remain at Detroit, under the orders of Chev<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, as long as that officer will deem it necessary for the good of the service, who will permit Sieur de Belestre to go to, and come from, the River St. Joseph whenever he shall think proper. This officer will accompany Father La Richardie. We send word of all this to Montreal in order to the preparation there of the provisions, ammunition and the effects necessary for the voyage and the winter's residence of both. We write also to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, in consequence of all these arrangements, so that he may, on his part, contribute as much as will depend on him, to the restoration of everything if possible.

10th Sailed to-day, for Louisbourg, the brigantine St. Esprit, fitted as a packet, having on board about 80 prisoners.

11th Sieur de Repentigny arrives, with his little detachment, from Beaubassin.

12th Sailed, ship Andromede of Rochelle, for St. Domingo; she wintered at Quebec.

Sailed, also, the snow Jean Joseph, for the same port; she came this year from France.

13th Captain de Noyelle and Sieur de La Verendrie arrive from Michilimakinac, and deliver to the General a letter dated at that post, on the 23<sup>d</sup> July, and addressed to him by Sieur de Noyelle, Junr, commanding in the absence of M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne, Senior, and by other officers who arrived from the other Upper posts, and happened to be then at Michilimakinac. The General is informed by this letter of the confusion that prevails among all the Nations of that post and neighborhood, Outaouas, Sauteurs and Mississagués. The Outaouas of Saguinam, have killed 3 Frenchmen who were coming from Detroit to Michilimakinac. Two French canoes, which had gone en prime from Montreal to the West Sea,<sup>1</sup> have been attacked by the Sauteurs, about the place called La Cloche,<sup>2</sup> near Lake Michigan; one, containing 8 men, has been wholly defeated; the second, by striking out into the Lake and throwing its cargo overboard, escaped to Michilimakinac. Another Frenchman has been stabbed by the Sauteurs, at a place called La Grosse Ile,<sup>3</sup> only 2 leagues distant from the post. These Indians have offered divers insults and threats at the fort, and in the vicinity; they killed all the horses and other cattle that they could not catch; they designed to surprise the fort, but were discovered, and obliged to leave, by ringing the bell and beating the tap-too, as usual, and even by making some defensive demonstrations. There had been greater reason for presuming bad intentions on the part of the Indians, inasmuch as a crowd of young men had armed themselves with knives, in a council which had been held at their request, on the 3<sup>d</sup> of July, and which terminated in recrimination. The Indians have not been since permitted to enter the fort, except under certain restrictions. Some Frenchmen from Point Chagouamigon, and M<sup>r</sup> de Noyelle, Senr, on his usual return from the West Sea, arrived a few days after. Certain intelligence had also been received there from Detroit. This reinforcement will somewhat tranquilize the fort, which contained, before this arrival, only 23 men. An Outaoua Indian, named Nequiouamin, arrived on the 2nd of July, at the post, to communicate in secret to the Commandant and the Missionary that the Iroquois, the Huron and the Flathead, had come to an understanding with the English to destroy the French and drive them to the other side of the sea; that the Outaouac of Detroit, is in the plot; that the Poutouatami will coöperate; that the Mississagué and Sauteur are gained over; that the Outaouac of Saguinam, has already struck; that the Outaouac of Michilimakinac, would have taken part against us had it not been for the portion of the village which is at Montreal, and that they would yet possibly declare against us on the arrival of 70 men from Saguinam, who are to be reinforced by the Sauteurs of Grosse Ile; that they were to leave in a few days, and to come in the night to speak to the Outaouas of the post, and that it were well to allow no person to go hunting, and to keep strict watch. M<sup>r</sup> de Noyelle, Junr, adds that he will detain, until further orders, at Michilimakinac, the canoes which were to come from Montreal to the different posts, unless affairs changed, and it became certain that the dispositions of the Indians at those posts were altered. We are coöperating in the adoption of the most effectual measures, either to restore tranquillity at the post of Michilimakinac, or at least to place it in a proper state of defence against all attacks of the Indians.

15th The confusion prevalent at Michilimakinac being only weighed, we have made the best arrangements possible to maintain our possession of that fort. The particulars are as follows:

1. M<sup>r</sup> de Verchères, who is appointed commander at the Bay, and who has accompanied the convoy from Montreal to Michilimackinac, where he is to await the decision of the General, and to command until further orders, is merely to send word to those of the Bay that matters have not permitted his visiting them; that their brethren stop the road on him; that the canoes which were carrying goods to them, are arrived at Michilimakinac, where they will find their supplies; that the accidents which have just happened, have thus prevented their Father sending them goods, and he enjoins them absolutely not to allow any person to go to any other post than that of said Bay, until affairs be settled. 2<sup>d</sup> After the departure of the canoes which are to bring down the peltries to Montreal, 100 @ 150 men are to remain as a guard at the post. It is presumed that they will be provided with food until next spring. Should that not be the case, and the Indians refuse to sell any, he has orders to have recourse to every expedient, even to force of arms, to procure a supply. But doubting, as we do, the possibility of collecting provisions necessary for the wintering of the people of the place, and of the 100 men of the garrison, whom he is to retain, we issue orders to Montreal for the dispatch of 10 good bark canoes, loaded with flour, Indian corn, peas, fat, suet, pork and salt beef, to the extent of 30 thousand weight. These 10 canoes will leave Montreal as soon as possible. The General intends that Lieutenant de Saint Pierre shall serve as M<sup>r</sup> de Vercheres' deputy, and the former is to remain in command at Michilimakinac, in case the latter visit the Bay. We add to M<sup>r</sup> de Vercheres' instructions, that the voyageurs who will be detained at Michilimakinac, are to trade concurrently at the post, and should they make any representations, we shall pay attention to whatever is just.

We send Sieur de la Verendrie, Jun<sup>r</sup>., back to Michilimakinac with our despatches to M<sup>r</sup> de Verchères, in order that this commandant may be early advised of the arrangements we are adopting for the relief of that post.

The sickness of Taychatio, the Huron chief, retards Father Larichardie and M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre's departure.

19th Sieur Papepinière arrives from the north coast of Newfoundland with 5 @ 600 minots of salt; it is a very opportune relief. He informs us that he saw at Mingan<sup>1</sup> the schooner La Dorade that had separated from M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière's fleet; also a schooner from the Islands.

21st Schooner La Dorade, Captain Vincelot, has anchored in the harbor.

Also, schooner Le Loup Marin, from Martinico.

Idem. A brigantine, an English prize, loaded with sugar, and taken by a St. Malo ship, that fishes at Newfoundland. By this occasion we learn that the fishery there is very abundant, and that the 7 St. Malo vessels will have full cargoes.

We are in receipt of letters from Father Germain, dated the 6th instant; his health is almost entirely reëstablished. There is nothing new at Acadia.

A party of Abenakis, from Acadia, brings us an Englishman, named William Hilton, whom they took prisoner at Piscatoué.<sup>1</sup> This prisoner reports that a vessel had arrived at Boston from Cape Breton, where, it reports, Admiral Waren had arrived; the news is public at Boston, that, in the battle near France,<sup>2</sup> 5 French ships had been captured and a 6th sunk; that the New England levies were to be sent back immediately; that there was considerable talk of peace; that goods were very dear, but provisions abundant at Boston, where the pound of powder is worth 14 shillings. This prisoner also reports that the English had all the Upper country Indians in their interest.

23rd The Huron Chief is convalescent; Father La Richardie and M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre started to-day for Montreal, and thence for their destination.

25th Arrived, Sieur Fresche, captain of the ship L'Alexander, which sailed from Rochelle, with M. de La Jonquière, reports that on the 27th of July he calculated himself to be within 16 or 18 leagues S. E. of the Island of Anticostie, the wind at noon being S. and S. S. W., with considerable fog, he steered W. N. W. to reach Bonaventure or Gaspé, and thereby to avoid Anticostie; that the current to the North was so strong, that about 4 o'clock in the afternoon his vessel touched the S. E. point of the Island; that for two hours he did not know which way to turn, not knowing the ground; that he, notwithstanding, made immediate efforts to save some articles from the ship, until the moment a sea struck the vessel a-midship and stove her in, and in an instant he was under water as far as his deck (plat bord) on the starboard side; that he saved as much provisions as possible, and landed a league and a half from the ship, with a part of his crew, and sent back for the remainder. This Captain embarked in his canoe, on the eleventh, and proceeded to Cape Desroziers, whence Sieur Aubert, who commands at that post, has sent one of his boats, with some men, to the Island of Anticostie to save the remainder of this crew, numbering 17 persons, who, however, had 2 months' provisions when Sieur Fresche departed.

We receive letters from Father Germain; he demands some provisions and goods to pay the notes he has been obliged to give the Acadians to defray the various expenses which circumstances occasioned. This Missionary proposes a project for the capture of Port Royal, which is actually devoid of any garrison, the soldiers there dying daily.

We receive, to-day, letters from Cape Desroziers; there is nothing new at that post. Sieur Aubert informs us only of the wreck of the ship L'Alexander, on the Island of Anticostie.

We are in receipt of letters from Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel, in answer to ours of the 15th; he informs us that they are about to dispatch, with all diligence, the convoy of the 100 canoes of provisions destined for Michilimakinac, under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de St Pierre.

28th The General writes to M. de Verchères; he makes no change in the arrangements for Michilimakinac; he adds only, that should the Indians of the Bay appear to him favorably disposed towards us, of which he will be informed, he leaves him at liberty to send M<sup>r</sup> de Saint Pierre to that post, to sound them, and carry them some presents, should he be of opinion that that officer might undertake the journey without danger, and that it is necessary to secure the fidelity of these Indians.

We receive letters from Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Beaucourt and Michel, of the 20th and 23<sup>d</sup> instant, of which the following are extracts:

Extract of the letter dated 20th of August. The Poutouatamies of M<sup>r</sup> de La Corne's party having had some discussions with the Outaouas on the day succeeding their departure from Fort St. Frederic, went off to the number of 48, and have been in two divisions to make an attack towards Orange, where they took three prisoners and one scalp; and the other, to Sarastaugué, whence they have returned with 2 scalps.* On being examined, the prisoners said, that they have had no news from Europe for nearly 3 months; that there is constant talk, in their country, of a great expedition against Canada, without any preparations, however, and that the best informed are of opinion that it is an imposition on the public; have had no news of M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquiere's battle.

The Folles Avoines and Nepisseingues, to the number of 14, who separated from M<sup>r</sup> de La Corne, whom the whole body left apparently in the vicinity of Corlac, arrived on the 20th at Montreal with the scalps of two Mohawks and one Dutchman; they say that being desirous to follow the Saut Indians who were ahead of them, and not being able to overtake them, they formed an ambuscade near a high road, where three others terminated. They were not yet concealed when a big and tall Mohawk made his appearance, carrying a kettle, a sword and a gun. No sooner did this Mohawk perceive them, than he uttered a loud cry. Lamothe, a Fol Avoine, chief of the party, called to his men to take him alive, but the man named Caron had already fired and killed him. According to the scalp they have presented, and the height, the voice and the marks (piqûres) they have described, there is every reason to suppose that they have killed Toyenoguén,** the Mohawk chief who deceived us. All the Indians maintain that it is his scalp, which is remarkable in being clean and white. After this attack, they covered the body and placed themselves in ambush a little further on, and at the same moment a Dutchman and a young Mohawk made their appearance, whose scalps they also took after having killed them. They say that this Dutchman had a great deal of money in his clothes, and they regard him as a man of consequence.***

The Poutouatamies demand leave to return home, for the purpose of putting an end to, and counteracting, the misrepresentations that may be circulated among their people and allies. They regard the attacks of the Outaouas and Sauteurs as if made against them, calling themselves good Frenchmen and asking for a commander.

Extract of the letter of the 23<sup>d</sup> of August. M<sup>r</sup> Dubuisson has met, at the upper end of Tonti Island,<sup>1</sup> in Lake Ontario, a canoe full of men, women and children, and a deserter from Choueguen, who represent themselves to be Irish and dissatisfied, and were coming to take refuge among us to avoid a punishment they say they have incurred for having infringed certain prohibitions. They all escaped with their baggage which is pretty considerable. These deserters have been interrogated, and assert for a certainty, that the expedition against Canada was finally determined on and nearly ready; but the Pretender having returned to Scotland, a fact certain, the English have been obliged to direct their forces thitherward, and that in consequence, no sort of assistance has been received at this side; they assert that for one man that is enlisted, 3 desert; all the Choueguen traders have retired; only 60 persons remain there, including the garrison and officers; the majority are children, the remainder old men, with 300<sup>lb</sup> of powder which is all their supply. He, the soldier, says that if he be allowed 60 men, he will undertake to seize the fort. They have in reserve, in the redoubt, 25 @ 30<sup>ms</sup> worth of merchandise, blankets and other French goods, taken last year, which they show to all the Indians to persuade them that they are masters of the French, and that Canada is theirs; they have not taken any prize this year, nor heard any news of M<sup>r</sup> de La Jonquière's flight.

The Governor of Menade, according to his story, wished to corrupt M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire, to whom he offered a captain's commission; but not being successful, he endeavored to corrupt a party of Senecas, who are all divided. M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire has retired with his party and separated from the other villages; the other Iroquois Nations are, likewise, divided, part for the French and part for the English, who are endeavoring to corrupt them by all sorts of means. The chief of these deserters was answered; what reliance could be placed on this intelligence since they were suspected by the English, who, doubtless, concealed from them what they had an interest in keeping them ignorant of.

He replied: that he learned the particulars from the surgeon of the fort, who was his intimate friend during three years that he had traded at, and had not left, that post. These people appear to be sincere; they are to come down here in the first vessel. It is proposed to examine each of them separately; we look upon them with suspicion.

September 1st We send back the major portion of the Micmacs of Miramichi and Ristigouche, men, women and children; they had to be provided with provisions and ammunition. We have exorted them to make incursions against the enemy, either at Ile Royale or Acadia; and to prevent, especially, the transportation of cattle or other supplies from Acadia to Louisbourg.

Arrived, Pindalouan, an Outaouas chief and nine others, and a Sauteur of Michilimakinac, who are come to see the General.

3<sup>d</sup> Sailed, the snow L'Aimable Marguerite, Captain Foucher, for St. Domingo.

4th Arrived, the schooner La Brunette, from Martinico.

We learn by a courier from Rimousky, the arrival, at that place, of M. de la Galissonnière, with Le Northumberland, L'Alcion and La Gironde.

6th M<sup>r</sup> Michel writes us of the death of Taychatin, second chief of the Hurons of Detroit, who had come down from Detroit with M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre. We fear that the death of this Indian and that of Sastaredzy, grand chief of that Nation, will create some unfavorable impression on the minds of the Hurons of Detroit in the present conjuncture of affairs at that post.

Pindalouan and the other Outaouas of Michilimakinac have earnestly demanded permission to return home; we did not consider it our duty to induce them to remain, considering the lateness of the season. We have not failed to communicate to them the bad state of affairs at Michilimakinac. They appeared greatly surprised, and gave us to understand that their principal motive in returning immediately home, was to endeavor to put everything again in order. We have treated them well.

There is no reason to apprehend any attack on this Colony by the enemy this year. This circumstance has determined the General to issue orders for the recall of the videttes posted last spring at Rimousky, Cape Chat and Cape Desrosier; similar orders are issued to dismiss the guard of the signal fires posted along the South shore as far as Rimousky.

The brigantine St. Esprit, fitted out as a packet, has returned from Louisbourg. Being off (par le travers de) Miré, with a favorable wind to enter Louisbourg, a schooner discharged several shotted guns to make her lie to, and she accordingly lay to. M<sup>r</sup> Knowles was in this schooner; he had the brigantine taken to Portenove, and thence to Spaniard's bay,<sup>1</sup> whither the Governor proceeded. Two men of war, one of 50 and the other of 60 guns, joined them there. The English prisoners on board the St. Esprit have been transferred to the men of war. M<sup>r</sup> Knowles answers the General and informs him that there are no French prisoners at Louisbourg. Sieur Lefevre,* Captain of the packet, reports that he was only 3 days ashore at L'Espagnol,<sup>2</sup> where he merely learned that there were no other vessels at Louisbourg than the above two, the Governor's schooner and a bomb-ketch. M<sup>r</sup> Knowles told him that he was expecting M<sup>r</sup> Waren with eight men of war. He was then aware of the capture of M. de la Jonquière's fleet.

11th Father Germain arrives from Beaubassin to make some arrangements for the subsistence, during winter, of the Indians of said place.

Father Maurice Lacorne, missionary of the Micmacs of Miramichy, having lost his vessel at Gaspé, and having run the risk of being taken himself, did not feel disposed to return to his mission unless furnished with another vessel to be loaded with provisions, ammunition and goods required by his Indians for next winter. After having conferred together, we were of opinion that it was of consequence, under existing circumstances, to send Father Lacorne back. The King's brigantine, Le Soleil Levant,** which carried some codfish last fall to Bay Verte, was accordingly ordered by M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart to be fitted up for the conveyance, to Miramichy, of this missionary, with some provisions, ammunition and goods for the Indians of that mission.

11th Arrived the ship Blankfort, Captain Dechateau Brilliant, from Morlaix, freighted on the King's account; sailed from Abreverac, coast of Brittany, on the 30th of July last.

Sailed for Martinique the snow L'Amiable Jeanne, Captain Hiriard.

12th Idem. The brigantine Le Dragon, Captain Bisson, for the same place.

We learn from Montreal that Father La Richardie and M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre left that place on the 10th for Detroit, in company with the Hurons and Outaouas. M<sup>r</sup> Michel states that all the Upper Country Indians had left, after having emptied the King's stores at Montreal. We have still, at Quebec, the Indians of the Five Nations, whom we detain as long as possible. The Mohawks will not make any incursions as long as we shall have their brethren here, and we profit by this occasion to reinforce Forts Frontenac and Niagara.

* Sieur Guillimin, formerly Captain of the Corvet La Légère, who was wrecked on Sable Island, in the month of September, of last year, has just arrived in an English packet sent by the Governor of Boston, which place she left on the 10th of August, with 60 persons, men, women and children, the result, in part, of the evacuation of Ile Royale, with the seamen belonging to La Légère. This packet has been stopped at Ile aux Basques, 50 leagues from Quebec, by M<sup>r</sup> de Rouville, who had the General's orders to that effect.

Sieur Guillimin has given us the details of his shipwreck, and what he had learned during his sojourn at Boston and Louisbourg, where the packet touched on her voyage hither. These are the particulars: He went ashore on Sable Island during the night of the 14 and 15th of 7<sup>bre</sup>, after having thrown six guns overboard, and succeeded in saving only a little powder and lead, which were the means of preserving the lives of himself and crew during the winter. Four days after he discovered 3 Englishmen, who conducted him to a miserable cabin, in which he wintered. On the 5th day an English schooner passed, on board which he put his pilot, in order to receive assistance from the port where this vessel should touch. He remained on that island until the 13th June, when 6 English fishing smacks chanced to pass. They took him and his crew and carried them to Boston, where he arrived on the 22nd of the same month. He has been very civilly treated there until he sailed. Heard at Boston that the Government had made a levy of 4000 men, for the Canada expedition, next year. The affair at Minas has made great noise, and the Canada Indians are greatly dreaded there. The packet touched at Louisbourg, where he remained 8 days. Sieur Guillimin has learned from some Frenchmen, who remain still at that place, that when M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay was at Minas, last winter, the English were apprehensive that he would come also to Louisbourg; that under such apprehension, the soldiers were determined to run away from their officers, on the appearance of our people. 12 soldiers had been hanged on that occasion, and others shot in front of the regiment. Some time before Sieur Guillimin's arrival at that port, the garrison had again mutinied; the soldiers had attempted to fire one of the powder magazines, and the confusion and revolt occasioned severe punishments every day. Sickness appears to have ceased; Sieur Guillimin was assured that the garrison consisted only of 7 @ 800 men. There were at Louisbourg a vessel of war, of 54 guns, and 3 schooners of 12 guns, with very deficient crews. Two of these schooners left the harbor in company with the packet, it is said, on a cruise. Whilst the packet remained at Ile Royale, all the French at Louisbourg, included within the capitulation, to the number of 60 people, men, women and children, applied to M<sup>r</sup> Knowles for liberty to proceed to Quebec by that opportunity; he told them that he could not send them here, but would send them to France in a packet he should dispatch in a month. The people replied that they had been amused for a year past with this sort of answer, which had no effect. M<sup>r</sup> Knowles requested Sieur Guillimin to assure M<sup>r</sup> de Beauharnois, that he should send them. We are going to dispatch a vessel to Ile aux Basques to take on board the French prisoners, and shall send back by this packet 8 or 10 English, who had been taken at Sarastau and had not arrived at Quebec until after the sailing of the two packets we had already dispatched.

15th We received letters from Montreal, dated the 12th, informing us that the fleet from Michilimakinac, consisting of 30 canoes loaded with peltries, was on the point of arriving at Montreal. The Marquis de Beauharnois has received letters from Sieur Dénoyelle, Jun<sup>r</sup>, commanding at that post, where a little more quiet prevails.

17th Captain Boucherville, of a King's brigantine, who has been sent to the north coast of Newfoundland, has just arrived; he could get only 6 to 700 minots of salt, notwithstanding all his efforts in the harbors of that coast, and with the aid of men and boats furnished him by the captains of the Malouine ships.

A number of settlers have arrived within the last 15 days, in several skiffs, from Beaubassin and Port Toulouse, in search of provisions for the support of their families, who are in extreme want, without any resources. M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart could not refuse furnishing them 115 barrels of flour, some vegetables and goods.

Father Germain, who is here, has represented to us the necessity of immediately sending to Beaubassin, at least, 100 @ 120 barrels of flour, for the support of the Malecites and other Indians of different villages belonging to Acadia, with some munitions of war and some merchandise. Should these Indians not receive some aid, it is to be feared that distress will force them to have recourse to the English. We yielded to these representations. M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart has sent two skiffs to M<sup>r</sup> Maillard, the Indian missionary, with 400<sup>lb</sup> of powder and 1000<sup>lb</sup> of lead and ball, 30 blankets and some other articles, to be distributed among them by him, and 50 barrels of flour will be put on board Father Lacorne's vessel, to be kept at Miramichi, whither boats will be sent for them this fall from Bay Verte. All this consumption greatly increases the expenses, but it is impossible to avoid them, without abandoning the Indians of Acadia and the Micmacs, who, of all the nations, are the most faithful to us.

Father Germain has, in like manner, informed M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart that said Sieur Maillard was for the last year performing the functions of Indian missionary at Beaubassin, as he formerly did at St. Peter's, and had, during that time, been supported at the public expense, up to the departure of M<sup>r</sup> de Repentigny's detachment, but now, as there were no longer any public stores at Beaubassin, this missionary was unable to subsist should no provision be made here for him; that Sieur Maillard, besides, receives no salary as Indian missionary, wherefore it would be proper to send him goods to the value of about 600<sup>li</sup>; M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart, consequently, sends said M<sup>r</sup> Maillard, by a skiff, some goods from the public store to the amount of 600<sup>li</sup>.

Mention was made in this journal, in the month of March, of the provisions then sent to Lake Temisquata to remain there in store for M<sup>r</sup> de Ramezay's detachment, should it be forced to return by the River St. John. But this detachment having returned by sea, only a part of these provisions has been consumed by the couriers on their way from Beaubassin to Quebec, and more than  $\frac{3}{4}$ ths of them still remain; but these have become partially spoiled, during the summer, in consequence of the excessive heat. As there is no longer any French detachment at Acadia, this stock of provisions is useless; it would cost considerable to bring them back to Quebec, owing to the distance and the 25 leagues of portage from Lake Temisquata to the River (St. Lawrence). Moreover, Father Germain has represented that the settlers at the mouth of the River St. John were in extreme want of provisions, their harvest, this year, having totally failed. Under these circumstances, M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart has considered it best to relieve these settlers with the provisions at Lake Temisquata, than to have these brought back to Quebec; the transport would cost as much as they are worth, and he has, in consequence, issued orders to the commissaries at the lake to hand over the provisions, such as they are, to Father Germain, who is about to return to Beaubassin, in order that he may distribute them among the poor settlers on the River St. John.

20th A party of Indians belonging to the River St. John, who had wintered at St. Martin, near Quebec, applied to the number of 100, in the beginning of this month, for permission to return to their villages; they have been clothed and supplied with provisions to carry them home; also with some ammunition; 250 of that nation still remain here, they will be dependent on the King's bounty during the next winter.

18th The vessel L'Alcion, and the flyboat La Gironde, have entered the basin.

19th A. M. The Northumberland has also entered the basin, and cast anchor in the stream; Count de la Galissonnière<sup>1</sup> landed at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

20th Pindalouan, an Outaouas chief, having been to meet the men of war, remained on board of them 3 days; he has been very well treated and greatly caressed there; he has requested leave to return to Montreal to join his party, which left some days ago; a bark canoe has been detailed to take him back.

Sieur Cartier, commandant of the fire rafts at Ile aux Coudres and vicinity, has been written to, directing him to return home after he shall have secured the King's property of which he was guardian.

21st Some 25 or 30 chiefs and Indians of Saut St. Louis, have come to Quebec to visit the Count de la Galissonnière.

Father Germain, the missionary at Beaubassin, departed to-day on his return to his mission.

The schooner which had been sent to Ile aux Basques to convey the English prisoners to the packet there, and to receive the French prisoners she had on board, has returned with 60 Frenchmen, of whom 40 are sailors, who were forthwith distributed, part on board La Martre and the remainder on board L'Emeraude.

Their speech and the answer are herewith annexed. 24th The Indians of the 5 Nations who have been a long time at Quebec, have to-day received their presents: they made fine speeches and have been answered. They asked for an Oneida and a Seneca whom we have prisoners, who have been given up to them.

François Briant, a settler of Port Thoulouse, who has just arrived by sea, reports having seen off the Bay des Chaleurs, on the 12th of this month, 3 sail, one of which was a brigantine, one a schooner, and one a bomb-ketch, which were cruising in that roadstead. He presumes they are English vessels, whose design was to capture a Bayonne ship that was fishing off Port Daniel. He has added, that on leaving Bay Verte, he had heard that news had arrived of the sailing from Louisbourg of two men of war of 60 guns, on the 16th of August, to attack, it was reported, the vessels that are fishing in the Gulf (la Grande Baie).

29th The Abenakis of St Francis and of Becancourt, and the Algonkins of 3 Rivers and of Missiskouy, and others, to the number of about 200, have come to see M. de la Galissonnière.

A party of Abenakis brings in a young child who was taken prisoner in the vicinity of Casco; they report nothing of interest.

October 3<sup>d</sup> Twenty Abenakis have just arrived from fighting in the direction of Fort St. George,<sup>2</sup> where they happened to be 60 strong; they had divers rencontres with the English; they were unfortunate and allowed themselves to be surrounded. The missionary writes us that the two chiefs had lost, in the last engagement, two of their children, one of whom was the son of Sagouaurabb, and a third son of Louis Mescadoué, who were killed; 4 other Indians have been wounded. Indians say they killed also some of the English; those who come in subsequently bring 5 scalps.<sup>3</sup> It is not to be apprehended that this ill success will discourage our people; on the contrary, we are told it renders them more zealous.

We learn the arrival of M<sup>r</sup> de Verchères at Michilimakinac. This officer informs the General that he had met, on the way, 5 of the Indian canoes that had attacked the French, and that he had pursued them. The Indians landed and fled into the woods; our Frenchmen caught one of them, whom they tied, and have broken 5 canoes. Some property belonging to Frenchmen, and a scalp, were found in the prisoner's sack; he was asked how he got them; answered, that those at the head of the Bay had made him a present of them. Finally, to other interrogatories, he persisted in saying that he was not guilty. 2 Outaouas' canoes that were in last summer's campaign, arriving next day from Montreal, claimed the prisoner, assuring M<sup>r</sup> de Verchères that he belonged to the family of Koquois, a chief who is attached to the French and known to M<sup>r</sup> de Verchères, who released the prisoner, making the most to them of the favor he did them.

5th The St. Francis and Becancourt missionaries have come down to Quebec. The former has informed us of the return of the 3 parties of Abenakis, with 5 scalps, from the English settlements towards Casco and Piscataoué. Several parties from these two villages, still in the field, are expected home.

It is impossible to collect all the expeditions made by our domiciliated Indians belonging to these two villages and those of Montreal; they have been almost continual.

7th We have removed the Micmac and Malecites villages that were at St. Michel, 3 leagues from Quebec, to the River du Sud,<sup>1</sup> 5 leagues further and one league in the woods. Being further off they will be less importunate, and less burdensome to us and the farmers. We would have wished to send them all home but have not been able to persuade them to go.

The greater portion of the village of Pannaouamské and Medoctet are still at the River Etréchémis. We are about trying to send them to St. Francis and Becancourt; we employ the missionaries of these two villages, who are actually at Quebec, to induce them to adopt that course.

Arrive 11 Christinaux, who are come to see the Marquis de la Galissonnière.

9th We are in receipt of letters from Forts Frontenac and Niagara, from Detroit, from Sieur de Joncaire and Fort de Chartres, whereby we are informed that all the Nations in general continue to be very ill disposed towards the French. Chevalier de Longueuil writes, the 14th of July, that those of the Lake, Sauteurs and Outaouas, are on the eve of attacking Detroit; that a new attempt was to be made about the time of the full moon; that he has lost almost all the cattle; and fears that they will perish, being all at the discretion of the enemy, and that it will be impossible to save the harvest unless aid arrive; that he is waiting impatiently for the arrival of the fleet, which he thinks to retain for the security of Detroit; that he has learned nothing certain from Sandoské; he has been told that Nicolas was abandoned, but does not believe it. On the contrary, he knows that he is in correspondence with the people of Saguinaw and the Sauteurs to come and surprise Detroit; that, should that happen, Miquinac, an Outaouas chief, will declare against us; he receives daily accounts of the ill dispositions of the Pouteouatamis who will side with the strongest, according to all appearances. The tribe of Quinousaki, an Outaouas, is the only one that remains faithful. Tahaké, a Huron, who was supposed to have died among the English, has returned; he has treated the Nations of Detroit, which has had a very bad effect. The Outaouas and Pouteouatamis, who had promised to go and burn the village on Bois blanc island, are no longer willing to execute that project; they excuse themselves on divers pretexts. It is evident they avoid occasions of giving mutual offence, but he will eventually prevent the enemy seizing that post, which they covet in order to block up the passages on us.

M<sup>r</sup> Duplessis, commandant at Niagara, writes the 8th of September, that Sieur Dubuisson has arrived with the convoy which left Montreal for Detroit; the portage was passed very promptly and quietly, except the last night, when some drunken fellows of the guard had gravely ill-treated the Grand Chief of the Senecas, who is very much dissatisfied in consequence; but he has sent Sieur Chabert to the village of the Little Rapid, with something to restore the temper of that Chief; that an Algonkin told Sieur Duplessis that M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil had had a reinforcement of 100 Frenchmen, who must be the traders from the Illinois and other posts. A letter from M. de Longueuil states that he is engaged in the harvest, and that the Indians seem apparently greatly disposed in our favor, but he does not trust them. We expect that the arrival of the convoy will restore tranquillity, in one way or the other, to this post.

That the Mohawks have been seven entire weeks in the vicinity of Fort Niagara; that he persuaded the Senecas, at last, to fire on them; they did so, but too soon; that they had spoken very harshly to them for coming to create disturbance in their country, since which time he has neither seen, nor heard of them.

M<sup>r</sup> Duplessis sends us a copy of a letter from Sieur de Joncaire, of the 12th of August, wherein he says that the Chief, who had been to give back his crown, has been invited to Orange, and that the council of Boston has sent to Choueguin for him, and that he has left the Seneca Villages with 22 men, apparently to strike a blow on our frontiers, as is generally supposed; moreover, two children, belonging to the Orator of the Village, having been taken prisoners at Montreal, he is very much afraid that their father, who leaves soon for Orange, will collect some warriors in the villages on the way, who, by the time they reach Orange, will form a large aggregate that might make some serious attacks on us; that there is every appearance of war with the Five Nations; that the Choueguin merchants are withdrawing in bodies and are all escorted by detachments of Indians from each nation, all of whom remain at Orange; this leads him to suspect that some considerable party is being organized; he will not omit any opportunity of learning all the particulars, but had he not been up there all the nations would have been gone; besides, a Dutchman had assured him that no news had been received at Orange from England; he suspects that the 100 Flatheads, which were coming against the Senecas, have returned, and that one-half of that, and of the Little Rapid, village is divided, one part being for war, and the other to remain neutral.

10th Arrived, the brigantine Le Dauphin, sailed on the 10th of August, from Bayonne, with a cargo of wine, brandy and about 3 @ 400 minots of salt.

We learn from Montreal that Ensign De Lery has been detached in the beginning of this month, with a party of 80 men, French and Indians, of Saut S<sup>t</sup> Louis, on an expedition against the Mohawks.

M<sup>r</sup> de Noyelle, Jun<sup>r</sup>, has also gone, with 40 other Indians of the Saut, on an expedition in the same direction.

14th Sieur Masse, who has been the whole year at Cape Chat, has returned.

We receive letters from Michilimakinac informing us of the arrival of Chevalier de La Verendrye, who has found that post very quiet; the Outaouas are beginning to be sorry for what occurred last year.

Sieur Denoyelle, the commandant, sends the General the list of those who murdered the Frenchmen, at the entrance to Lake Huron. Two Sautaux Indians, in order to show that they were not guilty, have brought to Sieur Denoyellé their share in the division the murderers made; but, 'tis true, that on perceiving their people pursuing and firing on a canoe, they went in with them and did as the rest.

States that Philippes Le Duc, who arrived at Michilimakinac on the 23rd of August last, had been robbed by the Indians of Camanistigoya,<sup>1</sup> who took from him fourteen packages and 5 fusils; they were collected to the number of 100 and over, at the low lands (aux pays plats) on Lake Superior, waiting for the French.

Sieur Denoyelle was advised, on the 24th, that the Sauteux had accepted the hatchet from the English, and were to prepare ambuscades in Lake Superior to prevent any Frenchmen leaving the next spring. Nevertheless, all the canoes have left for the different posts at the north, as usual, keeping one another company until they are past the most dangerous places; they are to rendezvous in the spring to return in the same order.

31 Abenakis arrive from an expedition towards Fort St. George, with only 2 scalps, have not been able to make any prisoners.<sup>2</sup>

Sieur Aubert is returned from Cape Desrosier with 30 men, who passed the summer with him. There is no more talk of English vessels in the neighborhood of Gaspé.

22<sup>d</sup> Le Northumberland, L'Alcyon, La Gironde and L'Emeraude sailed at 8 o'clock this morning, with a fair wind from the S. W.; they have been detained until now by contrary winds.

23<sup>d</sup> We learn from St. Francis that 28 Abenakis, belonging to that village, have gone to New England on a war excursion.

25th A courier arrives from Acadia. Father Germain writes us, on the 14th instant, that he dispatches this courier with information that he is positively assured the English would attack Fort St. Frederic this winter; that the news is a secret, and not much bruited; that, moreover, two English deserters, who came to Beaubassin from Port Royal, have told him the same thing; that the garrison consists of only 250 old soldiers; that they had heard it said that the Governor of Boston would not send any troops to the fort, because those he had sent last year had been defeated at Minas, or had perished by the way.

Abbé Maillard, who is likewise at Beaubassin, communicates the same news to us; he had received the supplies we had sent him and his Indians, whom he will get to act agreeably to Count de la Galissonnière's wishes, and hopes they will get up some expeditions this winter; that he will be obliged to incur some expense in provisions, &c; that the Commandant of Port Royal was aware of the arrival of some vessels at Quebec, and expects to be blockaded.

Sieur Gautier writes to the same effect, &c, and that 40 Englishmen belonging to the garrison of Port Royal, have been detached to Minas to surprise such of the settlers as have formerly taken up arms in favor of France; that they had returned precipitately, on learning, on their arrival at Minas, that one of his children had been to notify the Indians. Sieur Gautier recommends his interests to us.

We sent back the couriers to Beaubassin on the same day.

We learn from Montreal that 4 @ 5 negroes, who had been taken from the English during the war, have deserted. Some of the Saut Indians have been sent in pursuit of them, who returned without having been able to overtake them; they are suspected of having favored the escape of these negroes. It will be proper, henceforward, to send all these foreign negroes to the Islands to be sold there.

The canoes of the Hundred have come down from Fort Frontenac, without bringing any news. The King's bark, which had sailed 25 days previously, for Niagara, had not yet returned. No accident is anticipated; on the contrary it is supposed that it has been retarded by the arrival of the canoes from Detroit.

31st Arrived the brigantine La Pupille, 120 tons burthen, Captain Curodeau, commander, who was sent to Martinico on the 25th July last, brings a cargo of rum, sugar and coffee, and some English dry goods and 40 barrels of salt; this last article, though small the quantity, will be an essential relief in our present situation; it will be distributed as usual in small measures among the farmers who have not been able to obtain any in the first distribution. Sieur Curodeau has come through the straits of Belleîle; learned at Bay Phelipeaux, that two English frigates and one vessel appeared before Kerpont, and had carried off a St. Malo ship called Le Grand Joseph, Captain Deshayes, the crew of which escaped, but the captain would not quit. The Marquis de Caylus writes on the 25th of July, that M<sup>r</sup> Legs<sup>1</sup> is in the Windward Islands channel, with 12 men of war. Said Curodeau took off the North coast the crew of a schooner belonging to Sieur Pommereau, which sailed this fall for the fishery of the Great Mécatina,<sup>2</sup> and was lost near that post. He saw about 4 days ago, the King's ships anchored at the Brandy pots; they were preparing to sail.

November 2. We learn from Montreal that the 4 fugitive negroes have been overtaken and brought back to that place.

6th John Gannes, late mate of the ship St. Joseph, of St Malo, commanded by Sieur George Deshayes, has arrived from Newfoundland in a boat, with 19 men belonging to the crew of said ship. The following is an extract from his journal.

On the 20th of September, wind S. W., perceived off the harbor of Grillet,<sup>3</sup> at the distance of half the range of a cannon ball, one 64 gun ship, 3 frigates of 28 to 30 guns, and a 14 gun schooner, all of which set about sounding the points in the neighborhood of the harbor; it was eight o'clock in the morning; after examining the depth of water, they began working up the two channels of the harbor for the space of 6 leagues, carrying no sail. In the evening the large vessel put a spring on her cable in order to bring her broadside to bear; this determined the 3 captains of L'heureuse Marie, le Sauveur and le Joseph, to send an officer with an offer of a ransom on board the English commander, who would not listen to it. Sieur Deshayes and the other captains resolved on surrendering, and he, John Degannes and 19 men, left Grillet the same day at 8 o'clock in the evening, in a boat with some provisions for Kerpont, where they took a schooner (double chaloupe) which brought them to Quebec.

The ships Le Tourneur, La Valeur and a sloop, sailed last evening from the latter port for France.

9th Arrived a party of Abenakis belonging to St. Francis, who struck a blow near Fort St. George; they have brought in a young lad about 15 years old, a prisoner; he reports nothing; they killed his father whose scalp they have with them.

We learn that the King's ships passed Rimouski, on the 30th of last month, with a favorable wind.

Abstract of M. de la Galissonnière's Despatches.

CANADA.

8th January, 1748.<sup>1</sup> Count de Lagalissonnière, Commander-in-chief of the Colony, gives an account of the different war parties, consisting of Canadians and Indians, which had made incursions into the English Colonies during the late war.

It appears from the details he enters into, that these parties have experienced their usual success in the enemy's territory; the number of scalps they have taken amounts to one hundred and fifty, and they captured one hundred and twelve prisoners. Of all these parties only one was unsuccessful; this was composed of ten Canadians and sixty Abenakis Indians from the villages of Saint Francis and Becancourt, and was commanded by Chevalier de Niverville, Ensign en second of a company of Colonial troops, who, having proceeded towards Boston, was discovered and surprised by a detachment of the enemy much superior to his. He would have been utterly defeated, but defended himself with so much bravery that he lost only two Indians and had only five others wounded.

The most considerable of these parties has been commanded by Sieur Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Major of Three Rivers. It was composed of about twelve hundred men, including French and Indians, and was organized in consequence of repeated advices the Governor-General and Intendant received of the preparations making at Orange to attack Fort S<sup>t</sup> Frederic. M. Rigaud's orders were to proceed first to relieve that fort, under the supposition that it was attacked, and if it was not in danger, to employ his detachment in some expedition against Orange.

Finding that Fort S<sup>t</sup> Frederic had nothing to fear, M. Rigaud determined to enter into the Province of Albany to try to take Fort Sarastau, which protects a part of the frontier of that Province.

He first detached Sieur de la Corne S<sup>t</sup> Luc, Ensign of a company, with two hundred men, to attack the garrison. On arriving in the vicinity of that fort, M. de St. Luc sent out some Indians to ascertain what was going on there; but one of them, having inadvertently fired a gun, they were discovered. M. de St. Luc, not doubting then but the garrison would make a sortie, placed the greater portion of his men in ambush and left only fifteen exposed to the enemy, who did, in fact, come out to the number of one hundred. This detachment, proceeding some distance from the fort, found itself surrounded, and fifteen or twenty men only escaped, all the rest having been killed, drowned or taken.

Sieur de Rigaud wished to march immediately with his entire force ; but the Indians who accompanied him, and composed the major part of the force, being divided in opinion as to what was proper to be done, finished by abandoning the party, and Sieur de Rigaud, finding himself thereby too weak, considered it his duty to return and protect Fort St. Frederic, fearing that the enemy might wish to profit by his retreat to try an attack on that place.

CANADA INDIANS.

5th April, 1748.<sup>1</sup> Count de Lagalissonnière being desirous to punish such of the Michilimakinac and Detroit Nations as had, at the instigation of the English, made incursions on the French, sent, last year, strong detachments to those two posts; but before that destined for Michilimakinac had arrived, the Indians, who were complained of, came to sue for pardon from the Commandant of the post, and delivered to him the two principal chiefs of the revolted party. Those of Detroit had fled to a distant village of that post, whence they sent deputies to sue for pardon; so that there is reason to hope that peace will be soon established in the Upper country, these Indians being the only ones on this Continent who have made any hostile movements during the war.

But the chiefs of the Michilimakinac rebels having been brought to Montreal, and Count de Lagalissonnière having resolved to send to Quebec, where they were put on board a canoe, the crew of which consisted of a sergeant and eight soldiers. These were murdered on going down the river, and there was no doubt but the blow was struck by Indians, who, when drunk, had formed the design of rescuing the two prisoners.

Since the defeat of the two principal parties sent to Canada by the Mohawks in seventeen hundred and forty-seven, these Indians have made no further attempts, and the other Iroquois Nations who came to visit Count de Lagalissonnière have assured him that they did not trouble themselves any more except how to deserve his favor. This Governor has taken advantage of the arrival of these Indians to reproach them with their conduct towards those of the Upper country, whom they wished to attach to the English party. This reproach seems to have made the more impression, inasmuch as Count de Lagalissonnière had given them to understand that it depended only on him to arm against them the most of these same Nations whom they had been seeking to gain over to the English.

He afterwards spoke to them of the pretensions put forth on all occasions, to both their lands and themselves, by the English, who regard them as subjects of the Crown of England, and they have departed resolved to go and oppose this pretension. Count Lagalissonnière observes, thereupon, that they will have used the less management towards the English inasmuch as the latter had been treated with the greatest contempt in the two last Assemblies to which they had invited these Indians. He states, also, that, with a view to favor and increase the credit of the Cayugas, one of their Nations, which has almost always been in the French interests, he had ordered the surrender to them of one of the Senecas who had been taken prisoners in the two expeditions got up by the Mohawks.

My Lord.

In answer to one of your last despatches dated the 25th of April, and which reached me only by Le Zephir, I believe I have spoken to you somewhat at length of our Illinois establishments.

They possess this perhaps in common with all that relates to the Mississippi, that after having been praised greatly beyond their just value, scarcely a person can be found to-day who regards them as good for anything. I believe both extremes must be avoided, and here is what I think.

I regard the profits of the mines as very uncertain, and besides as so remote and dependent on so many other antecedent establishments, that no calculation can be made respecting them without, meanwhile, forever despairing of them.

I believe the fur trade carried on there one of the least advantageous in Canada, but I cannot speak with exactness.

The most I hope to draw from the country of the mines, is some bundles of buffalo skins.

I believe it extremely necessary that Louisiana be so settled as to derive flour and other life necessities from points nearer than the Illinois.

In fine, I believe that it will be a long time before the King will realize any actual revenue, or individuals any considerable profit, from the Illinois; on the contrary, 'twill cost the King something to settle it.

But for all that, I am very far from concluding that the whole of that little Colony ought be left to perish. On the contrary, I consider that the King must make some sacrifice for its support.

1<sup>mo</sup> So as not to lose what has been already expended there as a Colony.

2<sup>o</sup> Because it is one of the best situated barriers that can be opposed to the ambition of the English, to prevent them penetrating into our trading countries, and even into Mexico.

3<sup>o</sup> Because, were that country well settled, it would render us formidable to all the nations on the lower division of the River Mississippi.

4<sup>o</sup> Because bread, meat and other provisions will attract thither the Indians, whose alliance and trade will be useful to us.

5<sup>o</sup> Had there been, for example, 400 @ 500 men capable of bearing arms in the Illinois, this war, not only would our small posts of Sabache, &c., not have been disturbed, but the very nations who have frequently insulted us, would have been led even into the heart of the most flourishing English Colonies.

And here it is well to remark, that we must not flatter ourselves that our Continental Colonies; that is to say, this and Louisiana, can ever compete in wealth with the adjoining English Colonies, nor even carry on any very lucrative trade; for, except peltry, the amount of which is limited, and whose profits are and will be always diminishing, we shall scarcely ever have it in our power to furnish any but similar commodities to those of Europe; we shall not be able to supply them at the same price, though mostly of inferior quality, and though ours is an immense country, we have no outlet except by two rivers equally out of the way, whose navigation is inconvenient and perilous.

We are reduced then to make the most of the principal advantage of the country, which is its extreme productiveness and the facility of feeding a great many there without almost any foreign labor.

France derives from itself and its other Colonies, every sort of production; this one will not produce for a long time anything but men, but if wanted, 'twill produce in a sufficiently short time, so great a number of these, that, far from fearing English Colonies or Indian tribes, she will be in a position to dictate the law to them. And it is proper to remark that these Colonies are so precious to England, that if once Canada be sufficiently powerful in men to endanger them, this apprehension would rather have the effect of preventing the English making, as they so often do, a bad use of their maritime power.

As these views, though remote, must, it appears to me, engage our attention, I see no settlement more urgent than that of the Illinois. It is a country easy to cultivate and to clear, and greatly coveted by our neighbors.

Already there is a pretty goodly number of families there, and those who will follow by degrees are sure of provisions.

But it is very difficult, not to say impossible, to increase the Illinois much from the Mississippi, which itself is in want of population, and will, by the beauty of its climate and the vicinity of the sea, always rather attract people from the Illinois than the Illinois draw any from Louisiana.

If to this we add the difficulties of ascending the Mississippi; the facilities hostile tribes have of arresting your upward progress, and the convenience Canadian Traders possess of going to the Illinois by four or five different routes, which cannot be all blocked at the same time, it will be seen that it is Canada which is to furnish this population; and this, I think, is the manner it can be done.

I have expressly provided that the officers to be sent thither should be under Mr de Bertet's orders, for I do not think it easy to find an officer as capable as he of managing and perfecting this settlement. I know him only by the reputation I have heard of him, and from the accounts I have had of him since I came here; and if there be anything valuable and true in what I have stated above, it is derived from his letters.

It is there I also find a remark essential to the subject. Should populous Illinois be capable of harassing the English Colonies, these possess scarcely less facilities for seizing the Illinois, if left in their present languishing condition. Of all the countries in our occupation, this is the one which they can invade most easily with the smallest force; and could they once succeed in thus intruding themselves between our two Colonies, the loss of the Mississippi and the ruin of the internal trade of Canada would be assured, and the Spanish Colonies, and even Mexico, be in very great danger.

The result of all this is, that by connecting the Illinois with Canada, little will be gained in the item of the expense of the troops, the number of which, it seems to me, must rather be increased than diminished. In other respects, they are absolutely necessary there to restrain the Indians, and sometimes the settlers, and to increase in time the number of these latter.

For want of sufficient soldiers M<sup>r</sup> de Bertet has been, during the entire war, in continual danger, from which he has extricated himself, principally by his good conduct, and in some degree by the help of the ammunition and goods transmitted to him from this place.

It is to be also remarked that this post being situate at the extremity of our two Colonies, the Coureurs de bois and other bad subjects usually take refuge there, where they would possess opportunities of creating a great deal of disorder, should the commanding officer not have means at hand to repress them.

Much is not to be expected from farming this post, which I believe would be completing its ruin; some money, at most, can be derived from licenses, or those who will obtain them can be obliged to transport ammunition, and I know not if that even can be effected.

I agree with you, my Lord, in opinion that it is a matter of indifference whether an officer from Canada, or an officer from Louisiana, command at the Illinois, as far as its settlement, or the defence or even the existence of Louisiana is concerned.

He can always have orders to send down to New Orleans the largest quantity of flour possible, and to procure for that city, and whatever is connected with it, all the assistance in his power.

In order that there should be abundance in that post, and that its settlement be promoted, I see no objection to the Governor of Mississippi as well as the Governor of Canada, granting, or even selling, Trading Licenses for that place, provided the price be low, as that will not give rise to any discussion (n'y aiant aura point de discution).

This, my Lord, is nearly what I can answer on the subject of the Illinois.

I defer to a future time treating of all the posts of Canada, and, moreover, take the liberty of requesting you to consult M. Hocquart on that matter, though we may not be precisely of the same opinion.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient Servant,

LA GALISSONNIÈRE.

Occurrences in Canada during the year 1747-8.

Journal of whatever occurred of interest at Quebec in regard to the operations of the war, and the various intelligence received there since the sailing of the ships in November, 1747.

1747. November 8. The General issues orders to Chevalier de la Corne, who is about to start for Montreal, to repair, on his arrival, to Saut St Louis and withdraw from the Indians certain Dutchmen at present in their hands, and who, it is suspected, transmit intelligence to their country.

10th We are in receipt of letters from Michilimakinac. Lieutenant de St. Pierre, who had been selected to command the convoy sent to that post, arrived there without any accident in 45 days. Captain de Verchères, appointed commandant at the Bay,<sup>1</sup> and who was to remain at Michilimakinac with his traders from Montreal, had taken his departure thence for his post with the voyageurs. M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre writes us, on the 22<sup>d</sup> of October, that he has not been able to speak to the Indians, who were, when he arrived, all gone to their winter quarters without having given any token of repentance for the outrage they had perpetrated. It is, hence, to be presumed that they persist in their evil dispositions; that the Marquis de Beauharnois' orders, sent with Sieur de Laverendrie in the month of August, have been badly executed; that 'twas the only means of reducing those Nations; that he does not anticipate success otherwise than by depriving them of the supplies they derive for the support of their families, and which they cannot dispense with; this might have been effected were the traders prevented going to the different posts, according to the Marquis de Beauharnois' intentions; and this officer takes this occasion of saying, that it would be well not to allow the canoes to leave Montreal next spring for Michilimakinac and other posts, until he have informed us of the sentiments in which the Nations of that country will then be, and as soon as he shall have learned their intentions he will take occasion to report them to us.

M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre adds, that he has recalled a Pouteouatamie chief, who was going to Montreal with the French who were taking down their peltries; it is the only Nation to be relied on. He has spoken to this chief by two Belts; the first, to congratulate him on the good conduct observed up to the present time by the people of his tribe, hinting to him that they ought not to listen to evil talks; that they ought to hearken only to their father's words, which alone they ought to rely on. The second, to engage them not to leave their village, as he has been informed that M. de Bertet, the commandant at the Illinois, was using every appliance at his disposal to attract them, which would be very prejudicial to the public service, because, being sure of the fidelity of that Nation, it will always be a barrier in the way of the others, and the means to keep them in check.

Sends back Sieur Lavérendie, Jun<sup>r</sup>, to Montreal in command of the convoy he brought to Michilimakinac.

The General selects Captain de Sabrevois to command Fort St. Frederic in place of M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron, whom he has relieved.

11th The 4 Negroes and a Panis, who were captured from the English during the war and had run away from Montreal, as mentioned in the entry of the 28th of October, in the preceding Journal, have been overtaken and brought in to-day ; we intend to put them on board a small vessel bound to Martinico, the last in port ; these slaves will be sold there for the benefit of the proprietors.

News from Detroit.

14th We are in receipt of letters from Chevalier de Longueuil, commandant of Detroit, dated 24th and 25th of August last, whereof this is an extract :

The Hurons of Sandosket, and of Nicolas' band, continue insolent ; this chief is unceasing in his efforts to gain allies.

Divers Huron war parties that had been against the Chicachas, Cohas, &c., have returned, and been to see M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, like people who have no share in Nicolas' affairs ; but the ambiguities of their talk afford nothing to be relied on.

The same Nicolas sent back the people of the White river who were on their way to Detroit, on account of the death of the 5 Frenchmen killed by the Hurons. He likewise persuaded 27 Chaouenons to turn back who were coming to answer M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil's message, and as the sole result of the expenses incurred for that nation (of the village of Sonnioto), he saw one Chaouenon arrive on the 23<sup>d</sup> of August, in company with 3 Iroquois, who, on landing, went to the little Huron village adjoining the fort ; being desirous, no doubt, to consult with the Huron and arrange the speech they were to deliver. These deputies had not been to visit M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil until the next day, the 24th, giving as an excuse that they did not land at the fort ; they had not yet spoken on the 25th, the date of this officer's last letter ; and were not to do so until the 27th. Some trusty Indians have assured him that any secrets they would communicate to him would certainly be discovered by these deputies. Kinousaki, an Outaouas chief, who is attached to us, has said that no matter how things would turn, the Chaouenons will never consent to leave their village of Sonnioto, which circumstance would be favorable to us.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil had just learned underhand, through some Indians who were acquainted with the 4 deputies, that some Englishmen had come to Sandosket with ammunition to Nicolas and his men. The Hurons of the village on Bois blanc island, who are near the fort, have seen these two Englishmen, and have not spoken of them, which proves clearly their understanding with those of Sandosket, and that they requested leave to remain near the fort only for the purpose of watching our movements more closely, so as to inform Nicolas thereof, and to advise him of the preparations that may be making against him. These same Hurons persist, however, in wishing to return to Bois blanc island, because it is their interest to occupy that post which is the key of Detroit, whilst Nicolas on his side will draw the English to him, and afford them facilities for establishments all along Lake Erie as far as the Miamis river. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil is not in a condition to oppose all these enterprises ; he is a witness of their project every day, without having the power to make the first step to counteract them ; which excites wonder among the other nations, and leads them to entertain unfavorable opinions in regard to us.

The Outaoua appears altogether insensible to the misfortunes that threaten the fort, and does not care about helping us.

The Pouteouatamis are, as M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil believes, the best disposed ; he has no fault to find with them ; they are, consequently, the only persons he can confide in.

A party of the Miamis have come to dance the Calumet at the fort; another section have been to visit Nicolas at Sandosket; the ceremony attendant on the former has been very expensive; their reception, the good cheer for the space of 15 days, and the presents which have been made to them with a view both to destroy unfavorable impressions among them, and to protect the lives of the French who are in their village, have cost a great deal.

Such was the state of affairs at Detroit on the 25th of August. We are in hopes that the arrival of the convoy and of Father Larichardie will contribute to the peace of that post, or, at least, that the reinforcements we have sent thither will enable M. de Longueuil to resist the attacks of our enemies, if he can do nothing against them, after having exhausted all available means, regard being had to existing circumstances.

Miamis.

Ensign Douville, who had been sent last spring to invite the Miamis to come down to Montreal, writes to the Marquis de la Galissonnière from Detroit 25th of August, that after some delay he had arrived at that post with Coldfoot, the chief of the Miamis, the Porc-Epic<sup>1</sup> and their young men whom he was bringing down to Montreal; he had learnt, by a letter from the Commandant of Niagara, that there was a party of Mohawks at the portage of that fort; moreover, that Chevalier de Longueuil had just learned the derangement of the affairs of Michilimakinac, which has obliged Sieur Douville to send back these Indians who have given him all their messages, as did also the other nations when he was with them, and all have authorized him to inform their father of their sentiments towards the French. These nations are in absolute want of powder.

Sieur Douville states that he has had news from the Miamis, that everything was quiet since his departure on the 3<sup>d</sup> of July.

He has had assurances that the Senecas had given an English Belt to La Demoiselle, chief of a portion of the Miamis, allies of the English, to procure his, Sieur Douville's assassination, with a reward to whomsoever should carry his head to the English Governor. The same course has been pursued towards M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil.

Ouyatanons.

Ensign Chevalier de La Peyrade, commandant at the post of the Ouyatanons, writes from Detroit, on the 24th of August, that he was on his way down to Montreal with the Nations from the Oubache, when he learned, in the Miamis river, the treachery of the Hurons; that this intelligence, conjoined to other circumstances, obliged those Nations to return to their village, where they were pretty quiet when he left them to come to Detroit, where he is waiting for news from Niagara to return to the Ouyatanons to continue his service there.

We are in receipt, also, of news from the River St. Joseph. Sieur Laperrière Marin, commanding at that post, writes us on the 5th and 30th of July last. It appears that the English are endeavoring to debauch the Nations belonging to that post, as well as all the others, by the unfavorable impressions they are trying to insinuate among them by means of the 5 Nations, who continue to embroil all the affairs, and employ every pretext to bring about the destruction of the French of that post. The Pouteouatamies appear always in our interests; they have made many protestations to Sieur La Perrière of the attachment they have long felt, and will continue to entertain, for their father, the French.

Fifty Ouyatanons came to said post on the River St. Joseph, to express the pain they felt at the treachery of the Hurons at Detroit; that they are ready to attack those who had killed the French; that their father had only to speak.

The commandants at Niagara and Fort Frontenac write us, also, on the 10th of October. Everything was quiet there.

The 5 Slaves.

16th The vessel destined for the islands, which is the last in port, cannot accommodate the five slaves we intended to put on board it; but as we understand that the ships La Chimèrre and La Sultane, bound for S<sup>t</sup> Domingo, which sailed eight days ago, are still lying wind bound at la prairie, with the other vessels, we resolve to dispatch the port sloop to convey to these vessels the 5 slaves to be sold at St. Domingo.

19th The port sloop which was dispatched on the 16th has returned; the 5 slaves were placed on board La Chimèrre and La Sultane on the 17th instant. These ships and the rest of our fleet which left here on the 11th, set sail on the morning of the 15th with a favorable wind from the S. W.

News from Detroit.

23<sup>d</sup> We are in receipt of news from Detroit and the Illinois. The former are very interesting. Chevalier de Longueuil, the commandant, writes us, on the 22<sup>d</sup> of October last, and gives us an account of what occurred at his post since the 25th of August, the date of his last despatch. The following is the substance of his communication:

Blow struck at Michilimakinac.<sup>1</sup> The 4 Chaouennon deputies who arrived on the 23<sup>d</sup> of August, spoke on the 26th; he does not place much reliance on what they had said; he had, notwithstanding, treated them well. These Indians have remained long enough at Detroit to discover the thoughts of the other Nations, and the difficulty under which the post labored; they have also been witnesses of a new attack which the Sauteurs of the River Aux Sables, who murdered the Frenchmen at Chibaoenani, have just made at Detroit within  $\frac{1}{4}$ th of a league of the fort, where they killed, on the 31st of August, a settler named Martineau who had imprudently gone too far into the woods. These murderers, 4 in number, scalped him, and it is asserted, sent, on the part of Mamahoëkisigo, the scalp to the Iroquois with two pieces of cloth from the pillage of Chabaoënani.

The Montreal convoy arrived safe at Detroit on the 22<sup>d</sup> of September, escorted by about 150 men, including the merchants and their servants. This relief is the salvation of Detroit, and has apparently made an impression on the Nations.

The Miamis, and perhaps also the Ouyatanons, are in disorder. The former allowed themselves to be gained over by the Belts of Nicolas, who represented to them that Detroit had been razed by the Lake tribes; that consequently they could no longer defer killing the French who were among them. The Miamis have listened to this message. They, first, seized eight Frenchmen who were in the fort of that post, whom, however, they did not injure; they afterwards seized the property and burnt a portion of the buildings. Two of the 8 Frenchmen whom the Miamis had allowed to leave uninjured, arrived at Detroit on the 7th of October.

On the arrival of the convoy, M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil being ignorant of what was going on at the Miamis, and wishing to be informed thereof, before allowing the lessees (of the Posts) to go there, sent 4 French deputies thither with messages to the Miamis, to induce them to come to Detroit. The deputies arrived at the Miamis after the blow had been struck; nevertheless, they prevailed on a good many of the Indians of that Nation to come to Detroit, to be disabused by their own eyes of Nicolas' impositions. But discouraged on seeing themselves notified by the arrival of a second Belt from Nicolas, in confirmation of the first, they went back to their village, and have merely sent to Detroit two deputies, whom M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil has immediately sent home with messages to disabuse that Nation of the evil speeches of Nicolas. Jaret, a Miami chief, of the village of Tepicourt, was at Detroit during all this disorder. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil has thought proper to send him without delay to try and restore good order, and more particularly to save the six Frenchmen who are detained prisoners.

The Outaouas and Pouteoutamies came to Detroit, previous to the arrival of the convoy, to renew the treaty of alliance. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil places no dependence on the circumstance; their past conduct gives him every reason to doubt their sincerity. A few days afterwards this officer called together these same Outaouas and Pouteoutamies, and the others who were desirous to visit him. He communicated to them our despatch of the 22<sup>d</sup> of July, relative to the murder of the 5 Frenchmen by the Hurons, explaining to them their father's intentions in regard to this murder, and the condition on which he would pardon the Hurons therefor. The meeting applauded, and two Huron Chiefs, of the number of the seemingly faithful, in company with some others of that nation, have been to carry this message to Nicolas at Sandosket. The commission being executed, these deputies have reported for answer that Nicolas did <sup>* This Huron Chief, much respected by his Nation, had died at Quebec, on the 4th of August.</sup> accept, but was desirous of waiting the return of Sastaredzy,* on whose arrival he, Nicolas, would repair to Detroit to conclude (peace); but whilst this Traitor was giving this answer, he had messengers out a second time to tell the Miamis that Detroit was razed, &c., which caused those of the Miamis to turn back who were coming to Detroit, as already mentioned.

The Sauteurs above Detroit came to demand an asylum. M. de Longueuil received them, notwithstanding the causes of discontent afforded by their past conduct, which he promised to forget if they would be wise.

Thirty families from Saguinan, whom Mikinac, an Outaouas chief, had invited, came also for the same purpose, and gave some strings of Wampum as assurances of their future fidelity.

There are a great many peltries at Detroit, which cannot be brought down until next year; again, M. de Longueuil must first receive news of aid from Montreal, otherwise it would be very hazardous to send them down. The Outaouas and Pouteoutamies have, at different times, assured the commandant that were the French, who had come from Montreal, to separate from him, the enemy would renew their threats and hostilities; but he does not place the least reliance on what they say, nor on their renewing alliance. These nations are only endeavoring to get their supplies out of us, and to discover a favorable opportunity to betray us irrevocably. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil is, consequently, obliged to ask us for a reinforcement of men and provisions, at the very opening of the spring, so as to be able to put a stop to their intrigues. There are not provisions at Detroit for any length of time; he asks, in like manner, that Niagara be abundantly provided for the security of the convoys up and down.

The Outaouas and Sauteurs thought that the sacrifice of one of their unfortunate prisoners (esclave), whom they accused of having come around the fort with an evil design, would be sufficient to procure for them a restoration of our confidence. They gave him up to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, who has been obliged to receive him. He gave him to the Abenakis, who accompany the Montreal convoy.

This officer, not being able to send any Traders to the Miamis until the Nation return to its duty, sends back to Montreal Ensign Douville, who commanded at that post, and who was at Detroit at the time the Indians committed the pillage; he sends back, in like manner, 40 Frenchmen and the Abenakis, who formed part of the convoy, to report to us the state of affairs at his post.

Father La Richardie and M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre arrived at Detroit, on the 20th of October, with the Huron Deputies who came to Quebec last summer.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil will concert with that missionary the best measures to turn his voyage to good account, and so soon as that commandant will have made arrangements with the Miamis and Hurons, he will dispatch two canoes, well armed, to advise us of the circumstance.

News from the Illinois.

The intelligence from the Illinois is equally interesting. Chevalier de Berthet, the commandant, writes us from Caskaquias, the 11th of August. It appears from his letter of the ..... that there has been considerable trouble in his district; it appears even that since the irruption of the Detroit Hurons, all the other Tribes, infected with their example, are excited, and desirous to side with them. The following is the substance of what that officer writes to us:

Three strange Indians, from Fond du Lac, came at the end of July to the Illinois country, with a message from the English, in the name of the Iroquois, Hurons, Abenakis, Pouz and Outaouas, and all the Ouabash Tribes, inviting the Illinois to abandon the French, otherwise they were dead men; or if they would not of themselves destroy the French, to withdraw and go to the Caokias, and they would come and cut them (the French) off; after which the English would come to the Illinois and supply their necessities abundantly. Our Illinois had almost consented to the act, when M<sup>r</sup> de Berthet, who was informed of the design of these three strangers, demanded that they should speak in his presence, which they refused to do, and the Illinois approved. However, the latter promised him that they should give him communication of whatever would be said; but their council being held during the night they reported to this commandant whatever they pleased. The latter seeing that the Illinois were deceiving him, gave them to understand, in a meeting, that he knew everything, and that they could not conceal aught from him. These Indians, on reflection, admitted the fact. They placed in his hands the message in question, which consisted of a shell, a calumet and some tobacco. He returned it to them immediately, and told them to give it back to those who had brought it; one of these three strange Indians took this message and said, he would not return back with it; he said, he should be ashamed to take it back, and, being himself an Illinois, remained with his people.

M<sup>r</sup> de Berthet has been informed by a Huron returning from the Chicachas war, who had spent the winter at Sonnioto<sup>1</sup> with the Chaouenons, of the league formed by the latter to destroy the Upper country posts; this Huron has assured him that the Iroquois of the Great village, as well as all the other nations, had accepted the tomahawk against the French, and had all reunited together to seize all the French posts, beginning with the Illinois country; that this attack would be made during the August moon, and at the fall of the leaf; and that he was present when the belts were distributed for the conspiracy; that he vouched for the truth, and warned him to be on his guard. He added, that should the expedition not take place at the time he mentioned, it would be postponed until the ensuing spring, or the affair would go to sleep altogether. La Damselle, the Miamis chief, is the concoctor of this league. Had M. Berthet been provided with some merchandise, he might have hoped to stop these tribes, being known to the principal ones; but his poverty has reached the point that there is not in the King's stores nor among the traders, an ell of cloth, nor a particle of ammunition to defend themselves in case they are attacked. This circumstance has obliged him to concentrate his forces at the village of Caskaquias, and to abandon the other settlements to the mercy of the Indians. He has not received any aid from New Orleans within 15 months, nor does he know whether the English are masters of the Colony, or if his Majesty have abandoned Louisiana. He has demanded some succor of M. de Longueuil at Detroit, as he expected none from New Orleans until the end of the fall, and it is even uncertain whether any will come, as he learned that the Chouenons, settled on the Ouabache, in union with the Chorakis, Chicachas and Abenakis, were to come to the Mississippi to watch the convoy, and to stop it if possible. This officer is impatiently expecting the aid he has demanded of Chevalier de Longueuil, in order to ward off the storm that threatens the Illinois country,* the loss of which would be a serious drawback, inasmuch as the English being once masters of that country, would not find any difficulty in gaining the nations wholly to their interest, and by that means could easily seize the entire colony of Louisiana. M<sup>r</sup> de Bertet has sent three of the principal chiefs of the Illinois to New Orleans to see M. de Vaudreuil, in order thereby to gain time and arrest any evil designs that nation might entertain against us.

Niagara and Fort Frontenac.

The Niagara and Frontenac posts are quiet. We learn by the same opportunity that the ship on Lake Ontario has arrived at Niagara freighted with provisions and merchandise, by which means that post is well supplied. Fort Frontenac is equally well provisioned.

Fort St Frederic.

Fort St. Frederic is supplied as well as possible with provisions and ammunition of all sorts. The last convoy thither was at the beginning of this month; it consisted of live cattle for the refreshment of the garrison, which it is necessary to treat well.

Our Frontier Garrisons.

We keep garrisons at the Lake of the Two Mountains, La Prairie, Senneville, Soulange and Ile Perraut, composed of soldiers and militia, who go scouting occasionally to prevent surprisals by any hostile parties that might be on the frontier at this season.

23<sup>d</sup> We receive letters from Montreal to the effect that Cadet Simblin, who led a small party of Frenchmen and Indians towards Dierfeld, whilst alone on the roadside guarding the plunder of his men, whom he had sent to slaughter some cattle for food, has been surprised and killed there by some twenty of the enemy's horse. He was found just expiring by his men on their return, to whom he had only time to recount the causes of his death. They afterwards continued their march, took a scalp and returned to Montreal.

Sieur de Léry — A Prisoner.

Ensign de Léry, who marched from Fort St. Frederic in the beginning of October with a detachment consisting of about 35 men, including French and Indians, for the settlements in New * Chevalier de Longueuil writes, on the 25th of August, that he is waiting for the convoy to send supplies to the Illinois.

England, has returned to Montreal. He burnt Fort Bridgeman,<sup>1</sup> on the river Canitikouk, in which he did not find any person, and took one prisoner within 3 leagues of Colonel Lusdaine's<sup>2</sup> fort, which contained 30 people of the neighborhood. This fort is 37 leagues from Boston, 30 from Orange and 6 from Dierfield. This prisoner, whose name is Jonathan Sautune, is a native of Nortfil, aged 22 years; reports that Lidius was to have started more than a month ago with 1500 men to make an attack on the Canada settlements; that half this party consisted of Indians of the Five Nations, and the remainder of Dutchmen; that he does not know whether there be many Indians at Orange, Corlac and Sarastaugué; has heard a battle having been fought in Flanders, but is ignorant of the result; that M<sup>r</sup> Knowles, Governor of Ile Royale, is at Boston since a month, to consult about the discharge of the militia enlisted for the Canada expedition. This prisoner and the people of his village, are of opinion that they will be, if they are not already, sent home. Goods are very scarce at Boston; paper money is discredited. The last harvest has been good. The Iroquois of the Saut, who accompanied Sieur de Léry, have evinced on their march much fear of being met by Mohawks. This leads Sieur de Léry to think that there is not any understanding between them. He has offered 6 of these Iroquois a hundred livres each to act as his guides on a scout to Sarastogué, from which place no intelligence has been received for 2 months previous; they have rejected the proposal, on pretext that there were, as they said, under that fort, some wigwams of Indians and Mohawks, who go out scouting every day, and that it would require 5 or 600 men to go there with safety.

When the General sent M<sup>r</sup> de Sabrevois to Fort St. Frederic, he expressly recommended him to send scouting parties out frequently; we have at that fort some thirty Becancourt Abenakis, who will be usefully employed, and we hope to have news from Sarastogué in a short time.

Sieur Desnoyelle.

Sieur Desnoyelle Lanoix, who went out with 70 men, French and Indians, at the same time as Sieur de Léry, has also returned to Montreal. This party has not succeeded; it took only 2 scalps above Orange; one Seneca, who deserted, went to Orange to give word of it, and thereby has caused all the attacks to fail; the English everywhere being put on their guard.

Prisoners at the Saut.

December 1st We receive some letters from Montreal. Chevalier de La Corne writes us that in consequence of the General's orders he had repaired to the Saut St. Louis to endeavor to get some English prisoners out of the hands of the Indians; that there are there four Dutchmen, who have been three years in that village, and two others, recently captured. The 4 former are 20 @ 25 years old; the Indians to whom they belong are out hunting; they will exchange them for Panis men or women, and not for money, because they are adopted into that village. This arrangement will be concluded, and we shall wait until the coming down of the Michilimakinac canoes to buy some prisoners at a lower figure than could be done now.

Death of a Seneca.

Died, a Seneca, one of the 8 Indians kept in irons at Quebec; two others of them are sick; they are well treated; since the capture of these Indians no hostile party has appeared within our settlements.

3<sup>d</sup> Ensign Leborgne arrives from Detroit, whence he has been detached by M. de Longueuil on duty. He brings us an Outaouas and a Pouteouatamis, whom the two Nations send as delegates to the General, to treat of existing affairs at Detroit. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil writes us on the 2nd of November. The apprehended scarcity of provisions has obliged him to discharge some men whom he would, nevertheless, require. The affairs of that post are no better improved than when he wrote on the 22nd of October last. This officer has no news from the Hurons, Miamis or from the Ouabache; he is expecting the messengers he has sent thither, and who are greatly behind their time. He calculated, however, on sending Ensign Belestre off immediately, with an escort of 12 Frenchmen, for the post on the River St. Joseph, which he is to command; also, to send off Sieur Lapeyrade, with a like escort, for the Ouyatanons, and a similar detachment for the Illinois; all overland.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil states that he is unsuccessful, for the fourth time, in sending some Huron deputies to Sandosket; does not know what will be the result of these goings and comings; he thinks that the Hurons are seeking only to procrastinate matters so as to be able to surprise Detroit, by means of reinforcements they are expecting from their allies, and to gain time to take refuge in some place at a distance from the danger that menaces them. That officer transmits to us the message which Mikinac, the Outaouas chief, and Onanguisset, the Pouteouatamis chief, communicated to him, on the part of their villages, for the Marquis de La Galissonnière, confirmation of which they send by the two deputies of these Nations. By this message these two chiefs demand that a hundred Frenchmen and Indians be sent to Detroit in the middle of winter; the Indians to be selected from those who are not in alliance with the Nations of that post, so that their conduct may not be any obstacle to their design of reducing the Huron, who seems inclined to persist in his evil intentions. Mikinac, speaking on the part of the Outaouas Nation, which has invited the Huron, says, that though it forms a separate part of the village of Detroit, he undertakes, by the Belts he will send in the course of the winter to all the chiefs of that Nation, to make the guilty return to their duty and determine on asking pardon. They add, by these messages, a request, if the 100 Frenchmen and Indians be accorded to them, that the General grant them a chief, whom they love and respect, and that this number of men, whom they expect in the middle of winter, be followed by a like reinforcement, at the opening of the navigation, fully supplied with provisions and ammunition, and 'twill be seen what use they will make of these reinforcements, should the Huron be opposed to that tranquillity the two Nations desire.

Two Lorette Hurons, who accompanied Father La Richardie, have asked to remain at Detroit; M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil expects to send them this winter to us with reliable news from the Hurons. That officer persists in demanding a reinforcement of men and provisions in the spring.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil annexes to his letter a note of the demands made by Mikinac, an Outaouas Chief; namely, a fine scarlet coat, with silver facings, similar to that sent to Kinousaki, another Outaouas chief; a fine shirt and a silver hilted sword. This officer desires us to grant this request, which will satisfy this chief, and adds, that he has need, in the present conjuncture, of this man, who, if refused, may be the cause of serious disorder; that this chief desires these presents to be sent him this winter, so as to be able to decorate his person on the arrival of the Nations in the spring, and to show, thereby, that he is not less esteemed than Kinousaki.

Ensign Dubuisson, commanding the convoy from Montreal to Detroit, sends us the journal of his voyage. It contains nothing of moment, except his meeting, on the 19th of August, the man named Kollin, a native of Ireland, who fled from Choëguin with his family and some property, and a soldier belonging to the garrison of that fort. Kollin was brought here in the month of September and examined; does not seem to us deserving of suspicion. He said he had fled from Choëguen through apprehension of being prosecuted for having infringed some prohibitory regulations, and that the soldier had followed him; they have remained at Quebec, and profess the Catholic religion.

By this opportunity we receive a letter from Ensign de Joncaire, residing among the Senecas, dated the 2nd of 9<sup>ber</sup>, wherein he informs us of the news he has learned of the enemy's movements. This is his statement: The Cayugas told him that the Hurons had sent word to the 5 Nations that, owing to their small number, they considered themselves no longer Hurons, but Iroquois, since the greater portion of their village were children of the Iroquois. Should this be so, Sieur Joncaire thinks that the Beautiful river will be the route which they will proceed to join the village of the Five Nations.

200 Dutchmen, commanded by 2 commissioners, of whom Lidius is one, had, in the month of October, engaged a troop of 20 Senecas who conducted some English back to Orange to join them, and having raised all the Mohawks, some Oneidas and the balance of Mohegans, making 600 men in all, set out, each having a gun,  $\frac{1}{2}$ <sup>lb</sup> powder,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ <sup>lbs</sup> of lead in two bars, knife, and a tomahawk, and having passed Sarastau and being in the vicinity of Lake St. Sacrament, the Indians told the Dutch to go out scouting on the lake and they would wait for them. The Dutch went alone on the scout and reported, on their return, that they had not seen anything. They afterwards all reunited at Sarastau, where the Indians say there are not 100 men in garrison, and returned thence to Orange. The Indians having observed a camp there, were told it was 600 men who were going to garrison Sarastau, which the Senecas cannot believe, saying that fort, which is contemptible on account of its small size, is insufficient to hold so many people. This story has, in our opinion, no other foundation than what occurred in the month of 7<sup>ber</sup>, near Sarastau, when M<sup>r</sup> Rigaud presented himself there. The English who were informed of the circumstance, sent, without doubt, to reconnoitre his forces when he retreated. By this occasion an English prisoner is brought in who has already been ransomed at Saut St. Louis. They write us from Montreal that they expect to release the others immediately.

7th The two Outaouas and Pouteouatamis deputies have this day presented to the General two Belts to confirm the message Mikinac and Onanguisset gave M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil and which the latter sent to M. de La Galissonnière.

Subsistence and clothing are continued to be provided for the Indians of the different villages of Acadia who are settled, since the fall, at Point à La Caille<sup>1</sup> to the number of 200 men, women and children; some of them go hunting; we have persuaded them to do so.

The same course has been pursued towards the Indians of the different tribes who winter at the River des Etréchemins, 3 leagues from Quebec, numbering 400 men, women and children, some of whom also go hunting.

14th We learn from Montreal the arrival there of Chevalier de Longueuil, Jun<sup>r</sup>, on his return from an expedition with a party of 40 Indians belonging to the Lake of Two Mountains.

His Report.

On the 25th of November last they attacked nine men who were going out of Fort Oequarine, which the English call N<sup>o</sup> 4.<sup>1</sup> They killed two of them and took one man prisoner, whose name is John Andersen; he is an Irishman, twenty years of age, who reports that the last news received from Boston by his Captain, named Elias Williams, spoke of peace, but, nevertheless, that preparations should be made for the Canada expedition next spring.

That he had heard there were 300 men in the government of Boston that form the companies formerly levied for the Canada expedition; that these troops, which serve in different garrisons, are ready to come together at the first word; that they were asking to march on that expedition or to be discharged.

The Senior colonel, or Brigadier David,<sup>2</sup> intended to come this winter and try an attack on Fort St. Frederic, but that the Colonel<sup>3</sup> of Boston had as yet come to no decision on that subject.

The English calculate on the Five Nations for the Canada expedition, and not on their domiciliated Indians, who are not adapted to scour the woods.

That the fleets of Admiral Townsend (he means Admiral Anson and Vice-Admiral Waren) were appointed this year for the Canada expedition, but that the battle they fought has prevented them coming.

That in the propositions of peace the King had demanded the restitution of Louisbourg of his Britannic Majesty, and that King George had answered, it was not at his disposal; it was a conquest of the people of Boston.

Reports, also, that Sieur Simblin had, after having been abandoned by the Indians of his detachment, repaired, at the end of four days, to Northfields, where he had been cured of his wound and afterwards carried to Boston.<sup>4</sup>

Destruction of Sarastau.

We learn from Montreal the total destruction of Fort Sarastau. Sieur Devillers, ensign of the troops, who was detached from Fort St. Frederic at the end of November with 70 Frenchmen and Indians on a scout to the neighborhood of this fort, sends us a journal of his voyage, from which it appears that Sieur Villers, being in the vicinity of said fort on the 3<sup>d</sup> instant, sent Ensign <sup>4</sup> In New Hampshire Historical Collections, II., 95-97, are given the details of the very romantic adventures of a Canadian officer named Pierre Rambout, who had been nigh killed in the town of Winchester, N. Simblin, we cannot determine. — Ed.

Beaubassin with three Indians on a discovery, who brought him back word that this fort was no more. Sieur Villiers proceeded immediately with his detachment to the spot, and verified the fact; he judges, from the ruins, that it may have been three weeks since the fort was burnt.<sup>1</sup> It was 25 toises<sup>2</sup> high and 23 toises and two feet wide. Twenty chimneys are standing. The enemy abandoned, or forgot to remove, some small grenades and a 12 @ 14<sup>lb</sup> shot. From the ground occupied by the bateaux, it was remarked that they had 90 of these, which they took away. The well of the fort was infected, and it appeared by marks of wheels that the caston had been removed. On his way back, Sieur Devillers sent some Frenchmen and Indians on a scout to the portage of Lake St. Laurent;<sup>3</sup> they reported having discovered a large camping ground; judging by the size of the fires and cabins, they are inclined to think that there were 600 men, who were on their return towards Corlac, and that this force might have passed about a month ago. It was doubtless then that the evacuation of the fort took place.

NOTE.—This circumstance corresponds materially with the letter we have received from Sieur Joncaire on the 3<sup>d</sup> of this month.

Answer to Detroit.

21st The General has given audience of leave to the two Pouteouatamis and Outaouas deputies, who will depart immediately for Montreal, and proceed thence to Detroit with two Canadians who will accompany them. He answers by this opportunity Chevalier de Longueuil's different letters concerning the actual circumstances of the post of Detroit; recommends him particularly to prevent, by all means possible, the reception by the 5 Nations of the Hurons belonging to the tribe that talked of taking refuge among them, according to M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire's representation; that in case these traitors should return to their duty, which Father La Richardie appears to expect, the Marquis de La Galissonnière refers to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil what will be the proper site for a new settlement, reminding him of the principal views he ought to entertain in such case, namely: the security of the French of Detroit; of the new fort he has proposed to establish below that post, and finally, of all present and future settlements; so that, with these precautions, there will be no more cause to apprehend like disorders in future, and at least these Indians will be restrained and their bad designs anticipated, should they dare to renew them.

The General answers Mikinac and Onanguisset's messages; he expects them to persevere in their attachment to us; the winter season does not permit him to send the detachment of French and Indians they appear to desire; announces to them a well escorted and provisioned convoy next spring, which will afford them reason to felicitate themselves on their good dispositions towards us. Orders are sent to Montreal to send Mikinac, by the deputies, the presents he has demanded; we have not been able to dispense with granting to that chief this mark of Chevalier de Longueuil is recommended to send to Sieur Berthet, at the Illinois, the aid in goods and ammunition he may be able to spare him, so as to afford him the means of protecting himself from the deplorable consequences which the affair of the Miamis might drag after it.

News from Beaubassin.

24th We receive by couriers that arrive from Beaubassin, a letter from Father Germain, missionary at said place, dated 29th 9<sup>ber</sup> last. He sends us a copy of a letter addressed to him by M<sup>r</sup> Desenclave, missionary priest at Port Royal, dated the 12th or 15 of said month of 9<sup>ber</sup>, wherein he communicates to him some news from Europe. It is reported at Beaubassin that 1100 Bostonais are coming this winter, as they did the last, to settle at Minas. We shall be informed if there be any reliable foundation for the statement. That the expedition against Fort St. Frederic will be prosecuted, unless the English, contrary to their expectation, be interrupted. Father Lacorne has written to Father Germain on the 6th of 9<sup>ber</sup> that he had left Le Northumberland and the other vessels near Gaspé on the 3rd; that a severe gale sprung up on the next day and he arrived with difficulty at his mission at Miramichy, his vessel having nearly foundered. M<sup>r</sup> Maillard is actually at the Island of St. John; he is trying to get his Indians to go to Ile Royale, where they will have an opportunity of attacking six English houses erected outside the town.

One of the Indian prisoners died this morning; there remain now but six.

January 10, 1748. Arrived four Englishmen who are brought from Montreal, they have been redeemed out of the hands of the Indians of the Saut [and] of the Lake; also a Sauteur prisoner, brought from Detroit by the Abenakis Indians.

12th Ensign St. Luc is arrived express from Montreal. M. de Beaucourt applies by him for the General's orders respecting a stronger escort which the two deputies from the Outaouas and Pouteouatamis of Detroit are demanding, in order to secure their safe return to that post; that these Indians represent the evident danger they incur with only two Indians, especially between Fort Frontenac and Detroit, whither, they say, the Indians who attacked the French, particularly the Mississagués, have retired. The General could not avoid attending to these representations, and has sent orders to Montreal, by the return of said Sieur St. Luc, for furnishing 12 men to these convoys, including French and Indians, with a view not only of accompanying these two deputies, but also of preventing any accidents happening to our despatches, which are of consequence in the present state of the Upper country.

February 5th The Intendant leaves for the Forges and Montreal.

7th The General left for Montreal.

Count de la Galissonnière has arrived at Montreal, where he has been received with all the honors due to a Governor-General.

Arrival of the Intendant in the said town of Montreal.

16th Five Christinaux, 2 Outaouas, one Sauteur and five Canadians, have been fitted out for a war expedition. Sieur Laverendy, Jun<sup>r</sup>, commands them.

20th 16 Abenakis, of Missiskouy, have likewise started on an expedition into the enemy's territory, under the command of Sieur Montizambert de Niverville.<sup>1</sup>

21st 13 Abenakis of St. Francis and Becancourt, are sent to Fort St. Frederic to relieve those employed as scouts in the vicinity of that fort.

25th 16 Iroquois, of the Saut St. Louis, are fitted out for an expedition, under the command of Cadet Drouet Surville.

News from Detroit.

29th We receive, at Montreal, news from Detroit, by some chiefs and deputies of the Outaouas and Pouteauatamis, 7 in number, two Lorette Hurons and six Frenchmen. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, the commandant of Detroit, reports to us everything of interest that occurred there since his last letters, dated 2nd 9<sup>ber</sup>, relative to the derangement of the different Nations of this Continent, whereof the following is an extract :

The Miamis, who had formerly pillaged the fort and seized the Frenchmen, have sent one of their principal chiefs to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil to request him to send back some Frenchmen to them, and not to deprive them of their indispensable supplies, promising him that order would be restored in a short time. That officer yielded to their solicitation, with a view to deprive the enemy of the liberty of seizing a post of considerable importance. Ensign Dubuisson, whom he sent thither, is to form only a small establishment there to winter in. He has been supplied with 30 Frenchmen to maintain himself there, and is accompanied by 30 others destined for the Ouyatonons trade, with orders to the latter to rejoin Sieur Dubuisson in the spring, so as to return together to Detroit. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil adds, that as some of our French people remain among the Ouyatonons, where even some families are settled, he did not consider it right to abandon countries where no disorder has occurred, and where great disturbance might break out, in the absence of assistance ; besides, having formerly engaged to send some merchants and traders to the Kicapoux, Mascoutins, Puans and Ouyatonons, he could not break his word, inasmuch as these Nations observed their promise to him.

Nicolas, the Huron Chief.

When the Miamis Deputy was at Detroit, Nicolas, Orotoni and Anioton, chiefs of the Huron traitors, came there to sue for peace, and to surrender the belts which have been the cause of this treason ; they have made speeches to which M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil has given an answer, but he doubts their sincerity.

NOTE.—These speeches and answers are annexed to the Journal.

Whilst these deputies were sojourning at Detroit word was brought to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil that a party of five warriors, guided by a Huron, had just killed three Frenchmen, within 5 @ 6 leagues of the fort ; he sent 30 men to overtake this party. Those deputies, apprehensive that some of their people might be confounded with these five warriors, informed this officer that they were in a cabin on Bois blanc island, and offered even to arrest them. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil accepted the offer, and gave them ten men more, who overtook the first detachment. The 5 hostile Indians surrendered without resistance, and were conducted to the fort ; nevertheless, whilst disembarking, one of them, an Onondaga by adoption and leader of the band, was killed by the populace, which was incensed against those traitors ; the four others, one of whom was a Huron of Detroit, who acted as guide ; the second a Seneca, and the remaining 2, Mohegans, were put in irons. This party had, in fact, discovered 3 Frenchmen at Grosse isle, six leagues from Detroit, where they lay in wait for them, at the detour of a point, and fired on them. The French, surprised, put out into the stream and repaired to the post; all the three were slightly wounded and have been cured. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil has given notice that the fate of these 4 prisoners depended on the conduct of their tribes.

Outaouas, Pouteouatamis.

According to appearances the Outaouas and Pouteouatamis are sincerely desirous of peace, and seem determined to force those to it who will offer any resistance; if, as charged, they have dabbled in the conspiracy of the spring, they do not the less refuse taking any part in it, and in order to complete the proofs of their fidelity, declare themselves enemies of those who have disturbed the country, in such wise, however, that they offer themselves as mediators for the pardon of the most guilty, not daring to say that they will declare war against the Hurons, for fear of the consequences that may follow.

River St. Joseph.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil was very uneasy about the occurrences at River St. Joseph, when nine Frenchmen arrived thence at Detroit, with an equal number of Indians of the place, to ask for Ensign Belestre, who was appointed to command there. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil granted them their request, and all of them set out on the 15th of December for that place.

Provisions.

The post of Detroit will, it is to be feared, run short of provisions, in consequence of the great number of tribes continually there, and who are to come from all parts this spring. M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil reiterates his demand for the early transportation of provisions. It would be also unfortunate were the Indians aware of the scarcity at the fort.

A number of Outaouise families reside in the neighborhood of Detroit, and are supported at the public expense, on pretence that they are willing to die, as they say, for the French; they have been unwilling to move any distance from the fort; and, in addition to all this, M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil learns that several Huron families are about to return there to consume his provisions.

The letter addressed to us by this officer contains news brought from Ostandousket,<sup>1</sup> 20th X<sup>ber</sup>, by two Hurons deputed by the sachems; the following is an extract of the intelligence:

When the Seneca and Mohegan sachems of the Beautiful river received the news of their four men at Detroit, it created, at first, an outburst of anger in most of the minds; several were disposed to go and revenge this blow, but the announcement of M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil's sentiments respecting their people, allayed this first excitement. Passion, however, becoming master, two parties took the field, one to kill some Frenchmen at the Miamis, the other for Detroit. In case of failure at these two points, they were to attack indifferently all they should meet, doubting not but the Outaouas and Huron had contributed to the loss of their men. These menaces have obliged these Hurons to collect together at the White river, 25 leagues from Detroit, to entrench themselves there and examine in safety the conduct of the Iroquois, which they promise to report to us in case of any movement.

Extract of a letter from M<sup>r</sup> de Berthet, Commandant at the Illinois, to Sieur Lachine, trader at the Ouyatanons, dated Cahos, 20th October, 1747, whereof he sends us a copy.

Illinois.

On receipt of intelligence at the Illinois that there were 15 @ 16 pirogues of hostile Indians in the river of the Cherokees,<sup>1</sup> 10 Illinois Indians went out to scout and met them who announced themselves as Chaouenons, and captured one of the enemy, whom they brought to M<sup>r</sup> de Berthet. This prisoner, called an Alibanon, was interrogated and equivocated; at one time he said that he and his comrades were coming to visit the Chaouenons, who had invited them; that at first they were unwilling to come, but on an invitation being sent with 4 Belts and at the solicitation of the English, they had set out, 14 pirogues in number; he would not say what nation they were going to attack; only says, that the Chaouenons had told them to wait for them in the River Mississippi. M<sup>r</sup> de Berthet adds, by way of reflection, that the English were justified in telling our nations that all the passages would be closed on them. He expects some aid from Canada, otherwise is very apprehensive for the result. The conduct of the English, the Iroquois, Huron and Chaouenon, proves that they wish to drive our Indian allies off their lands.

Niagara.

March 1. We receive letters from Lieutenant de Contrecoeur, Commandant at Niagara, of the 24th of January; that officer informs us that everything is quiet at that post; that having received, since the fall, no news of Sieur Joncaire, residing at the Senecas, he had sent a courier thither on the 18th of January, to learn what was passing among the 5 Nations, and to inform us of it.

M<sup>r</sup> de Contrecoeur adds, that the War chief of the Little Seneca Rapid had just arrived at Niagara, and reported to him that the English had sent a Belt from Choüeguin by a Seneca chief, directing him to deliver it to the Five Nations, and to pass it thence to the Hurons; that this Belt invited these nations to come, this spring, to Choueguin, where the commandant of that post was waiting for them to transact business; that the chief of the Little Rapid had assured him, that he was going to send back that Belt to the Senecas, with word not to send him, in future, any Belts from the English, as he would not receive them, being desirous to remain quiet with his father; M<sup>r</sup> de Contrecoeur has encouraged this chief to adhere to the course he had adopted.

This officer sends us a copy of a letter he had just received from Chevalier de Longueuil, dated Detroit, the 6th of January last, whereof this is an extract:

The Seneca, one of the four prisoners taken at Detroit, stabbed himself in prison on the night of the 25th and 29th of December, with the knife belonging to the sergeant, who was on guard over him, which he had seen him put in a certain place. This Seneca and the Huron, as has been ascertained, had taken the resolution to commit suicide from fear of a more cruel death; the two Mohegans were aware of it, but dared not divulge it. M. de Longueuil is not certain that this Indian did kill himself; 'tis probable that the Huron was the executioner, and was to kill himself afterwards, being the more determined. From a subsequent examination of the three remaining prisoners, it has been discovered that they had been on the point, during the preceding night, of assassinating the sergeant of the guard; their preparations to escape afterwards were pretty complete, as the two Mohegans had already broken the lock of their irons; this has obliged M. de Longueuil to confine them more closely, so as to remove all uneasiness in that regard.

Fort Frontenac.

Same day, 1st We are also in receipt of news from Fort Frontenac; Sieur Cabanac, the commandant, writes us on the 15th instant.<sup>1</sup> There was nothing new at the fort; everything is quiet there.

2<sup>d</sup> The Outaouas and Pouteouatamis' deputies from Detroit have spoken to the General according to the message sent by Chevalier de Longueuil, and delivered the Belts they had in charge.

5th Thirteen Iroquois of the Saut St. Louis have asked to go on an expedition; they have been equipped; Sieur Bonat, an Aiguletted cadet, has been placed at their head with three Canadians.

M<sup>r</sup> André, formerly Lieutenant-General of the provostship of Quebec, is deceased at Three Rivers.

9th Seventeen Iroquois of the Saut have been equipped for an expedition. Cadet Charly commands this party.

Sieur Simblin, military cadet, who has been wounded at the close of October last, within four leagues of the fort of Norfields, and taken to Boston, arrived at Montreal in company with three Englishmen sent with him by M<sup>r</sup> Shirley, who writes to Count de La Galissonnière and informs him that he has no more French prisoners at Boston; that he expects the Governor of Orange will send back immediately to Montreal those within his government, who have been carried off from our frontiers. Sieur Simblin was to have passed there on his return from Boston, but he found the road too long. He reports that the English militia enlisted for the Canada expedition, had been dismissed; the English, however, do not lose sight of the enterprise, and expect to stop all our vessels this spring in our river. We have the three Englishmen well treated and closely watched. They ask to take back with them two prisoners, men of family, who are here.<sup>2</sup> We shall see to their departure, if it be proper to release these two men.

Scout to Choûeguïn.

Nanangoussi, an Iroquois chief, and nine Indians have been equipped and leave on a scouting expedition to Choûeguïn, and to ascertain what is passing there.

At the end of the last, and beginning of the present month, M<sup>r</sup> de Lantagnac, commandant at Quebec, in the Count de La Galissonnière's absence, has had fitted out about two hundred Indians, both of the different Acadian villages, settled around Quebec, and of St. Francis and Beancourt. These Indians are to divide into several small bodies, to go and attack the English settlements towards Fort St. George.

Fort Frontenac.

19th We receive a letter from Sieur de Cabanac, commandant at Fort Frontenac, informing us that the Iroquois deputies, from the Lake of the Two Mountains, who had left their village on a deputation to the 5 Nations, have abandoned their project, and delivered over to him the belts of which they were the bearers. These Indians have been induced by M<sup>r</sup> Piquet, missionary of the Lake of the Two Mountains, to go as if of their own accord to the Five Nations. This deputation, which had our approbation, was purely complimentary; the real design was to sound the dispositions of the Five Nations, and to discover what was going on among them.

Forts on our Frontiers.

20th We are issuing orders for the repairs of the different posts of the government of Montreal, which are garrisoned by regulars and militia, so as to put them in a good posture of defence; the farmers will contribute a large portion of these works.

Fort St. John Road.

We have also determined to have a stockaded fort constructed at the place called St John, . . . leagues above the Chambly Rapid; also to cut a wide road across the woods from La prairie de la Madeleine to said Fort St John; this expense will save heavier outlays which are required for the transportation of provisions, &c., to Fort St Frederic. We shall report in detail on the necessity of these works.

The Intendant departs for Quebec.

Prisoners ransomed.

The Iroquois of the Saut have delivered to the General, at Montreal, some English and Dutch men, whom they had adopted; they are to be paid for them or to have Panis in their stead.

23rd The Intendant arrives at Quebec.

27th Death of M<sup>r</sup> de Linctot, captain in the troops.

Sieur de Laverendry.

29th Sieur de Laverendry, Junior, has returned to Montreal with the Cristinaux and other warriors of his party. In the neighborhood of Corlac he fell in with a party of Mohawks and Dutchmen who were coming to Sarastau on a scouting party; he brought two Mohawk scalps, among which is that of the principal chief of that Nation; one of a Dutchman, and a Dutch prisoner, who reports nothing of interest; only says, that there is considerable talk about peace. This first blow on the Mohawks will not fail to frighten them.

War Party.

30th Two Iroquois, of the Lake of the Two Mountains, and twenty-three others of the Saut are being equipped; they are going to the enemy's country under the command of Cadet Langy Fontenelle, accompanied by Sieur Pommeroy, another Cadet of Ile Royale.

April 4th Nanangoussy, Iroquois chief of the Saut, has returned from Choueguain, whither he has been sent on a scout; he reports that there is but one trader's house outside of Fort Choueguain; that there were a great many Dutch and Palatine traders at the place called Théyauguin,<sup>1</sup> who were preparing to come and do a considerable trade at Choueguain, at which fort there was nothing doing that could lead any one to suspect any expedition on the part of the English or the 5 Nations.

NOTE.—This report has since been confirmed in part by Sieur Cabanac, commandant of Fort Frontenac, and by Sieur Joncaire, residing among the Senecas, which induces us to believe that Nanangoussy has really made the voyage.

9th Sieur Drouet de Surville is returned to Montreal with the warriors of his party. He struck a blow near Fort Ocquarine,<sup>2</sup> and took one prisoner and two scalps.

Beaubassin.

12th We are in receipt of intelligence from Father Germain by 8 Micmacs who have just arrived. This missionary informs us, by his letter of the 16th of February last, that he has received no news from Port Royal since the month of December previous, which leads him to think that nothing of interest had occurred there, for he has reliable people at Minas, who are to inform him of every movement.

Proclamation of the Governor of Boston.

He sends us a copy of a proclamation of the Governor of Boston of the 21st of October last, wherein he declares that the inhabitants of the Province of Acadia need not apprehend that the King of England wants to expel them; on the contrary, his intention is to maintain and protect the loyal subjects in the peaceful possession of their properties, privileges, &c.; enjoins on the inhabitants of said Province, who are good subjects, not to harbor nor conceal those who have taken up arms for the French; who have openly afforded them aid and comfort. On the contrary, to use all their efforts to arrest, secure and deliver them into the hands of the commanding officer of said Province, particularly the men named Louis Gautier and Joseph and Pierre Gautier, two of his sons, Amand Bigeau, Joseph Leblanc, dit Lemaigre, Charles and François Raymond, Charles Le Roy, a native of this Province, and his brother Philips Le Roy, Joseph Brosard, dit Beausoleil, Pierre Guidry dit Grivois, and Louis Hebert, formerly servant of Captain Hanfields, all, twelve in number, outlawed for being guilty of high treason with the enemy; and for the greater encouragement of the inhabitants, good subjects of said Province, to arrest the abovenamed persons, promises a reward of £50 sterling for each criminal delivered up within the space of six months from the day of the date of said proclamation; and such of the guilty as will, within said time, themselves deliver up any of those outlawed, shall receive the pardon of their crime in addition to the 50 pounds sterling.

English Deserters.

At Beaubassin are 4 English deserters from Port Royal who ask permission to come to Quebec, and one English prisoner taken by the Indians last year in the fight at Minas, whom Father Germain has ransomed.

Father Germain.

Father Germain anticipates that he will be obliged to withdraw from Beaubassin in the spring, as he will be too much exposed there, but in all events he will place himself in a position to know equally well what will be going on, and will even occasionally visit that place.

Mr Maillard.

Mr Maillard is, since the fall, with the French settlers of Ile Royale, who are refugees at Tatimigouche, within 9 or 10 leagues of Bay Verte. He writes us, on the 20th of February, that he expects to send his Indians this winter to Ile Royale to harass the enemy and prevent them cutting firewood. Father Germain says, on this occasion, that the Indians can hardly succeed alone; that they will require some commanders to manage them; that it is true that 60 or 80 Indians would so disquiet the English of Louisbourg that they would, in the opinion of the more experienced at Beaubassin, be reduced to go and look for wood elsewhere, which would be a matter of very great inconvenience to them.

20th A courier arrives from Montreal with several letters from the Upper country, extracts whereof follow:

M<sup>r</sup> de Berthet, the commandant at the Illinois, writes us, in the months of November and December, about the general conspiracy of the Indians against the French, which was instigated by the English, who always employ the 5 Nations to convey their sinister Belts; the Illinois narrowly escape being seduced.

The Chaouenons of Chartier's tribe, so far from coming to Detroit according to invitation, have surprised some distant establishments on the River of the Chéraquis; they are reported to be in fort with the Cherokees and Alibanons, though this Chartier, who has much influence over this tribe, excuses that evasion, assuring that it will not be prejudicial to the attachment of these Indians towards the French. 'Tis to be feared either that he is not able to control them, or that he will, himself, change his opinion.

The aid that has reached him from Louisiana, is insufficient; he continues in want of provisions and goods, asks additional supplies by means of which he hopes to retain the Ouabash Nations, and to maintain himself.

Detroit.

M. de Longueuil writes us also in the month of February last.

Two tribes of Outaouas and Sauteurs, one from Saguinan and the other from Michilimakinac, came to Detroit to ask pardon for those of their nation who killed the Frenchmen in these two posts. M. de Longueuil referred them to M. de St. Pierre, the commandant at Michilimakinac; they promised to go thither.

At the end of January, 14 Hurons of Sandosket, with Scotache and Quarante Sols at their head, came to Detroit to ask for the release of the three prisoners confined in irons, the remainder of the five who had been taken at Bois blanc Island, where they had been attacked by the French when Nicolas was suing for peace. This deputation made such fair promises, that Chevalier de Longueuil, though feeling great repugnance to the release of these three prisoners, [consented to their discharge, on] the advice of the principal Frenchmen and Indians in the fort.

A Frenchman has been killed at the gate of the fort of the Miamis, it is supposed by some Iroquois.

Nicolas.

Nicolas' conduct is not free from equivocation; the English of Philadelphia visited him twice during the winter, to trade, and were well received. The scalp belonging to the Frenchman who was killed near Fort Miamis, has been carried thither; it is to be apprehended that Nicolas' former proceedings were merely for the purpose of deceiving more easily.

Mikinac, a trusty Outaouas chief, is collecting the Sauteurs of the neighborhood; the Outaouas of the three tribes, and the Pouteouatamies. He proposes to go and summon Nicolas to [observe] his promise, and to declare war against him in case of refusal.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil keeps always on his guard, and explains the necessity that exists for the early arrival of the convoy.

Miamis.

Sieur Dubuisson, the commandant at the Miamis, informs us that the unfriendly tribe having La Damoiselle as its chief, had resolved to return to its duty, and was already on the way to Detroit, when it received a deputation reported to be composed of Chaouenons, which dissuaded the Miamis from taking this step.

The posts of the Miamis and at the River [S<sup>t</sup> Joseph]<sup>1</sup> are not in want of goods.

NOTE.—Observe that when Chevalier de Longueuil permitted some traders to proceed last fall to these two posts, he recommended them not to burthen themselves with too many goods, which, under existing circumstances, might serve as an object of pillage to ill-disposed Indians.

Niagara.

M<sup>r</sup> de Contreœur, the commandant at Niagara, also writes by the same opportunity, and furnishes a favorable account of the Outaouas at the head of Lake Ontario, who have given notice of, and prevented, the evil designs that were concocting.

The Chief of the Little Rapid.

Is well pleased with the services of the chief of the Little Rapid, who gave notice that the English had given him some bad Belts to transmit to Sandosket. This chief is, nevertheless, suspected of having sent these Belts to their destination at the moment he promised to send them back to the English. Efforts will be made to get at the bottom of the matter.

place to watch the movements of the enemy, and send out frequent scouting parties ; so as to guard against surprisals by means of this precaution, and of the different scouts to be detached by the officers commanding the several frontier forts.

Sending back the Cartel.

The General sends back from Montreal the three persons who came with a cartel on the 9th of March. They were conducted to the Frontier by Sieur Simblin, whom they had brought back. We found no difficulty in surrendering to them the two prisoners whom they have asked of us on arriving.<sup>1</sup>

Answer to the Governor of Boston.

The Marquis de la Galissonnière answers, by this occasion, the Governor of Boston's letter ; he informs him, among other things, that it is necessary to make arrangements for the regulation of the accounts of the packets which have been sent from Quebec to Boston, and from Boston to Quebec, and what regards the ransom of the English prisoners from the hands of our Indians ; proposes to him different means for the settlement of these sort of accounts in good faith and with mutual satisfaction.

Treats of the non-execution of the cartel by some of the Governors of the different Provinces of New England, and particularly by him of New-York, to whom no more prisoners shall be sent back until the Canadian prisoners in his government be surrendered.

Reproaches the inhumanity of the English, who have circulated Belts among almost all the Nations, setting a price on the head of several officers in command of our posts in the Upper Country, and particularly of Detroit.

Chevalier de Niverville has been sent from Montreal to the south of Lake Champlain, with a detachment of 20 men to scout, and prevent the approach of any hostile parties that might interrupt the spring sowing.

27th Sieur Langy Levreau and 10 Iroquois of the Lake are fitted out at Montreal for a scouting expedition in the direction of Chouëguen.

We are about to dispatch Sieur Depleine to arrange, as usual, the signal fires and smokes along the South shore from Quebec to St. Barnabé, to give notice of any approach of a hostile fleet. We issue orders, at the same time, to the settlers along that shore to build huts and parks in the interior of their lands, to secure their families and cattle from attack, and to the farmers to repair to Quebec with their arms and one month's provisions, as soon as they shall perceive the fleet.

Packets.

Orders are conveyed in like manner to the captains of the settlements from Cape S<sup>t</sup> Ignace, going down, as far as St. Barnabé, to stop the English packets that might enter the river ; to receive the letters, send them to us, and make the packets await our answer.

28th Sieur Bouat has returned to Montreal with his party ; he has attacked several English between the forts of Deerfils and Ocquarine ;<sup>2</sup> has taken two scalps and one prisoner, who reports nothing of interest.

29th Sieur Lanoue Robutel and 40 Iroquois of the Saut have been fitted out at Montreal for a war expedition.

150 militiamen are dispatched from Quebec to Montreal to escort the canoes destined for Detroit and Michilimakinac.

30th Mr Begon, Governor of 3 Rivers, died at Montreal.

1st May. Sieur Aubert and two biscayennes<sup>1</sup> are sent off to Cape Desrosier, where he is to observe the vessels that will pass, whether friends or enemies. He is furnished with the signals the King's ships are to make when they will reach that post.

Sieur Abel, in like manner, sails in another biscayenne for Cape Chat, with orders similar to those of Sieur Aubert.

Sieur Rouville is sent to St. Barnabé in command of a third guard there.

Fire Rafts.

3<sup>d</sup> Sieur Cartier is, likewise, dispatched to Ile aux Coudres, where he is to manœuvre the fire rafts constructed at that Island, as well as at the Little River, Bay St. Paul and La Gribanne,<sup>2</sup> so as to make them drift against the enemy's fleet, should it appear in the river. Orders the Captains of these 4 settlements, also, to stop the packets, as has been done on the South shore.

6th Sieur Niverville has returned from the south of Lake St. Francis. He has no knowledge of any hostile party.

War Party.

9th Sieur Duverger Simblin, with 24 Iroquois of the Saut, are fitted out to strike a blow in the direction of Chouëguin, and carry off, if possible, the Mohawk chief named Theyaoguin, who attacked the carpenters on Ile à la Mothe, in the fall of 1746, on his return from Montreal, where he had been loaded with presents.

Prisoner.

10th Cadet Charly is returned to Montreal with the Iroquois of his party. He brings in a prisoner taken near Evril,<sup>3</sup> who reports nothing of interest.

War Party.

M. de Sabrevois, commandant at Fort St. Frederic, informs us of the return of a party commanded by Sieur Hertel Beaubassin, consisting of 11 Abenakis and three Canadians. They burnt, in the neighborhood of Orange, 30 houses, destroyed 3 small forts and one mill; all of which had been abandoned. They were quite near Orange, but had not an opportunity to take any prisoners.

12th Sieur Mouet, military cadet, and 30 Iroquois of the Saut have been fitted out for an expedition into the enemy's territory.

Deputies from Detroit.

17th The General returns an answer, at Montreal, to the message brought by the son of Mikinac, the Outaouas chief, and the other deputies, who arrived from Detroit last February; they will return with it in company of the convoy which will soon leave for that post.

Prisoner.

18th Some of the Becancourt Indians, who had been equipped last winter at Quebec, are arrived; they attacked 4 Englishmen near Fort St. George; killed three of them and captured the fourth, whom they have brought in. This prisoner, who is wholly illiterate, reports nothing of interest.

2 Prisoners.

19th Some other Indians belonging to the same tribe, bring in two English prisoners whom they took in the neighborhood of Fort St. George; these prisoners give no information.

The General equips, at Montreal, 15 Abenakis whom he sends to Fort St. Frederic to increase the scouts.

L'Amphitrite.

20th A courier from St. Barnabé informs us of the arrival, at said place, on the 17th, of the ship L'Amphitrite, Captain Lavocat, who sailed from Bordeaux on the 27th of March last.

Sieur Langy Levreau, who had been sent on a scout to Choueguain, is returned to Montreal. There is no appearance of any movement in the neighborhood of that fort.

4 Scalps.

Some Becancourt Indians, belonging to the same tribe as those who came on the 18th, have arrived. They killed 6 Englishmen in the vicinity of Fort St. George, 4 of whose scalps only they have been able to bring off.

A Prisoner.

Other Indians of the same tribe are returned with a prisoner taken in the same country; does not report anything of interest.

L'Amphitrite.

24th L'Amphitrite has anchored in the harbor. This ship has captured a prize laden with salt, which was going to Newfoundland; the Captain transferred 6 English prisoners of the 9 which the crew of the prize numbered.

A Prisoner.

26th Sieur Langy Fontenelle has returned to Montreal with his party; brings in an Englishwoman prisoner.

War Party.

Sieur de Varenne, an Aiguletted cadet, with 13 Iroquois of the Saut, are equipped at Montreal for a war expedition.

Arrived, the schooner L'Elisabeth, Captain Monsion, sailed from St. Domingo on the 15th of March; 4 English prisoners had been put in his charge to bring to Louisbourg, under a cartel. When three days out he was met by an English privateer who took the 4 prisoners, and having continued his voyage was again overhauled by an English privateer on the banks of Newfoundland. The Captain of this privateer, in consideration of the service she was on, allowed this vessel to continue her voyage though loaded with about 150 puncheons of molasses and rum. The crew only were pillaged. 'Tis said that this trade is pretty frequent now between St. Domingo and the New England Colonies, where the vessels carry, reciprocally, provisions and refreshments by taking out a cartel commission and taking on board a few prisoners. Captain Monsion has given us notice that a ship had sailed from St. Domingo in company with him, under a similar commission, for Quebec, with 2 @ 3000 minots of salt.

La Friponne. L'Aimable Marthe.

By this vessel we learn that the Royal frigate La Friponne, commanded by M. de Tilly, was at Ile aux Coudres last evening, and that M. Simonin, commander of the schooner L'Aimable Marthe, from Martinico, had run aground in the Traverse.

La Friponne. Convoy for Detroit.

27th The frigate La Friponne has cast anchor in the harbor.

The convoy for Detroit has left la Chine, under the command of Captain de Celoron, escorted and well supplied with provisions, ammunition and goods.

Answer to Letters.

The General answers, by this opportunity, the different letters he has received from the posts.

1st to M<sup>r</sup> de Berthet, commandant at the Illinois. Is recommended to arrange, if possible the affairs of the Chaouenons; 'tis with this view that he sends the man named Rhéaume, who is connected with Chartier.

It is proper to restrain the lessees within the limits of their posts, but 'tis still more essential not to consent to the Indians removing; as these sort of migrations, proposed under color of the public good, have never had for object anything but private interests, and almost always evil consequences.

Recommends to him to correspond with the commandants of Detroit, Michilimakinac, and the other posts of the Upper country.

The messages and proceedings of Nicolas are too suspicious to be relied on.

He ought not to have released the three prisoners taken on Bois blanc island; at least 'twould be proper to see the execution of the conditions formerly agreed upon; it is dangerous to assemble Councils under such circumstances.

Divers messages and answers are sent to him, including those that have been given at Montreal and those he will reply to, himself, in the General's name.

Presents are sent by Cold foot, a Miamis chief, who appears trustworthy.

Ditto, for the Chaouenons; they are entrusted to the man named Rehaume.

Pardon is not to be granted to the Missisagués and Sauteurs above Detroit, until they make due submission; they must surrender the murderers.

He is to retain, out of the convoy, such as he will have need of, according to circumstances.

Should any Huron or other rebel be so daring as to enter the fort without a pass, through sheer bravado, as they have done, 'twould be proper to arrest him and put him to death on the spot, even though there had been no treachery, but as a simple act of justice and allowable vengeance.

Recommends that the least possible trade in powder be carried on with suspected Indians,

Commandants of Posts.

Count de la Galissonnière writes to the commandants of the posts of the Miamis, Ouyatanons, River St. Joseph, &c., respecting what concerns them; and adds, that they ought to keep an exact and circumstantial journal of the occasions wherein they are obliged to incur expenses for presents to Indians.

Sends these officers a list of the Voyageurs who are wintering with the Indians, and of the Couriers de bois, in order to their being sent back, so that they may not return any more to the Upper country.

Another list is sent them of the Indian murderers and malefactors, in order that they be arrested and sent down.

NOTE.—These two lists will be also sent by the Michilimakinac convoy, which is on the point of starting for all the Northern posts.

Sieur Simonin.

25th Arrived an officer of Sieur Simonin's schooner, who landed at Trinity; he brings us the letters from the court which were given to said Simonin last year.

Cadet Louis Simblin arrived from Detroit with some Indians of the Upper country, who have accompanied him. Chevalier de Longueuil writes us in detail, on the 5th of this month, on the affairs of his post. This is an abstract:

Kinousaki had returned, on the 7th of April, from the Miamis river, whither he had gone to bring back the Hurons who had deserted from the village of Ostandosket; has reported that Nicolas, with 119 warriors of his nation, men, women and baggage, had taken the route to the White river, after having burnt the fort and the cabins of the village; that the Outaouas had given him (Kinousaki) a cool reception, and that a portion only of them would consent to return to Detroit, the remainder wishing to settle at the lower end of the Miamis river, where the Hurons had promised them the English would supply their wants. Kinousaki has added, that when the Outaouas will learn the desertion of the Hurons, which they were ignorant of, they will alter their resolution.

At the same time two Hurons, who were sent by Sastaredzy the Huron chief of a loyal tribe, confirm the departure of Nicolas and his people for the White river, to seek shelter among the Iroquois there, or among the Mohegans who are near Orange, and that only 70 men of all their nation would come back.

The scalps of the Frenchmen who were killed by Nicolas, have been conveyed to the Mohegans.

On the 24th of April, 4 deputies arrived from Saguinam, with Belts, to say that their chief was leaving to convey the murderers to the General.

M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre arrives from the River St. Joseph with twelve chiefs belonging to that post. Mechoukima arrives with 34 warriors from the Grand river.

Id. 4 war chiefs and sachems sent by the Kickapoux and Mascoutins.

Id. Spies from the ill-disposed tribe of the Miamis.

Id. Emissaries from Nicolas and the Chaouenons of Sonioto.<sup>1</sup>

Id. Some Sauteurs of the interior (de la contrée) who are come to submit themselves to their Father's will. All these nations have arrived within three or four days.

A council was held on the 28th of April, at which the Outaouas, Pouteouatamis following their example, the Hurons and Sauteurs of Detroit have all sworn fidelity and obedience to

Chevalier de Longueuil, and have promised that the first party that would insult the French should be considered a common enemy.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, by 4 Belts, put mocassins on the feet of all the warriors so that they may be ready at a minute's warning; all appeared to be accepted with cordiality, sincerity and resolution to go and do the behest of the General. These nations have each furnished two warriors to go and reconduct, to Montreal, the French Iroquois and others who had conducted their deputies back to Detroit, and to give their Father notice, at the same time, of the arrival of their Nations.

Nicolas and the Chaouenons will soon be advised of everything by their spies, which will only have a good effect.

Answers.

Count de la Galissonnière answers Chevalier de Longueuil by the Detroit convoy, which is not yet far off. The following is an extract :

Huron Mission.

He is to neglect nothing to reëstablish the Huron mission, which will, possibly, attract not only the wavering but all the treacherous; it might be advantageous to remove the establishment of Detroit to Bois Blanc Island, but examination must be made as to whether this change of locality would not remove us too far from the Indian villages, and oblige us to abandon settlements already formed; to furnish information hereupon.

Each of us, individually, writes to Chevalier de Longueuil to facilitate, as much as circumstances will permit, the reëstablishment of the mission of Father La Richardie, who continues to entertain the hope that the rebellious Hurons will return to their duty. Precise orders cannot be issued on this subject, in consequence of the trifling indication of repentance these traitors evince.

Niagara.

Count de la Galissonnière sends, with the convoy, Captain de Raymond to relieve M<sup>r</sup> de Contrecoeur, the commandant of Niagara, who has applied to be recalled.

He also sends Captain de Vassan to relieve M<sup>r</sup> de Cabanac at Fort Frontenac.

Sieur Joncaire, Resident at the Senecas, having demanded to be relieved, in consequence of his health, the General has appointed Sieur Joncaire Clauzonne, his brother, to succeed him, to whom he furnishes the necessary instructions respecting the course he is to pursue towards the 5 Nations under existing circumstances.

Sieur La Morandière, assistant engineer, is sent to Fort Frontenac to repair that fort and report on the condition of the artillery. The provisions and ammunition of Fort Frontenac are doubled by the convoy; a number of guns and some pieces of artillery are, also, sent thither. These are, in all cases, preparations in advance for the attack on Fort Choueguén, a project which possibly may occur hereafter; in other respects, these precautions will not be useless should we ever be obliged to declare war against the 5 Nations.

29th Sieur Simonin has anchored in the harbor; his running aground at the Traverse has been unattended by any serious consequences. He sailed from Martinico on the 3<sup>d</sup> of last month, and reported to the Minister his delay at that island.

A Prisoner.

War Party.

30th Cadet Louis Simblin, with two other Canadians and 9 of the Upper country Indians, is fitted out at Montreal for a war expedition. 60 Iroquois of the Saut and the Lake, and 10 Canadians are also equipped for the enemy's country. Sieur Jumonville, a seconded Ensign, commands this party; he has under him Sieur Hertel de Rouville another Ensign, and Cadets Hertel, junior, and L'Espervanche.

Sieur de Niverville Montizambert is returned with his party; he brings 2 prisoners and one scalp, which he took near the city of Boston.

June 1st Arrived, at Montreal, a party of Iroquois and Abenakis, with an English prisoner, who was taken at Erimedok, coming from Suega. It appears, by the report of this prisoner, that the people of New-England are still promised a Canada expedition.

A Prisoner.

7 Abenakis, of Becancourt, bring to Quebec another English prisoner taken within 30 leagues of Boston, in the direction of Fort St. George; they attacked five Englishmen, 2 have been killed, 2 escaped, and the fifth was taken; mentions nothing of interest.

3<sup>d</sup> A courier, from St. Barnabé, informs us of the arrival there of the ship Le St. Pierre, of Bayonne, Captain Darragory, who, after having captured a Dutch vessel beyond the Great Bank, was himself taken a few days afterwards. He ransomed himself by the payment of 30,000 livres.

War Party.

4th Sieur Duplessis Fabert, ensign of foot, with 15 Canadians, 30 Iroquois of the Lake and two from Detroit, have been equipped at Montreal for a war expedition.

War Party.

15 Abenakis have, likewise, been fitted out at Montreal for the same purpose; they are commanded by Sieur Simblin, the elder, who has only just returned from escorting the English cartels.

News from Beaubassin.

Father Germain writes us, on the 20th of May last, and informs us that he has dispatched a Biscayenne from Bay Verte, on board of which he caused to be put three English deserters from Port Royal.

This missionary likewise sends us copy of a letter of the Governor of Port Royal, to the deputies of Grand Pré and the other districts of Minas and Chignitou, dated the 14th of March last, whereof the following is an extract:

"M<sup>r</sup> Shirley has received express orders from the Court of England, to look to the security of the Province of Acadia, and to protect the inhabitants, provided they comport themselves according to the obligation of their oath. A vessel of 20 guns has, consequently, arrived here, and we expect, in a short time, another with transports and troops, in addition to those already arrived. I exhort you to comport yourselves in a proper manner, so that you may enjoy his Majesty's favorable dispositions. It is necessary that you inform me of the state of your districts."

Father Germain adds, that there are no more than 150 men in Port Royal fort.

Settlers of Ile Royal.

Reports the intention of the inhabitants of Ile Royale who are refugees at Tatmigouche, to send off a certain number, with as many Indians as M<sup>r</sup> Maillard will be able to collect, to Ile Royale, on the breaking up of the ice, to lay waste the country and carry off the English lodging outside of Louisburg. M<sup>r</sup> Maillard is doing his best to put this project into execution. Father Germain inquires if we wish to continue this little enterprise, and, at all events, gives us some information for the conveyance, without accident, to Acadia of a detachment of French and Indians, to harass the enemy at Ile Royal, without incurring much danger.

A Prisoner.

8th Sieur Lanoue Robutel has returned to Montreal with his party; he brings in one prisoner and a scalp.

9th 32 Têtes de Boule and 40 Nepissings, are arrived to see Count de la Galissonnière.

The war party, commanded by Sieur Mouette, the elder, is returned. It has been surprised, within 5 or 6 leagues of Fort St. Frederic, by a stronger party of the enemy; our people were obliged to retreat; one Indian has been killed and another wounded.

10th Sailed, from Quebec, Captain Curodeau's snow for Martinico.

Id. The galliot, La Marie Catherine, Captain Mourejeau, for the same port.

Le David.

11th A courier, of St. Barnabé, informs us of the arrival there of the ship Le David, Captain Taillason; she sailed from France in company with La Friponne. We continue active exertions to launch the vessel, Le St. Laurent, which is on the stocks, whenever the tide answers.

Le St. Laurent is ready for launching, but a strong N. E. wind does not permit us to hazard the experiment. The tide has risen only 14 feet 5 inches.

The Biscayenne dispatched by Father Germain has arrived with the three deserters in question; they were put in the barracks with their comrades.

13th At  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 7 o'clock this morning the ship St. Laurent was launched with all possible success. There was 14 feet 10 inches of water in the basin.

The ship St. Pierre, of Bayonne, has anchored in the harbor.

Le David.

Also, the ship Le David.

Also, a galliot from Martinico, Captain Boulau, loaded partly with salt.

Sieur Simblin, the elder, is returned to Montreal with his party. He has been in the neighborhood of Choueguén, where he captured a Mohawk, who will be sent to Quebec with his comrades, who are in irons.

War Party.

14th Cadet Bailleul with 17 Iroquois of the Sant have been fitted out at Montreal for an expedition.

Ensign Portneuf Neuville and 21 Iroquois of the Saut have also been equipped for a like service.

Arrived, the ship Le Lion Monroe, Captain Foucher, sailed from St. Domingo on the 15th of March, under a Cartel flag with 4 English prisoners which he was to land at Louisbourg. This vessel was met when three days out by an English privateer, which relieved her of the 4 prisoners and allowed her to continue her voyage; she is loaded with about 1500 minots of salt. Said Foucher entered the Gulf in the beginning of April, and not being able to pass on account of the ice, went through Canso, where he encountered no obstacle.

A Prisoner.

Twelve Indians of Panaouamské arrive with an English prisoner taken in the vicinity of Fort St. George, who reports nothing of interest. These Indians have wintered at their village, and took this opportunity of coming here in search of some presents.

20 Mississagués from the head of Lake Ontario have come to Montreal to see the General; they have promised fidelity, and assured that they had no participation in the bad Belts that have been distributed. Sixteen of them have demanded to go on an expedition, for which purpose they have been fitted out. Sieur Langy Foutenelle has been given to them as a commander.

War Party.

18th Sieur Langy Levreau and 24 Iroquois of the Saut have been fitted out for a war excursion. Cadet Daillebout de Cuisi has been adjoined to the party.

5 Scalps.

19th Sieur Louis Simblin and his party of Upper country Indians have returned with 5 scalps; within a few leagues of Fort St. Frederic he attacked an English detachment which probably surprised Sieur Mouet's party and killed one of our Indians.

La Nymphe.

Sieur Dubois, Jun<sup>r</sup>, is arrived; he landed at Mount Louis from the snow La Nymphe of St. Malo, Captain La Garenne, loaded partly with salt intended for the fishery at Mount Louis. This ship is to go up to Quebec; he is instructed to deliver there the 486 logs of lignum vitæ which M. Guillot, chief commissary at St. Malo, has put on board for the stores at Quebec.

Detachment sent to Acadia.

Upon the representations heretofore made by Father Germain, that the French refugees from Ile Royale, in the neighborhood of Tatimigouche, designed to proceed to that Island to make some devastations there, and on his proposal that we assist them, we resolve to send to Beaubassin, under the command of Ensign Marin, a party of 140 men, one hundred of whom are Indians from the different villages. This detachment will be employed not only in preventing the English forming any new settlements in Acadia but also in annoying and harassing them either at Port Royale or on Ile Royale as far as the environs of Louisburg, or in the different harbors where they cut fire-wood, should it find an opportunity to go thither to make incursions, so as to disgust the enemy more and more with their conquest; efforts are being made for the dispatch of this detachment.

20th Count de la Galissonnière orders the dispatch from Montreal of the convoy for Michilimakinac, under the command of Lieutenant de St. Vincent. This convoy is well escorted and sufficiently well provided with provisions and merchandise to supply the post abundantly. The General writes to Lieutenant de St. Pierre, commandant there, that the convoy was delayed in the hope of receiving news from Michilimakinac, but that the advanced season obliged him to order its dispatch, though he is uninformed of what is passing at that post; that should the troubles continue, nothing remains to be done than to abandon, as already proposed, those posts which are exposed to danger, in order to oblige the guilty to come to Michilimakinac, and even to Montreal, in search of what they want; that he must exact the surrender of the murderers, and, should circumstances force him, grant peace on the same conditions as those accorded to the Hurons of Detroit, who were to bring two English prisoners for every Frenchman they had killed; the promises must, first of all, be performed in order that these Nations may not betray us as the Hurons have done. The General leaves this officer at liberty to determine, according to circumstances, the carrying into execution the different licenses granted for the Northern posts, and observes to him, nevertheless, in regard to the West Sea and Nepigon, that in case these posts were abandoned, it would be to be feared that the English might irretrievably monopolize the entire of that trade, which they now share with sufficient advantage. Demands some Panis, in order to indemnify the Indians who have surrendered some English prisoners.

Ensigns Laronde and Chevalier de Laverendrie have, also, taken their departure; the first for Point Chagouamigon, and the second for the West Sea.

21st Sieur de Niverville Montizambaut, Sieur Grandpré, his brother, and 19 Abenakis have been fitted out at Montreal for a war excursion.

Scout.

Nine other Abenakis have been, also, fitted out for Fort St. Frederic, and to reinforce the scouts there.

Outaouas.

17 Outaouas of Detroit, belonging to the tribe of one of Mikinac's younger sons, have had an outfit to return home.

War Party.

22<sup>d</sup> 34 Iroquois of the Saut have been outfitted for a war party, and ordered to divide themselves into two or three small sections; but having manifested some repugnance, they were, authoritatively, told that they were to submit to orders and obey.

A courier from St. Barnabé informs us of the arrival, at said place, of the ship St. Ursin, of Rochelle, which sailed with the frigate La Friponne.

News from Michilimakinac.

24th Chevalier de Repentigny arrives at Montreal, from Michilimakinac, with 18 canoes of Indians from that quarter; in regard to news from that post, there is reason to be satisfied with the conduct of M. de St. Pierre, the commandant there; he has managed the affairs of his post with much firmness and success.

25th All these Indians have had a talk.

One Murderer given up — Michilimakinac Nations.

The tribe of the Indian, Achoabmet, has delivered up one of the Saguinam murderers; attention, however, has been paid this chief, who has behaved well, whilst refusing that Calumet, which he presented, until all the murderers were surrendered; he, who has been given up, has been put in irons, without any promise of mercy. This severity has astonished the Indians, to whom has been explained the importance of granting no more pardons, as these have, hitherto, only served to occasion new crimes.

The tribes of Outouas, Kicapoux, Sinago and some people from the Forks have protested fidelity, Pindalouan being speaker.

Hostages — A Murderer.

The Santeur tribe has delivered two hostages for the performance of the promise they gave to surrender the murderers belonging to their Nation; one of those who made the attack at La Cloche, and had crept into this tribe, has been recognized and put in irons.

NOTE.—On the same day one of the hostages was released, giving the nation to understand that we were unwilling to make the innocent suffer for the guilty.

All these Indians have very urgently demanded mercy for the murderers; they were answered, that it was mercy to detain them, so as to prevent them continuing their bad conduct; that the people of their nation ought to have confidence in their Father's beneficence, and think only of repairing the past.

We send back to Bay Verte, the Biscayenne dispatched by Father Germain, and which has brought 3 deserters from Port Royal; M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart freighted it with some ammunition and goods, to be expended, as far as they go, in taking up the notes outstanding in Acadia, and which were issued in consequence of the sojourn of different detachments there. Amand Bigeau, an Acadian, and a worthy Frenchman, who is mentioned in the Governor of Boston's proclamation, came to Quebec, and returns by this opportunity. This farmer will be of use to Sieur Marin's detachment, by the supplies of provisions and other necessaries he will procure for it. M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart has considered it his duty to treat this Acadian with some distinction; he has ordered, to be delivered him, from the King's stores, about 3 @ 400<sup>li</sup> worth of ammunition and goods, in order the better to encourage him to facilitate our expeditions in that Province.

Scouts.

26th Count de la Galissonnière sends Captain de Verchères to Lake St. Francis, to relieve Chevalier de Lacorne, in command of the detachment there, which is employed in scouting, and 'tis necessary to keep up.

The party, commanded by Sieur Villiers de Jumonville, has returned to Montreal with 5 English scalps; it had not time to remove those of 9 @ 10 other Englishmen, who were also killed. He attacked, between 3 forts, a party of the enemy, who made a gallant resistance. Two of our Iroquois and Sieur Hertel, the younger, have been killed.

The General communicates to Chevalier de Longueuil, commandant at Detroit, the speeches of the Michilimakinac nations, and the answers he has given them; recommends him to act always with firmness; inquires of him if the emigration be advantageous, and whether it does not favor the evil designs that may possibly be entertained by the Chaonenons and the other nations of the Oubache. In case that emigration take place, and it be proper not to interfere with it, 'twill be necessary to send more traders to the River St. Joseph. Recommends correspondence with Michilimakinac; it is now easy; the Saguinam affair, being as it were terminated by the surrender already made, and still to be made of the murderers.

War Party.

Ensign Bailleul is sent to Point a la Caille,<sup>1</sup> whence he is to proceed, without delay, with 100 Indians of the different villages, whom he is to command, by way of the River St. John to Beaubassin, where he has orders to wait for Sieur Marin, who is to set out, in a few days, by sea, with 40 Frenchmen; and in case of Sieur Marin meeting with any accident, Sieur Bailleul will consult with Father Germain respecting the operations to be made in Acadia, so that his detachment may serve with advantage. We write, in consequence, to that missionary, and communicate to him the motives which have determined us to send this detachment.

Le St. Ursin.

29th Le St. Ursin, of Rochelle, has anchored in the harbor.

La Nymphe.

Also, the snow, La Nymphe.

30th Also, the snow Elizabeth, an English prize, captured by Sieur Ferret on his way from Martinico. This prize, which had about 2500 minots of salt on board, was going to Little Placentia to fish.

July 1. Ensign Marin, commanding the detachment sent to Acadia, sails with 40 Frenchmen in 3 biscayennes, for Bay Verte and Beaubassin, where he is to join Sieur Bailleul, who is to wait for him there with his detachment. We have furnished Sieur Marin with detailed instructions, respecting what he will have to do when he reaches Beaubassin, in regard to the object we contemplate in sending this detachment.

Niagara—Fort Frontenac.

Sent from Montreal to Fort Frontenac, by the bateaux of . . . , one mortar, 88 shells, and to Niagara, 36 fusils; the balance in ammunition and merchandise in greater abundance than in previous years; and this, with a view to make an attack on Choueguain, if possible.

Schooner L'Hirondelle.

2<sup>d</sup> Arrived, the schooner L'Hirondelle, Captain Ferret, sailed from Martinico on the 6th of April last.

Le Loup Marin.

Also, the brigantine Le Loup Marin, Captain Guillimin, which sailed from La Trinité on the 14th of May last.

Father Lacorne.

Father Maurice Lacorne arrives from Miramichy with the King's brigantine, which was presented to him last year.

Arrived, from Montreal, several canoes of Indians belonging to the Detroit tribes. They consist of Outaouas of Mikinac and Kinonsaki's tribes; of Hurons of Sastaredzy's tribe, and of Pouteouatamies. Count de la Galissonnière receives, by this opportunity, letters from M<sup>r</sup> Berthet, from M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, and some other of the posts. The tenor of these letters will be understood by the extract of the answers which will be sent them, when these Indians return home.

The Detroit nations that arrived yesterday have spoken; some, excusing their guilty brethren, others congratulating themselves that none of their tribe had been parties to the unfortunate attacks; all have solicited the pardon of the murderers, have exposed their poverty and made great protestations of fidelity.

Answers.

The answers have been confined to not confounding the innocent with the guilty, to distinguishing the chiefs and others who have given proofs of their fidelity, but we have persisted in not releasing the murderers; the surrender of all of them was even exacted.

The different tribes of the Michilimakinac Nations have spoken a second time, insisting on the release of the murderers.

They were answered that they must consider their Father's severity to the murderers as a mark of his tenderness towards his true children. Nevertheless, out of consideration for Achoabmet and other good Indians, we were pleased to release him who had been given as a hostage for the delivery of the murderers, but the word pardon for any murderer must not be pronounced any more. This answer seems to have been appreciated by them.

6 Prisoners—5 Scalps.

5th The three different war parties, commanded by Sieurs Duplessis Fabert, Simblin and Laplante, are returned to Montreal. These parties, having united, made an attack on Northfield, brought in 6 English prisoners and 5 scalps.<sup>1</sup>

Papinachés.

Arrived, at Montreal, 7 Papinachés<sup>2</sup> Indians, from Lake Huron, who came to see their Father. They were reproached with the fact that some of their people had participated in the attack made at La Cloche, and were told that the means of showing themselves to be true children was to deliver up the murderers.

6th The schooner L'Aimable Marthe has been dispatched from Quebec, loaded with provisions, ammunition and goods for the support and maintenance of the detachment sent to Acadia. Sieur Gosselin, who is to command it, is to proceed to the neighborhood of Bay Verte, or some other little port in the Island of St. John, whence he will notify his arrival to Father Germain, at Beaubassin, in order to ascertain whether he can enter Bay Verte, in safety, and discharge his cargo there.

L'Aventurier.

Le Neptune.

8th Also, the dogger, Le Neptune, Captain Pinau, sailed from La Trinité on the 14th of May.

L'Heureux—Le Brillant.

A courier from St. Barnabé informs us of the arrival there of the ships L'Heureux and Le Brillant, sailed from Brest on the 11th of May, with the crew and the remainder of the artillery of the ship Le St. Laurent. Mr Hocquart continues to labor earnestly to complete the construction of this vessel, which will be armed agreeably to the King's orders.

Detachment from Acadia.

The King's bateau, Le St. Joseph, from Cape Chat, brings 24 men and women, inhabitants of Ile Royale, who had remained since the war at the harbor called L'Indienne,<sup>1</sup> near Louisbourg, and who have been forced to come to Quebec, by a detachment of 40 Ile Royale settlers, refugees in Acadia, and some Indians, under the command of one Jacques Costé, and who have taken two small English crafts in Indian harbor. These 24 persons came to Cape Chat with 20 prisoners, taken by this detachment, but provisions having failed, Dugard, the commander, has been forced to pay a ransom, and the prisoners returned to Louisbourg in that vessel.

War Party.

The Outaoua, Huron and Pouteouatimi chiefs of Detroit have requested some young men to go on a war excursion, as well to afford proofs of their fidelity as to repair past faults, whilst they, the chiefs, would return home to promote peace. The first portion of their request has been approved; the young men have, consequently, been equipped, but the chiefs have been given to understand that they ought not to think of returning before speaking to the 5 Nations, who were daily expected.

The different Michilimakinac Nations made similar requests to those of Detroit. 90 of these Indians, 50 domiciliated Indians and 26 Canadians have all been equipped under the command of Chevalier de Repentigny, who is accompanied by several military cadets.

13th The ships Le Brillant and L'Heureux have cast anchor in the harbor with a snow, an English prize, captured by L'Heureux, with a load of about 200 minots of salt; this snow was on her way to Virginia, whither she was carrying some twenty Irish and Scotch girls. These were distributed among different private families, with whom they voluntarily bired.

La Jeannette.

Arrived, the snow La Jeannette, Captain Bernetier, sailed from Martinico on the 30th of May.

Two Prisoners.

14th Some Abenakis Indians, returning from war, bring with them two English prisoners whom they took near Fort St. George. These prisoners report nothing of interest.

A number of the Folles Avoines, Puans and other of the Bay Nations have arrived at Montreal. They have surrendered a murderer, who was immediately put in irons equally with the other two.

War Party.

16th 45 Nepissings and Algonquins of the Lake, and eight Frenchmen, have been equipped for a war excursion under the command of Sieur Louis Simblin, an Aiguilletted cadet.

24 Outaouas and Pouteouatamis of Detroit have been likewise fitted out for a war excursion.

A Negro prisoner—3 Scalps.

Sieur de Niverville Montizambert is arrived at Montreal with his party; he brings 3 scalps and one Negro prisoner.

War Party.

Nine Sauteurs of Detroit have been equipped to go on a war excursion. Sieur Blondeau, a volunteer, commands them.

War Party.

17th 90 domiciliated Indians and 46 Canadians have been fitted out for a war excursion, under the command of Chevalier de Niverville, Ensign of foot, to whom has been adjoined Sieur de Beaubassin, an Ensign of foot, and sundry cadets.

4 Scalps.

19th Some Abenakis, from the neighborhood of Fort St. George, bring 4 scalps to Quebec; they have not been able to make any prisoners.

War Party.

14 Micmacs have been fitted out at Quebec for a war excursion toward Fort St. George.

Letters from Niagara are received at Quebec, stating that the 5 Nations are gone to the Council at Orange, and that they promise to come and visit their Father at Montreal immediately on their return. It is reported that these nations have sent back the hatchet which the English gave them to use against the French.

Fort St Frederic.

They write from Fort St. Frederic that the parties commanded by Sieurs de Portneuf and Bailleul have been met by a superior force of the enemy and repulsed. Our people have retreated without the loss of a man. After this check, these two parties fell in with that of Sieur Langy, and all of them continued their route in the enemy's territory.

Sieur Bouleau sailed for Martinico.

Arrived, the brigantine called Le Paquebot de la Martinique, Captain Boissonneau, sailed from Martinico on the 25th of May.

La Jeunesse.

Arrived, the schooner La Jeunesse, Captain John Darat, sailed from Martinico on the 30th of May.

A Prize.

Return of the Tribes.

The chiefs of the different Nations, both of Detroit and Michilimakinac, have asked to return home, as the 5 Nations were too long coming down. Permission to return was granted them; they have always appeared satisfied and in the best disposition. Before they departed they gave the General Belts and messages for the 5 Nations, reproaching the treachery of the Mohawks, in which the 5 Nations have had too great a share.

Letters to the Posts.

Count de la Galissonnière writes by these Indians to all the posts, particularly to the commandants of Detroit and Michilimakinac, informing the first that the arrival of the convoy will have furnished him with means to act with more vigor and firmness; recommends him to insist on the surrender of the balance of the murderers, &c. He writes, to the commandant of Michilimakinac, that it is necessary for him to remain at the post where his services are of use. Recommends him to send to the posts whenever circumstances will permit; observing that it is important not to allow those of Nepigon, Chagouamigon and the West Sea to suffer. To try and create a trade with the Illinois, who would furnish him with provisions and other supplies.

27th The scouting party, stationed at Lake St. Francis, has been recalled; that precaution does not appear to be any longer necessary, in consequence of the inactivity of the enemy.

mention has been made. On the 8th instant, said Costé has brought away an English infantry officer and a soldier, whom he took at Little Brador; also, the captain of the schooner. This détachment has burnt all the houses of the French who were at Indian harbor and Little Brador, and who were working for the English since the capture of Louisbourg. It, likewise, burnt more than 2000 cords of fire-wood which were along the coast, and which the English got the French to cut for their use.

29th Some Abenakis brought to Quebec a prisoner taken in the neighborhood of Quebec; mentions nothing of interest.

31st Count de la Galissonnière arrives at Quebec.

We receive letters from Beaubassin informing us that 2 English vessels had arrived at that place laden with salt and other articles suitable for the country; that the people have taken these supplies and been obliged to give wheat in exchange; that, otherwise, the English have not ill-treated the Acadians; they, on the contrary, sold their goods civilly and quietly; that a third vessel had, also, arrived at Beaubassin, which remained only one day. It is added, that had there been then a detachment of only 100 men at Beaubassin, it would have been easy to master these vessels.

A Prisoner — A Scalp.

August 2<sup>d</sup> Some Abenakis bring to Quebec a prisoner and a scalp taken in the direction of Fort St. George.

7 Prisoners — 9 Scalps.

We are informed of the arrival, at Montreal, of the parties commanded by Sieurs Portneuf, Neuville, Langy, Fontenelle and Bailleul, with 9 scalps and an entire English family. They report that there is considerable talk of peace in New England, and that news of it is daily expected.

Suspension of Hostilities.

Evening. A courier, from St. Barnabé, informs us of the arrival, at said place, of the King's frigate Le Zephir; we receive, by that opportunity, the news of the suspension of hostilities.

Intelligence thereof sent to Montreal.

3<sup>d</sup> A courier is dispatched to Montreal with intelligence of this cessation; orders all the nations to be notified not to go to New England on any more war parties; that they will not be paid in future for prisoners or scalps; recommends to them, notwithstanding, to be always on their guard, and not to have any communication with the English or the 5 Nations. Notwithstanding this notice, our Indians, particularly the domiciliated Abenakis, will possibly continue their hostilities; they have lost warriors, and have not yet had an opportunity to revenge themselves to their satisfaction. We shall keep them in check as much as possible.

5th 40 Micmacs of Ile Royale have been wintering at Newfoundland, and struck a blow in the fall on several isolated English houses, which they pillaged; took 23 prisoners whom they have kept all winter; treated them well up to the month of April, then put 12 of the 23 in a boat in company with 8 old Indians and their families, whom they have sent with them to the neighborhood of St. John, where they were to wait for the tribe which was to follow them immediately, in order to proceed altogether to Quebec. On arriving at the rendezvous, the 12 prisoners who were free killed the 8 old Indians, and the women and children and escaped. Two days after the blow, the tribe arrived with the 11 other prisoners, and being surprised at seeing their people dead were informed by a Micmac squaw, who had not yet expired, of what had occurred; seeing which, these Indians made their prisoners land, and explaining to them their comrades' conduct, killed them all to avenge the death of their people, and have arrived with the 11 scalps.

Videttes recalled.

Idem. To dismiss the guard of the signal fires along the South shore.

Packet Boats.

The orders sent to the South shore to stop the English packet boats will remain in force so as to prevent their coming up as far as Quebec.

Like order to relieve M. Cartier appointed to manœuvre the rafts at Ile Aux Coudres. The orders issued to the North shore will continue, in like manner, in force.

11 Prisoners—25 Scalps.

Chevalier de Repentigny, who went out with a party of Indians to fight, arrives from Montreal; he made an attack near Corlac and took 11 prisoners and 25 scalps.

10 Men Massacred.

We learn by this occasion that a detachment consisting of a Sergeant and 9 soldiers who were detailed to bring to Quebec, in a canoe, the three Indian murderers surrendered at Montreal, had all been massacred and thrown into the river at a place called Mamiche,<sup>1</sup> in Lake St. Peter, 5 or 6 leagues from 3 Rivers; the three assassins have escaped; 'tis not known whether the other Indians joined them; such is the presumption; the bodies of only four of these men have been found in the canoe, and 2 or 3 have been found on the bank. 'Tis to be feared that the Indians, who were well disposed, will become disorderly in consequence of this accident; word has been sent from Three Rivers to Montreal to try and overtake the assassins.

News from Beaubassin.

11th Couriers from Beaubassin bring us letters from Father Germain. This missionary writes us, on the 23<sup>d</sup> ult<sup>o</sup>, that the schooner commanded by Sieur Gosselin has arrived at Cocagne<sup>1</sup> on the 17th, and that he made him put into the River des Gasparaux at Bay Verte, where he is in safety; expects Sieurs Marin and Bailloul, who have not yet arrived.

12th A boat arrives from Bay Verte with 3 deserters from Port Royal, who left the fort on the 15th of June; they report that the garrison consists of about 1500 regulars and militia, which we do not believe, and that the English are fortifying the place.

Detachment to the Island of St' John.

On the strength of what the Minister writes, respecting the approaching restitution of Ile Royale, we have thought proper to send some provisions and goods to the inhabitants of the

Island of St. John, and to those of Ile Royale who are scattered along the coasts of Acadia, and are deprived of all succors since the capture of Louishourg. The General has thought proper to send to the Island of St. John a detachment, consisting of two officers and 25 soldiers, only, the command of which he has given to Sieur Benoit, lieutenant of the troops, formerly in service at Ile Royale. M<sup>r</sup> Hocquart is having two middle-sized vessels prepared to carry the provisions of this detachment and those whom we send in concert, to assist the inhabitants and to encourage them beforehand to resume and improve their old settlements.

Arrived, at Quebec, 25 French prisoners, being the crews of divers French vessels that have been captured; they were sent from New-York, under the care of an English officer and 7 other Englishmen, who, also, brought 4 of our farmers who had been taken prisoners on our Montreal frontiers. In sending these prisoners the Governor of New-York is silent as regards some twenty other Canadians who have been carried away from our settlements.

News from Beaubassin.

17th Couriers from Beaubassin inform us of the arrival there of Sieur Marin and of Sieur Bailleul with the Indians he had in charge. Sieur Marin advises us, on the 1st of this month, that he expects to leave in 4 days, with his detachment, for Ile Royale; that he will first proceed to the Church of Scatary, where there is a great number of cattle belonging to the enemy, as well as fire-wood; that he will then await new orders respecting a design formed against Port Royal.

Sailed, for France, the snow La Nympe. We have written to the Minister by this opportunity.

22<sup>d</sup> Sailed, for Martinico, the snow La Jeannette, Captain Bernetier.

Idem. The ship L'Amphitrite, Captain Lavocat, for St. Domingo.

23<sup>d</sup> The English officer, who has brought to Montreal the 29 French prisoners, arrives at Quebec with the Englishmen who accompany him. He has applied to carry back with him the 20 English prisoners belonging to the government of New-York.

24th Sailed, the snow L'Elisabeth, one of the 2 vessels that we dispatch to the Island of St. John, to convey provisions for the inhabitants of that place and those of Ile Royale, who have taken refuge on the coasts of Acadia.

The General writes to Beaubassin by the return of the two couriers; he tells M. Marin to return to Quebec with his detachment, in consequence of the cessation of hostilities, which he advises him of, recommending him to cease, and make the Indians cease all hostilities against the English, and, moreover, to be always on his guard against attacks.

Lieutenant de St. Vincent, who conducted to Michilimakinac the convoy destined for that post, has returned to Quebec. M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre, the commandant of said place, informs us that affairs seem so far reëstablished that he has determined, in conjunction with the officers who happened to be on the spot, to send to all the Northern posts the merchant traders and voyageurs who were licensed for those posts.

Arrived, an English prize, taken by Sieur Curodeau, who sailed from Quebec on the 10th of June for Martinico. He has returned for the purpose of bringing in his prize.

25th Ship L'heureux retour, of Rochelle, has anchored in the stream.

Sieur Curodeau, who took the prize which arrived on the 24th, has anchored in the stream.

We send back the English officer who was deputed from New-York; we deliver over to him 20 prisoners belonging to divers of the New England Provinces; 3 or 4 of them only belong to New-York. The General writes, by this opportunity, to the Governor of that Province that he is surprised at having, up to the present time, only 4 of our Canadians who were taken on our frontiers; that he had determined not to return to this Governor any of the English prisoners belonging to his government; that nothing but the armistice had induced him to release these, but that he will not send back those who remain here, belonging to that government, until the Canadians be restored who are prisoners among the Mohawks; that this Governor must not spare any effort to withdraw them from the hands of these Indians, so as to respond to the attention which we, on our side, bestowed to the recovery of their people. Lieutenant de Ligneris is appointed to conduct this deputy and his party as far as New-York, with orders to insist on the Governor's surrendering our Canadians.

26th Ship Le Tourneur, freighted on account of the King, has anchored in the stream.

M<sup>r</sup> Bigot having disembarked at St. Joachim, slept there on the 25th and arrived to-day at Quebec in a calash, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

War Party.

27th Chevalier de Niverville arrives at Quebec on his return from an expedition with his detachment of Canadians and Indians. The most of his people fell sick on the march. They fought, but indifferently, on the 13th of this month, within an arpent and  $\frac{1}{2}$  of Fort Massachusetts, against 30 Englishmen, whom 6 Abenakis had drawn out of the fort, and against whom they fought whilst retreating to join our men, so that there were killed only 5 Englishmen, who fell on the field, and only one Huron and one Iroquois wounded.<sup>1</sup>

New-York Deputation.

Sieur de Niverville, when passing Fort St. Frederic, has been entrusted with a letter for the General, which was brought to that fort by three English deputies; it is dated 1st of August, O. S., and is from the Governors of Boston and New-York, who send copy of the proclamation of the King of England's declaration of a suspension of hostilities, which they are about to declare likewise, on their part; mention 14 French prisoners recently sent back by M<sup>r</sup> Shirley, who have not yet arrived.

Answer.

30th The General sends Sieur de Niverville back to Montreal, to hand to M<sup>r</sup> de Ligneris, who proceeds to New-York, the letter he has written in answer to the Governor of that Province, and to him of Boston; he informs them, that he has ordered all hostilities to cease, and, as far as depends on him, will put a stop to all hostilities on the part of our Indians, and adds, that he wishes the 14 French prisoners who are announced, may be of the number of those whom he demands, and who were detained among the Mohawks.

Island of St John.

31st Sailed, the second vessel with provisions and effects for the Island of St. John, for the relief of the inhabitants of that island and others. The detachment of regulars has embarked on board this vessel.

The King's frigate, Le Zephür, has anchored in the stream.

The Assassins.

Count de la Galissonnière writes to M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, the commandant at Montreal, to notify the nations, who are still at Montreal, from him, that since it has been impossible to overtake the 3 murderers who assassinated the detachment that was conveying them to Quebec, it is necessary that these nations do, themselves, look up those murderers in order to surrender them anew.

Detroit.

September 5th M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron arrives at Quebec on his return from Detroit, whither he conducted the convoy destined for that post. We receive letters from all the posts; the Hurons, who are at Point Montreal (Detroit), appear again too convenient to Nicolas, who has removed to the Beautiful River; they could easily notify that traitor of any expedition set on foot against him. Scarce a doubt remains of the Chouenons being in league with the English.

Micmacs of Ile Royale.

Sieur Bourdon, an officer of Ile Royale, sails with some twenty Micmac Indians, who are going to winter in Ile Royale for the purpose of cutting fire-wood there.

10th Sieur Abel, who was sent last spring to Cape Chat, has returned with his men to Quebec.

Sieur Aubert.

11th Sieur Aubert, the commander at Cape Desrosiers, has likewise returned.

French Prisoners.

13th We learn, from Montreal, the arrival there of eleven French prisoners, who have been sent back by the Governor of Boston.

Beaubassin.

16th We are in receipt of intelligence from Beaubassin. Father Germain writes us, on the 25th of August, that a number of French and Indians of Sieur Marin's detachment, have fallen sick, which has retarded the execution of the hostilities in the direction of Ile Royale. The cessation of hostilities was not yet known at Beaubassin, and Sieur Marin was waiting the complete recovery of his troops before setting out.

2 Vessels.

16th Arrived, 2 vessels from Martinico, with Sirop, Taffia, &c.

Sailed, Sieur Du Chambon and Sieur Decout, with a detachment of 30 soldiers of Ile Royale, who are going to winter at Grand Brador, for the purpose of cutting fire-wood.

Le 3 Cousins.

24th Ship 3 Cousins, Captain Charest, from Bourdeaux, has anchored in the stream.

Ships La Favorite and La Sultane, the snow Le Dauphin and ship Le Lis, all of Rochelle, have anchored in the stream.

5 Nations.

30th Abbé Picquet leaves Quebec for Fort Frontenac; he is to examine the neighborhood of that fort for a location best adapted for a village, to be formed by the Iroquois of the Five Nations, who propose to embrace Christianity.

Return of Sieur Marin.

October 1st Sieur Marin, Junior, arrives from Beaubassin; he did not receive, in season, the letters advising him of the suspension of hostilities. In the neighborhood of Louisbourg he made prisoners of a captain, a lieutenant, an ensign, two sergeants and four soldiers, belonging to that garrison, with two officers of an English man-of-war, and 4 ladies. These prisoners having informed M<sup>r</sup> Marin that hostilities had ceased, he sent the 4 ladies back to the Governor of Louisbourg, and wrote to him that he could not surrender the other prisoners to him until notified of the suspension, of which he was ignorant. That Governor immediately wrote, and the prisoners have been sent back, except one, named Mayer, formerly the orderly (Suisse) of our garrison, at Louisbourg, who deserted a few days before the surrender of that place, and is accused of treason. This Swiss and his wife have been brought to Quebec, and both have been committed to prison.

The bateau, Le Saint Jean Baptiste, has arrived from Rochelle.

3<sup>d</sup> Count de La Galissonnière writes to Chevalier de Longueuil, commandant at Detroit, that, though we be at peace, every attempt of the English to settle at River à la Roche, White river, the Beautiful river, or any of their tributaries, must be resisted by force, and should this fail, they must, in every case, be summoned to retire, and warned of the disasters which may overtake them, should they not obey.

Letters from Montreal, of the 1st instant, state that 14 or 15 canoes of the Five Nations are hourly expected. The General writes M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, commandant at Montreal, to send them to Quebec, as soon as they shall have arrived.

9th Ship La Couronne arrives from Rochelle.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Lagalissonnière and Bigot transmit, on the 26th September, 1748, a journal of military occurrences in Canada, and of the various intelligence received at Quebec, since the month of November, 1747.

The Mohawks have made no incursion into our settlements since that date; news had been received, only, that a party of these Indians had set out, but returned on learning that our frontiers were well guarded.

Two parties of our Indians, one of which was composed of eight or ten Cristinaux, had made an attack on them, scalped the principal chief of the Mohawks and a few others.

The fort, at the Saint Thérèse Rapid, has been entirely abandoned, and a portion of the materials has served to construct another fort, at Saint John, at the head of all the rapids; by means of this fort, and of the road from it to La Prairie de la Magdeleine, Fort St. Frederic is in a position to receive relief within twice twenty-four hours, whilst previously supplies had to be sent by way of Chambly, whence it was necessary to ascend three rapids, those of Chambly, St. Thérèse and of St. John. It is calculated that six thousand livres will be saved, annually, in the item of transportation. This new fort will facilitate the settlement of the lands on Lake Champlain, and the getting out of building timber.

They look upon it as one of the most useful ever established in the Colony; nevertheless, had Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Lagalissonnière and Hocquart, who ordered its construction, foreseen that peace was so near at hand, they would never have determined on it without my Lord's instructions. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot is to report the expense he has incurred for the new road.

The English had made preparations for an attack on Fort St. Frederic; their artillery, consisting of eight or ten guns, had reached Fort Satarasto, which they eventually abandoned and burnt.

M<sup>r</sup> Bigot states, in a private letter, that he cannot render any account of the expenses incurred at Fort St. John. They are estimated in the public (account) at forty @ fifty thousand livres, which is an exorbitant sum for a picket fort.

Sieur de Léry, Junior, who superintended its construction, says nothing about it; he has merely mentioned to M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière that the chimneys had settled. This Governor has given orders not to rebuild them. This accident occurred in consequence of the Engineer not having looked for a solid foundation; that fort cannot be occupied this year; an officer and ten soldiers will, however, be stationed in an adjoining building. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot complains of Sieur de Léry, the elder, who does not render any accounts; he has written to him on this subject, and advised him that next year, earth would be paid for at Quebec by the toise.<sup>1</sup> At present it is paid for by little cart loads, half full, containing only a handful of earth; each load costs 2 sous, and only half the loss would be incurred were they to count fair.

To tolerate this mode of remuneration it would be necessary that the Engineer should be on the ground, but he is so only rarely and transiently; besides this, the carts are partly owned by the Officers and Engineers, which is the cause of all the abuse. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot is informed that the pay at Fort St. John is at the same rate; that the Engineer furnishes the horses, and he doubts not but a further grant will be required. M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière does, in fact, make such a demand.

He sends the extract of the payments for grading; those of the month of June, when the country carts with those of the town were used, amounted to 25,106<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>s</sup>. The former were discharged on the first of July, which ought to cause a falling off of nearly one-half; the expense, notwithstanding, amounts to 29,924<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>s</sup>.

Sieur de Léry is of opinion that the earth should not be measured by the yard, because some will have to be taken in broken and stony places, that would cause him trouble, whilst there is none in paying for it by the spoonful (par marron).

The earth removed this year amounts, by yard measurement, to 125,229<sup>h</sup> 7' 6<sup>d</sup>. More than 50 thousand livres have been stolen. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot has seen the earth that has been removed; he says it would not amount, at Louisbourg, to 50 thousand livres.

The repairs of Fort Frontenac are completed. They amount to 6,725<sup>h</sup> 12' 6<sup>d</sup>; and considerable, it is stated, remains to be done at Niagara.

M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière demands a gratuity for Sieur de Léry, Junior, in consideration of the care he has bestowed on the construction of Fort St. John.

Quebec, 23rd October, 1748.

My Lord.

I did not expect to enter into any details on occasion of the different movements of the Indians, and the negotiations which I, in the town of Montreal, and the commandants at the different posts had with them. They are all to be found in the Journal prepared by me, conjointly with the Intendant. However, as this matter is much confused, and as the various reports which will, possibly, be made to you, will render it more obscure, I cannot dispense writing to you at length relative to subjects of the greatest importance to the Colony.

It was shortly after my arrival that I learned the revolt of the Miamis, the consequences of which, though unfortunate, have not been near so much so as they seemed to be. That nation was divided into two parties, whereof one that appears attached to the French is, I believe, the most considerable, and has remained at the village. It did, however, accept its share of the plunder, but gave it back afterwards; no one was killed in that affair.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, the commandant at Detroit, having received intelligence of this disorder, and at the same time of the good disposition of a part of that nation, sent Sieur Dubuisson thither, in the beginning of the winter, with a sufficient escort to keep possession of the fort, which had been partially burnt, but not to undertake anything.

This officer, and his little garrison, had to undergo considerable suffering through the winter, in consequence of the unfriendly disposition of the Indians, who extorted (rançonnés) on them for provisions. Sieur Dubuisson had carried scarcely anything with him from Detroit, where, great scarcity also prevailed. However, he subsisted until the spring at a considerable expense to the King, and kept up negotiations with the chief of the hostile party, who, probably, will alter his course.

During the winter, a Frenchman, who strayed from the fort, was killed by an Iroquois, without Sieur Dubuisson having been able to induce the Miamis, who pretended to be favorable to the French, to pursue the murderer, as they had been won over to connive at the perpetration of that hostile blow.

Sieur Dubuisson returned to Detroit in the spring, with the residue of the plunder that had been given up, and the property of the farmers of the post. Chevalier de Longueuil, whom I had ordered to maintain that place, was to send Sieur Dubuisson thither, in the month of August, with a considerable detachment, well supplied, under the command of Sieur de la

Maudière, who is likewise to repair, if needs be, to the nations on the Oubache, bad Indians who have remained faithful up to the present time, but among whom there are not wanting evil-disposed fellows, who have been gained over by the English.

I return to Detroit, where everything was in disorder long before my arrival, in consequence of the revolt of some Hurons who call themselves Christians; won over by the English, they had assassinated five Frenchmen passing through their villages of Sanduskee. The domiciliated Outaouagas and Pouteoutamis of Detroit, had been solicited to do the like, but it does not appear that the Pouteoutamis had lent any ear to these proposals.

Some Outaouas and Saulteurs had, on the contrary, conspired with the Hurons to destroy Detroit, and the conspiracy was pretty well managed and on the point of exploding, when the Sandosket assassination led to its discovery. Then all those who were not compromised, joined the Pouteoutamis, the French and the well-disposed Outaouas; and this return so intimidated the assassins, that they came to supplicate for mercy, which was granted them by M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, agreeably to the orders he had from M<sup>r</sup> de Beauharnois, and more especially in consequence of his small force and the necessity he was under of living. Very mild conditions were annexed to this peace, but whilst it was yet negotiating, and when all, except Chev. de Longueuil, considered it certain, a party, which was not ignorant of the negotiations, even made an attempt, in the immediate vicinity of Detroit, to carry off a French canoe; three men who composed the entire crew, were wounded. On receipt of the news, Chev. de Longueuil sent off a detachment, under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de Beletre, who conducted himself with so much bravery, promptness and precaution, that he effected, without the loss of a man, the capture of the five who perpetrated the attack.

Of these five wretches, one was killed on arriving at Detroit, a second cut his throat in prison, and the remaining three were given up on the urgent solicitation and every possible submission on the part of the Hurons and their protectors, both Indian and French, who represented that this favor would indubitably bring back the Hurons of Sanduskee; but as soon as they received the prisoners they quitted the post, where they did not consider themselves safe, and withdrew towards the Beautiful river; thence they sent out emissaries everywhere to induce the Nations to revolt. A great many, however, returned to Detroit, but whether they are to be regarded as penitents or spies, there is no knowing.

I spoke in other letters of the Chaouanons and Illinois. The Pouteoutamis of St. Joseph participated in all these movements only by offers of service and protestations of fidelity, which I have every reason to consider real and sincere.

On three or four occasions, during the winter and spring, I received letters from M. de Longueuil, and some ambassadors from Nations who were faithful, or were reputed to be so. These informed me of everything I have related to you, and demanded of me some assistance of men, ammunition and provisions, which induced me to dispatch the convoy thither as quick as possible. It consisted of more than a hundred Frenchmen and ten or twelve of the most reliable Nepissing Indians of the Lake, and of a great number of voyageurs, who were going up to trade, and was commanded by Captain de Celoron, who had M<sup>r</sup> de la Naudiere as his lieutenant. This convoy, when passing Fort Frontenac and Niagara, made a strong impression on the Iroquois and other Nations it met, and the news of its approach, I think, determined, more than anything else, the principal chiefs of Detroit to come to Montreal, where they arrived about the same time as the Missilimakinak Nations, of whom I now proceed to write.

Missilimakinac is in some sort the centre and entrepôt of all the Northern, as Detroit is of all the Southern, posts. Notwithstanding all those posts are farther from the English than the Southern, their invitations and intrigues had been, in some degree, the cause of more disorder there; scarcely any of the Nations had been exempt from the general seduction. Some Frenchmen were killed at Saguinan, an Ottawa village, between Detroit and Missilimakinac; others at Chibouinani, otherwise La Cloche,<sup>1</sup> by some Mississagués, others at Grosse Isle, near Missilimakinac, and even at Missilimakinac, also, where no respect was paid to the commandant; the voyageurs were robbed and maltreated at Sault St. Mary, and elsewhere, on Lake Superior. In fine, there appeared to be no security anywhere. All these disorders occurred whilst the elder M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne, commandant at Missilimakinac, was at Montreal, or rather had brought down to that place, by the Marquis de Beauharnois' orders, a portion of those same tribes who have executed or plotted all those treacheries. The news arrived when M<sup>r</sup> de la Corne was on an expedition towards the frontiers of New England. The Marquis de Beauharnois then took the resolution to send M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre as commandant to Missilimakinac; a very good officer, and much esteemed among all the Nations of those parts, by whom [no one is] more loved and feared. He found them, nevertheless, on his arrival, so ill-disposed that he advised me not to send any Frenchmen thither until I should hear from him.

I waited, in this expectation, very impatiently throughout the entire winter, and was obliged, in this state of incertitude, to dispatch the convoy. I think it is not so strong as the one for Detroit, but that it has nothing to fear. It was commanded by Sieur de St. Vincent, who had Sieur de la Corne St. Luc as lieutenant. At length I received advices from that post, much more favorable than I dared hope for. M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre detained all the voyageurs and goods at Missilimakinac, and answered the different deputations of Indians only by threatening not to send any more traders to their country, and leave them in want of everything, if they did not deliver the murderers of the Frenchmen into his hands, and restore the plunder they had got. His firmness met with every success. The Saguinam people brought in one of the murderers; those of Missilimakinac brought in another; others, belonging to Saguinan brought in two hostages in lieu of the murderers, whom they could not overtake; a portion of the plunder has been paid for, and arrangements have been made to pay for the remainder.

On receipt of these prisoners and hostages, M<sup>r</sup> de St. Pierre did not hold out any promises or hopes of life to them. Nevertheless, their own tribe conducted them to Montreal and delivered them up to me, a circumstance which never occurred and perhaps never will again, if this Colony have not more troops than at present. It happened, at the same time, that a third murderer having got in, on the road, among the other Indians, accompanied them to the audience chamber where, being recognized, I had him removed to prison with the other two.

In other respects I have treated these penitent nations the best way I could, and declared to them that the act they had just performed effaced the recollection of their ill conduct, but that the murderers had no share in that act of oblivion; that I did not grant, but prolonged their lives to put the remainder in mind of their fault. I told them, likewise, that I did not wish to make the innocent suffer for the guilty, and ordered the hostages to be given up, at the same time directing the nation to bring me those in whose places they had stood.

Though the nations might, perhaps, have looked for more mildness on my part, and had presented some petitions to me during the first days, which I rejected, it appeared to me that they felt the necessity I was under of detaining fellows who would have taken advantage of their liberty only to proceed and embroil matters anew in their villages.

It did not prevent the chiefs, who interested themselves the most to procure their liberation, to request my permission to go to war against the English in order to revenge themselves for having been deceived; I granted it very readily, and they departed.

Those of the Detroit arrived during these transactions, and had been witnesses of what had passed respecting the murderers. A portion of their young men had gone also on the war path, and the old men belonging to Detroit and Missilimakinac returned some time after to their villages.

I was obliged, then, to leave Montreal where I had in vain been waiting for the Iroquois who had promised me to upbraid them publicly with all the invitations to assassinate the French, which those Iroquois had received from them.

As I had no doubt but the Missilimakinac Nations would, on their return from the war, renew their applications to me to get back the guilty whom they had surrendered to me, I ordered M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, at parting, to send these three Indians, under a sufficient escort, down to Quebec. I was intending to give one of them up to a Saguinan chief named Achaoualina, a relative of his, who, notwithstanding, had delivered him up, and whom I regard as a worthy man and a good Frenchman.

The old men having all taken their departure, and the young men being about to arrive, M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil put the three prisoners safely and secretly on board one of the King's canoes, under the command of one of the best Sergeants of the garrison, along with seven picked soldiers, and enjoined on them all the precautions requisite to be taken in such a case; but in vain. The negligence of the Sergeant cost him his life; those three men, without arms and with manacles on their feet, killed or drowned eight well armed men, and having cut their irons with an axe on the bows of the canoe, escaped ashore and thence into the woods.

The canoe was discovered a short time afterwards, with the Sergeant's and some of the soldiers' bodies, but in consequence of a series of misfortunes the news was conveyed first to Three Rivers only, instead of to Montreal. At Three Rivers, in place of sending off to Montreal, a statement of the facts was drawn up (on verbalisa), and even at Montreal all the diligence and activity that the case required to intercept these three Indians was not employed. It has been ascertained, or supposed, that they wandered a long time in the woods before striking the Grand river, and that they reached it at the spot naturally to be expected; finally, 'tis said they went back with the old men of their village who had preceded them some time, but who, Indian fashion, had not used great expedition.

Thus was lost, in a great measure, the fruit of Sieur St. Pierre's good management, and of all the fatigue I endured to get the nations who had surrendered these rascals, to listen to reason. This mishap must not discourage those of my successors who will find themselves in similar circumstances, and does not prevent my entertaining the conviction that the Indians ought not to be pardoned so easily as they are wont to be in this country, and that there are no better means of restraining these nations than the long detention in prison of those among them who have been guilty of any act of treachery.

I conclude with the Iroquois, with whom I might have commenced. On arriving here, last year, I found their deputies at Quebec; they left there with some fine presents on our part, and fair promises on theirs to observe a strict neutrality, and bring back the Mohawks who had gone astray. They have been, the whole of this winter, apparently quiet, though they had promised the English to wage war against us; they have even been on the point, this spring, of telling the English that they did not want any war with us. The Mohawks, whom we held prisoners, produced this good effect. Nevertheless, Belts have been conveyed from the Five Nations to almost all the nations of the Continent, to prevail on them to murder the French.

However that may be, they are much attached to their prisoners, whom they were told, long ago, they might have by bringing back the French taken within the government of Montreal; but the English, who in peace as in war, are bent only on creating confusion, prevented them doing this, and persuaded them that they would have their prisoners given up to them. This produced a letter from Mr Clinton, Governor-General of New-York, which was written at the very commencement of the war, wherein he haughtily demanded them back, as subjects of Great Britain, in virtue of the 15th article of the treaty of Utrecht. I answered him that that article neither named nor designated the Iroquois, and I caused the latter to be informed that they could not have worse protection than that of England. This is my position as regards them. They are on the point of arriving. I shall persist in detaining their people, until I recover the French. I have even detained, for greater security, those English of New-York that were in my hands. I have, also, to reproach those Iroquois with their intrigues, and shall threaten them with letting loose on them the major portion of the nations of the Continent, who expressly authorized me to do so, in case they persist. In fine, I shall do my utmost to extract from them a very clear and precise declaration, that they do not consider themselves subjects of England, and will send it to you in the best form possible.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

LA GALISSONNIÈRE.

Quebec, 26 October, 1748.

My Lord.

The peace having enabled me to send back almost all the English prisoners, who were a great expense here, makes it unnecessary for me to render you an account of our position here in that regard, with Mr Shirley. Since my arrival, I have had no cause, except for congratulation, on account of the facilities he has afforded for the exchanges, and I have responded thereto to the best of my power. I wrote him, this fall, on the subject of the settlers belonging to Ile Royale, who, it was said, were still detained at Boston, but, for want of an opportunity, he sent me no reply. The peace will, no doubt, assure their return, and it will be easier for the new Governor of Louisbourg than for me to pursue that affair.

Up to the present time, I have not so much reason to be pleased with the conduct of Mr Clinton, Governor of New-York, who, through a misapprehension perhaps of the interests of his Province, has dissuaded the Mohawks, I suspect, ever since the peace, from bringing back the French they had taken, two years ago, within the government of Montreal. He had, meanwhile, restored some prisoners this summer, but they were sailors, whom he had sent to Boston, and whom M<sup>r</sup> Shirley had in a manner loaned him; he wrote me, at the same time, as I have already stated; also, that he expected I should return him the same number of prisoners from New-York, among the rest the Mohawks, who, being subjects of Great Britain, were, according to him, to be exchanged like the others. I answered him by M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris, a very prudent officer, whom I sent to Orange with some English officers and soldiers, belonging to all the governments except New-York—

First. That I did not recognize the Mohawks as subjects of Great Britain.

Secondly. That having incurred great expense in ransoming the English belonging to New-York and other Provinces, out of the hands of the Indians, it was just that the English should do the like to recover the Canadian prisoners who are among the Mohawks.

3<sup>d</sup> That I should not return any more English prisoners belonging to New-York, until the Canadians were sent back to me.

This is our present position, but I hope that, what with the instructions I have given M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris and what I am about to say to the deputies of the other Iroquois nations, who are to arrive here to-morrow, everything will be agreeably arranged.

I shall have the honor to render you an account thereof next year.

I am with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your, &c.,

LA GALISSONNIÈRE.

Authentic Minute of the Speech of the Six Iroquois Nations, at the Castle of St. Louis of Quebec, in 1748.

This day, the second of November, one thousand seven hundred and forty-eight, at two o'clock in the afternoon, We, the undersigned, Notaries Royal, residing within the Provostship of Quebec, having been invited by My lord Marquis de la Galissonnière, General Commander of New France, and by My lord Bigot, Knight, Councillor of the King in his Councils, Intendant of Justice, Police, Finance and Marine in New France, repaired to the grand council chamber of the Castle of St. Louis of Quebec, wherein shortly after met the deputies of the Iroquois Nations, hereinafter named; the said deputies being to the number of about eighty, who were accompanied by Sieur de Joncaire, officer in the King's troops and interpreter, who informed us that these deputies were, for the most part, the principal chiefs of the said Nations; to wit, of the Senecas, Onontagués, Cayugas, Oneidas, and that they were empowered to speak [for the] Tascorios. At the instant entered the said Chamber my said Lords, the Commander and Intendant Generals, followed by a great number of persons of distinction, and being seated, My Lord, the General Commander, said:

"Children, I have invited you to-day to inquire if you are subjects of the English, as I have heard they pretend, and as I have been advised by Mess<sup>rs</sup> Clinton and Shirley, Governors of New-York and of Boston, of whom these are the letters, wherein they write me that you are vassals of the Crown of England, and that you are bound to go to war for the English, whenever they order you so to do." And, thereupon, said letters have been exhibited in the original, and said Sieur de Joncaire having taken the translation, which, also, was on the desk, explained it to them in a loud voice, as well as the question of My Lord, the General Commanding, which they appeared clearly to understand, as divers persons there present, conversant with their language, have assured us.

Then the said chiefs deliberated some time together, after which, Cachointioni, chief of the Onnontagues, speaking in the name of his village and of that of the Senecas, said: That formerly there were no Whites in the whole of this Continent, but that since about one hundred years both French and English have settled on it; that they established trade with the one and the other, in order to obtain guns, blankets and other commodities, formerly unknown to them; that they were, also, glad to see traders settling in their neighborhood, but that they had not ceded to any one their lands, which they hold only of Heaven. He finished by saying, that all he had said was in the name of the Nations here present, by their deputies, and even of the Tascororins.

Then rose Toniohae, a Cayuga chief, who repeated the same thing, and added, as a proof that the Six Iroquois Nations were not subjects of England, that in this and the preceding wars, the English had continually solicited them to take up the hatchet against the French, which they constantly refused to do, and will still refuse, being desirous to remain at peace with the French and English.

The Cayuga concluded by saying, likewise, that he spoke in the name of all the Nations present, and they all approved, in their customary manner, what he said.

Then My Lord, the General commanding, required of us a minute (acte) of all these speeches and answers given by the said Sieurs Deputies, and approved by all their confreres, and, also, demanded that it be signed by several of those present, especially by those who understand their language; which we have granted him to serve and be valid. And my said Lords, the General commanding and the Intendant, have signed these presents with Pierre Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Esquire, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of Saint Louis, Lieutenant-Governor of the town and Castle of Quebec, and other officers and persons of distinction present, to wit, M<sup>r</sup> Jean Victor Varin, Commissary of the Marine, Intendant of Montreal, Paul de Becard, Esquire, Sieur de Fouville, Captain in the troops of the detachment of Marines maintained in this country for the King's service, Gaspard Chaussegros, Esquire Sieur de Léry, Captain and Engineer in Chief in this country, Knight of Saint Louis, Daniel Leonard Esquire Sieur de Beaujeu, Captain of said Troops; and, likewise, the following conversant with the Iroquois languages, to wit, Louis de Chapt, Esquire Sieur de Lacorne, also Captain of the Marines in this country, Pierre de Chapt, Esquire Chevalier de la Corne, also Captain of said troops, Philip Thomas de Joncaire, Esquire, Lieutenant of said troops and Interpreter aforesaid; Sieurs Legardeur de Montesson and Dagneaux de la Saussaye and Sieur Louis le Cavalier, also interpreter, and by us, the said Notaries, and the said Deputies, by name, have made and drawn the marks of their Nations, not knowing how to write.

Done and concluded at the said Castle Saint Louis of Quebec, the day and year aforesaid; thus signed on the minute or original remaining in the keeping and possession of Du Laurent, one of the said Notaries. La Galissoniere, Bigot, Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Varrin, Fouville, Chaussegros de Lery, La Corne, Beaujeu, the Chevalier de Lacorne, Joncaire, Dagneaux Douville, Montesson, Dailleboust, Dagneaux de la Saussaye, Le Cavalier, and Panet and Du Laurent, Subscribing Notaries, with paraphs. Signed, Panet and Du Laurent, Notaries.

Extract from the Journal of the voyage of M<sup>r</sup> de Céloron, Captain of Infantry commanding the detachment sent to the River Ohio, by order of the Marquis de la Galissonnière, Captain-General for New France, to take possession, in the King's name, of said river and of its tributaries.

Copy of the record of the deposition of the leaden plate and the King's arms, buried at the mouth of the Ohio river, and of the inscription.

In the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine, we, Celoron, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, captain commanding a detachment sent by order of the Marquis de la Galissonnière, Captain-General in Canada, and the Beautiful River, otherwise called the Ohio, accompanied by the principal officers of our detachment, have buried, at the foot of a red oak tree, on the South bank of the River Ohio, and opposite the point of a little island, where the two rivers, Ohio and Kanaougon, unite, and in forty degrees five minutes, twenty-three seconds, a leaden plate, with the following inscription engraved thereon :

INSCRIPTION.

In the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine, in the reign of Louis XV., King of France.

We, Celoron, commanding officer of a detachment sent by the Marquis de la Galissonnière, Captain-General of New France, to reestablish peace in some Indian villages of these Cantons, have buried this plate at the confluence of the Rivers Ohio and Kanaouagan, this twenty-ninth day of July, as a monument of the renewal of the possession which we have taken of the said River Ohio, and of all the lands on both sides, up to the source of the said rivers, as the preceding Kings of France have enjoyed, or ought to enjoy, the same, and have maintained themselves there by arms and treaties, and especially by those of Riswick, Utrecht and Aix la Chapelle. We have, moreover, affixed the King's arms at the same place to a tree. In testimony whereof, we have signed and drawn up this present procès verbal.

Done, at the mouth of the Beautiful river, this twenty-ninth July, one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine.

Signed by all the officers.

M. de Puyzieux to M. de la Galissonnière?

Versailles, 10th September, 1749.

I have the honor to transmit to you, sir, an abstract which the Earl of Albemarle sent me of letters relative to the surrender of prisoners of war in America. That ambassador pretends that the respective commissioners do not understand each other ; that they speak of reciprocal ransom for the surrender of prisoners, when, by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, there ought to be no question about it, and he believes all these trifling discussions will terminate amicably by the transmission of orders from France and England respectively, to the French and English Governors, not to create any untoward (mauvaises) difficulties.

I shall expect your explanations, sir, in order to draw up my answer to the English ambassador, and I will be obliged to you to return me the annexed abstract.

I have the honor to be, with sincere attachment,

Sir, Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

I have the honor to send you back, sir, the annexed note of Mr. d'York,<sup>1</sup> which you had the kindness to confide to me.

Colonel Muscareene to the Duke of Bedford, dated Annapolis-royal, the second of June, one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine.

"Renders an account of the proclamation of peace. He had heard it reported since his last letter, of the month of April, one thousand seven hundred and forty-eight, that two French officers, with twenty or thirty men and some Indians, had just constructed a fort and formed a settlement at the mouth of the River St. John, about twelve leagues north of Annapolis, across the Bay of Fundy. Recommends the settlement of the boundaries."

N. B. This is a mere rumor.

Governor Shirley to the Duke of Bedford, dated Boston, the eighteenth of June, one thousand seven hundred and nineteen.

"Transmits the preceding despatch and speaks of a settlement as of a matter of consequence, though he have no other proof of it than the foregoing letter."

N° 1. M. de la Galissonnière, Governor of Canada, to Governor Clinton, dated Quebec, 25th of August, 1748.

"Demands the French prisoners of war, in the hands of the Mohawk Indians, at the same time refuses to send back the Indian prisoners, subjects of the King of Great Britain, whom he retains; insists that Deputies from those Indian Nations come and treat respecting their ransom. The remainder of the letter consists of accusations, recriminations and unintelligible stories of what the English had done during the war."

N° 2. M. Desligneris to Governor Clinton, dated New-York, the nineteenth of October, one thousand seven hundred and forty-eight.

N. B. The gentleman was sent by the Governor of Canada to New-York to treat about the Canada Indians.

"Requests that his departure be hastened on account of the bad season; says that M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière will send back the Mohawk Indians as soon as they will have set the Canadians

"at liberty; but that the Governor of Canada does not say so to Governor Clinton, because "he does not consider these Indians as his Britannic Majesty's subjects."

"In answer to a question of Governor Clinton, asking if the Governor of Canada would "release all the English Indians who are in Canada, if some of the French prisoners were "surrendered, and a promise given to send back the others as soon as possible? He says, "that he thinks he would not release all, but probably some."

"Proposes that Colonel Johnson, Governor of Albany, who has influence among the Mohawk "Indians, be instructed to withdraw the French prisoners out of their hands."

Nº 3. Governor Clinton to the Governor of Canada, dated Fort George, in New-York, the tenth of October, one thousand seven hundred and forty-eight.

Says, "As soon as orders were received for the cessation of hostilities, he liberated three "or four hundred French prisoners, and sent them back at the expense of government, and, "moreover, he had released and restored seven French ships captured by New-York privateers, "so that all the French prisoners have their liberty, except those in the hands of the Mohawk "Indians, which is owing to the news of the Governor of Canada refusing to set at liberty, "not only the Indians in his power, but all the other of the King's subjects, and to his making "the surrender of all our prisoners conditional, on the restoration of some few Canadians."

"That he keeps the subjects of Great Britain in close confinement, whilst the French "enjoy full liberty with us. The Governor of New-York promises to set at liberty all the "French in the hands of the Indians, provided the Governor of Canada promises to do the like "on his part, including the subjects of the Five Nations of Indians, who are, indisputably, "vassals of the King of Great Britain, and who, when taken prisoners, were serving under "persons bearing Governor Clinton's commissions.

"He explains the fact respecting the Five Nations of Indians to M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière, who "asserted that they did never subject themselves to the Crown of Great Britain, and proves "to him that [his] predecessors have never called in question that article of the Treaty of "Utrecht, and that the copy he has of the treaty is erroneous.

"And he concludes by wishing to live in friendship, and to cement the peace.

Nº 4. Governor Clinton to the Governor of Canada, with his Instructions to Captain Stoddard, dated New-York, the 10th of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighteen.<sup>1</sup>

"Refers to his preceding letter and to Captain Stoddard, whom he sends to regulate with "him a final exchange of prisoners on both sides. Captain Stoddard has reason to complain "that the English prisoners, including the Indians, have not been surrendered, after Governor "Clinton had set all the French prisoners at liberty.

"That the English prisoners have been in close confinement, whilst the French prisoners "have been unconstrained. Captain Stoddard is furnished with full powers to adjust this "affair in a friendly manner if possible, and to promise a mutual exchange of prisoners, either "at Albany or at the Point, called Crown Point."

N° 5. The Governor of Canada to Governor Clinton, Quebec, the twenty-ninth of December, 1749.<sup>1</sup>

"Contains reiterated complaints of, and reproaches against, the Council of New-York.

"He refuses to liberate the prisoners unless the Canadians be taken out of the hands of the Mohawk Indians and sent to Fort Frederic."

"He denies that the Mohawk Indians, or the Iroquois, are subjects of the King of Great Britain."

"Gives reasons why he has been obliged to keep the English prisoners confined within the barracks at Quebec.

"Sends back M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris with Captain Stoddard, and requests that he may have permission to negotiate personally with the Mohawks; excuses himself for having taken some prisoners since the cessation of hostilities, on the ground that he was ignorant of the fact, and adds that he must retain them as hostages for the surrender of the Canadians."

N° 6. The Deputy Clerk of the Council of New-York to M. Deligneris, dated New-York, 17th March, 1748.

"Writes, by order of the Governor, to inquire if M<sup>r</sup> de Ligneris have sufficient authority to treat for and to guarantee the release of the subjects of Great Britain who still remain in the hands of the French Indians, those of the Five Nations included, in case he be convinced, or sufficient assurances be given him, that the French prisoners in the hands of the Mohocks will be set at liberty, and, finally, if he will be willing to treat.

N° 7. M. Desligneris in answer to the preceding, New-York, nineteenth of March, one thousand seven hundred and forty-eight-9.

Says, "He has full powers, of which his letters and his passport are proof, and promises that so soon as the French prisoners, in the hands of the Mohawks, will have arrived at Montreal, or will be on the road, and M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière will be informed of the fact, all the English prisoners and the Indians in his power will be released, and he will facilitate the ransom of what remains of the English in the Indian Villages; that he will treat with such persons as Governor Clinton shall be pleased to name."

N° 8. Minutes of the Council of New-York of the 27th May,<sup>2</sup> 1749.

"The Governor communicated to the Council an extract of a letter from Colonel Johnson stating that he had got all the French prisoners who are willing to go to Canada out of the hands of the Mohawks, being twelve in number; that those still remaining in their hands are few and will not go on any account; neither will they speak to their Parents.

"That the Indians desire that none of those twelve be given up, until the Indians who are in goal in Canada, and all the rest, of every kind, who are willing to come, are exchanged for them in the woods, somewhere this side of Crown Point or Lake St. Sacrament.

"The Governor and Council consent to release these twelve prisoners on M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris' promise of like conduct on the part of the Governor of Canada; and to propose an exchange at or near Lake Sacrament; and as the Governor of Canada promises to facilitate the "Communicates to him the preceding resolution, and demands his answer."

N° 10. M. de Ligneris to Governor Clinton, dated New-York, the tenth of August, one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine.

"In answer to the preceding letter: the Governor of Canada will liberate all the English and Indians if all the French will be surrendered; if only twelve, only a like number of English; but it is not probable that he will set at liberty all the Indians so long as any French will remain in the hands of the Mohawks, who, when once they have recovered their people, will not put themselves to any trouble to surrender the French.

"Proposes Fort St. Frederic<sup>1</sup> as the place of exchange rather than Lake St. Sacrament, for divers reasons, on account of convenience.

"Asks permission to treat in person with the Mohawks, and adds that if he could have the honor to treat personally with Governor Clinton, matters could be sooner concluded.

N° 11. M. Desligneris to Governor Clinton, dated New-York, the fifteenth of April, N. S., one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine.

"Governor Clinton, having rejected the last, M<sup>r</sup> de Ligneris submits another, to wit: that if he will give him up the twelve French prisoners, before mentioned, he will release all the English. He complains that liberty of negotiating with the English is refused him, whilst the English deputies were allowed to speak to the French Indians.

"If this proposition be not accepted, he demands to be sent to Albany in order to proceed to Canada as soon as possible.

N° 12. Governor Clinton to Governor de la Galissonnière; Fort George, the third of April, one thousand seven hundred and nineteen.<sup>2</sup>

"Their deputies<sup>3</sup> are on another footing since the signature of the definitive treaty.

"All the prisoners, without regard to numbers, shall be sent back, on both sides, without ransom.

"Makes some recriminations, but concludes by desiring to terminate everything amicably.
 "He could have retained the ships captured previous to the cessation of hostilities was known, had he acted as the Governor of Canada had done, when, after the termination of hostilities, on the pretext of being ignorant of that circumstance, he made prisoners of English subjects whom he actually detains as hostages. This is declared an indignity offered to the King of England."

Royal Warrant for Exchanging Indian Prisoners.

[New-York Colonial Manuscripts (in Secretary's Office, Albany), LXXVI.]

GEORGE R.

Trusty and Welbeloved We greet you well.

Whereas it is agreed, between Us & the Most Christian King, that all the Indians allied to, or protected by either of the two Crowns in America, who may have been made prisoners on either side during the late War, should be forthwith exchanged, Our Will & Pleasure therefore is, that you should, immediately upon Receipt hereof, give the proper Directions for causing such Indian Prisoners, allied to, or protected by the Most Christian King, as may be detained in your Government as Prisoners of War, to be restored into the Hands of the French Governors, or into those of such other persons as shall be duly authorized for that purpose; provided that the said French Governor or Governors shall cause to be delivered up into your Hands, or into those of such persons as you shall empower to receive them, all such Indian prisoners in Our alliance, or under our protection, as have been taken by them in the Course of the late War; and it is our farther Will and Pleasure, that you, or the persons properly authorized by you, do agree with the French Governor, or with such Persons as he shall authorize for that Purpose upon fixing a proper Place or Places for the exchanging and delivering up the respective Indian Prisoners taken on both sides during the Course of the late War. And for so doing this shall be your Warrant. And so We bid you farewell. Given at Our Court at St James's on the Seventh Day of December 1749, in the Twenty Third Year of Our Reign.

By His Majesty's Command.

BEDFORD.

The King to M. de la Jonquière.

[New-York Colonial Manuscripts (in Secretary's Office, Albany), LXXVI.]

M. le M<sup>re</sup> de la Jonquière. In order to terminate, amicably, the difficulties which have arisen touching the exchange of prisoners taken during the last war between my Colonies of New France and the English Colonies, I have agreed with my good Brother, the King of Great Britain, that we should respectively issue orders for the immediate release, on both sides, of the French and English prisoners to be yet found in your power and in that of the English governors; also, for the like release of the Indian prisoners among the two nations, but after the surrender of the French and English prisoners; and that you and those governors, each on your side, should facilitate the ransoming of the prisoners who may yet be remaining afterwards in the Indian villages. I transmit you this letter, therefore, to inform you that my intention is, that you come to an understanding with the English governors, who will receive like orders from His Britannic Majesty to execute this exchange on that basis; that is to say, by proceeding with that of the French and English prisoners before proceeding with that of the Indians; and that, afterwards, you facilitate, on your side, the ransoming of the English prisoners who may be in the power of the Indians, my allies, as the English governors are to do that of the French prisoners who will be in the village of the Indian allies of Great Britain. You will render me an account of everything that will be done in execution of my orders and of those of His said Britannic Majesty. And the present having no other object, I pray God to keep you, M. le M<sup>re</sup> de la Jonquière, in His Holy protection. Written at Versailles the twenty-eighth of February, 1750.

Canada; Indian trade, &amp;c.

30th April, 1749. In regard to the arrangements proposed by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Gallissonnière and Bigot to secure the Beaver trade to the Colony and to prevent the English becoming masters of it; which arrangements tended to maintain the price of the Beaver at that paid by the Company during the war; Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Jonquière and Bigot had been advised this year [that the Company had been recommended] to procure lighter, more merchantable and cheaper hollow-ware than usual; finally to substitute for the scarlet cloth of England that of our manufacture, which was equally sought for by the Indians, on account of qualities equivalent to those of the former.

<sup>1</sup> ANTOINE LOUIS ROUILLÉ, Count de Jony, was born on the 7th June, 1689; he was Councillor in the Paris Parliament in 1711, and Intendant of Commerce in 1725; was placed at the head of the Library in 1732, and the public is indebted to his patronage for the translation of De Thou, Guichardini, and other valuable works. In 1744, he was appointed Councillor of State and Commissioner of the India Company; and on 26th April, 1749, succeeded Count de Maurepas as Colonial Minister (IX., 941, note, where it is stated, incorrectly, that the Duke de la Vrillière had succeeded the Count). He filled that office until 28th July, 1754, when he was transferred to the department of Foreign Affairs, which he resigned in July, 1757. He died at his country seat, at Neuilly, 20th September, 1761. Biographie Universelle. — Ed.

The Company, after mature examination, determined to pay, this year, at the rate of three livres, ten sous the pound for fat and dry winter Beaver, of good quality, and at the rate of three livres, five sous next year.

That, notwithstanding, the little success which resulted from the repeated efforts it has made with cloths of our manufacture, it had again determined to make another trial.

And consented to manufacture hollow-ware, such as seemed to be required; but feared its sale would cause complaints on the part of the Colonial traders.

That, in consequence of the expected fall in the price of Indian goods, the Voyageurs ought to realise a considerable profit from the sale of Beaver at the rates the Company is to pay, and ought, therefore, to be able to divert the Indians from going to the English.

That they should inquire whether the hollow-ware the Company proposed to introduce would occasion complaints on the part of the traders.

That in regard to the new essay the Company was about to make of cloths of our manufacture, 'twould be desirable that it may be accompanied with success, and that if those already sent did not succeed, 'twas in consequence of the intrigues of the French smugglers; that they would have to adopt proper measures to remedy this inconvenience.

That the profits which the Company was supposed, in the Colony, to derive from the Beaver trade was far from real. This it proved by an account of sales made during several years; from which, also, 'twould be seen that it had been obliged, of late years, to sell at a loss. This ought to engage them to lower the price of the beaver in Canada as far as the safety of the trade could permit.

1st October, 1749. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Jonquiére and Bigot answer, that in regard to the determination of the Company of the Indies to pay the above price this year for beaver, they have issued their ordonnance accordingly; that, nevertheless, they have directed that the receipts which might have been given by the receiver at the rate of four livres, up to the twenty-first of August last, should be valid, inasmuch as it would not be possible to make [the seller] reimburse the difference, as the receipts pass through different hands before being presented for payment.

That the Company had sent four pieces of cloth on trial, but that the article is frightful; the red cloth is brown and unpressed; the blue, of a very inferior quality to that of England; that as long as such ventures are sent, they will not become favorites with the Indians. These four pieces of cloth will be returned to France.

That Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Galissonnière and Bigot did not intend, by their letter, to engage the Company to furnish the hollow-ware; they desired only that orders should be given that it be of good quality, and that there should be no iron in the rim (tour) of the kettle and in the oreillettes, and that these articles should be supplied by traders, who would suffer if the Company were to furnish them.

That although they followed the orders that had been given respecting the fixing the price of the Beaver, it had been well if the rate had not been diminished; that a much greater quantity of the article will hereafter go to the English inasmuch as our Indians carried it thither even during the war and when it was four livres.

That they have just ascertained, from a sure source, that the English pay four livres and four sous for it at Choueguen, and more than we for all the other peltries, whereby we are deprived of them.

That if the Company pretends not to have derived any profit from the trade, it would have realized a greater could it have destroyed smuggling; but it would succeed in that only so far as its prices would be equal to that of the English.

That they will apply all their care to the destruction of French smugglers, the number of whom will surely increase after the price of the Beaver is lowered; but they doubt if they will effect it, because Indians are employed who never betray them.

They annex to their despatch some observations on the answers of the Company to the Memoir sent to M<sup>r</sup> de Maurepas on the different objects of the Beaver trade and the loss the Company pretends to have experienced in this article.

It appears from the observations, that not only has the Company experienced no real loss, as it pretends, but even that, in the two years of seventeen hundred and forty-six and seventeen hundred and forty-seven, it has realized a profit, from the Beaver trade, of four hundred and thirty thousand, seven hundred and eighty-five livres.

This profit appears sufficient to determine it to allow the price of Beaver to remain at the same rate as they paid for it during the war, and even to increase rather than diminish it, in order to preserve the interests of the Colony as well as its own.

Supposing even that the profit, proved by these observations, was found to be insufficient, it is maintained that it would be better that the Company advance the price of Beaver, at the sales in France, twenty sous per pound than to diminish the buying price in Canada. The advance in France would not lessen the number of hats worn, especially when the Company would succeed in monopolizing all the Beaver caught in Canada by preventing its exportation to a foreign market, by means of a price equivalent to that paid for it by the English. The manufacturers of France would hereby reap the real advantage of recovering in Spain, Portugal, Germany, and other countries, the same demand they formerly had, which, to their prejudice, the English now enjoy and will no longer possess, as their Colonies can supply them only with very little Beaver, and their hatters would fail for want of material should they not obtain the greatest portion of it from Canada.

That the English, who neglect no opportunity to strengthen their alliance with the Indian Nations and to estrange them from the French, will not fail to profit by this falling off, to alienate the minds of the Indians from us; a circumstance which, in case of a war with England, might induce those Indians, whom trade would bring into closer relation with the English, to declare against the French, to the inevitable ruin of the Colony.

In fine, that it would be incomparably more advantageous to advance the price of Beaver hats twenty sous each, than for the sake of selling them cheaper, to risk the loss of the entire Beaver trade, and perhaps of the Colony.

Fort built at Toronto.

On being informed that the Northern Indians ordinarily went to Choueguen with their peltries, by way of Toronto, on the northwest side of Lake Ontario, twenty-five leagues from Niagara and seventy-five from Fort Frontenac, they thought it advisable to establish a post at that place, and to send thither an officer, fifteen soldiers and some workmen to construct a small stockaded fort there.

Its expense will not be great; the timber is transported there, and the remainder will be conveyed by the barks belonging to Fort Frontenac.

Too much care cannot be taken to prevent these Indians continuing their trade with the English, and to furnish them, at this post, with all their necessaries, even as cheap as at Choueguen.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Jonquière and Bigot will permit some canoes to go there on license, and will apply the funds as a gratuity to the officer in command there.

But it will be necessary to order the commandants at Detroit, Niagara and Fort Frontenac to be careful that the traders and storekeepers of these posts furnish goods for two or three years to come at the same rate as the English.

By these means the Indians will disaccustom themselves from going to Choueguen, and the English will be obliged to abandon that place.

1 October, 1749. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot writes, individually, that the establishment of this post is indispensable to stop the Indians on their way to Choueguen; but, besides its being an additional source of expense, it will injure the trade of Niagara and Frontenac. 'Tis true that if there be less trade at these two last mentioned posts, there will be less transportation of merchandise; what will be lost on one side will be gained on the other, and 'twill amount to nearly the same in the end.

The King will even reap a great advantage if we can accomplish the fall of Choueguen, by disgusting the Indians with that place, and this can be effected only by selling cheap to them. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot will attend to this. He proposes to oblige those who will farm (exploiter) Toronto to sell their goods at a reasonable price.

31st October, 1749. M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière, on his part, observes that it would be desirable that we could become masters of Choueguen.

It appears by the plan he transmits, with the observations of Sieur de Léry, Junior, that this post would be of great importance to us:

1st Because the English would be no longer in a position to establish posts along the rivers that fall into Lakes Ontario and Erie.

2nd Their trade would be thereby annihilated, and we should monopolize all the Peltries from the North and South.

3rd We should be better able to attach the Indians to us; to inspire them with hatred of the English, and to induce them, eventually, to destroy Choueguen; but this will be effected only by supplying the proposed posts abundantly with necessaries for the Indians.

4th It would deprive the English of the knowledge they possess of what occurs in Canada, and we, on the contrary, would be able to be advised of all their movements.

5th We should secure unto ourselves the fidelity of the Indians belonging to the Five Iroquois Nations, whom the English, by surrounding them, deprive of the liberty of declaring themselves for us.

6th This post, in fixing our trade, would secure the communication with Louisiana; we should navigate Lake Ontario without fear, and Forts Frontenac and Niagara would be safe.

To these advantages is added, likewise, that of the situation of Fort Choueguen: It stands on a river that forms a basin capable of sheltering vessels, a rare advantage on Lake Ontario. But the site is prejudicial to the English. On the Choueguen side is a hill, whence the fort can be battered, and on which another fort can be usefully erected; this would not be commanded by any place, and from it a view could be had of all the surrounding country.

Establishment of a Mission towards Fort Frontenac.

A great number of Iroquois Indians having expressed their willingness to embrace Christianity, it has been proposed to establish a mission in the direction of Fort Frontenac. Abbé Piquet, a zealous Missionary in whom these nations have evinced much confidence, has been put in charge of it, and directed to ascertain, with the greatest preciseness possible, how far the dispositions of the Indians can be relied on.

Meanwhile, as M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière had, in the month of October, one thousand seven hundred and forty-eight, observed that too much confidence ought not to be reposed in them, M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière was written to on the fourth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine, to neglect nothing that could contribute to the formation of that establishment, because, should it be at all successful, 'twould not be difficult to persuade the Indians that the sole means of getting rid of the pretensions of the English to their lands, is to destroy Choueguen which they founded only with a view to curb these nations; but it required prudence and circumspection to induce the Indians to undertake it.

31st October, 1749. M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière transmits a plan drawn by Sieur de Léry of the ground selected by Abbé Piquet for his mission, and a letter from him containing a narrative of his voyage and of the situation of the locality.

He says he left on the fourth of May, of last year, with twenty-five Frenchmen and four Iroquois; he arrived on the thirtieth at the River la Présentation, which they call Soegatzy.<sup>1</sup> The land there is the finest in Canada; abounds with oak timber, and trees of a prodigious girth and height, which the settler ought to be forbidden to cut, without permission. Piquet has saved off the land he had cleared, sufficient of the former for the construction of a sloop.

He commenced with the erection of a storehouse to secure his effects; he next had a small stockaded fort erected, and will cause a small house to be built to serve as a bastion.

M. Piquet had a private interview with the Indians, who were satisfied with all he had done; they assured him of their willingness to follow his advice and to establish their village at once. To accomplish this, they are gone to regulate their affairs and have promised to return with their provisions.

This post is very advantageously situated. It is on the bank of the River la Présentation, at the head of all the rapids, on the west side of a beautiful basin formed by that river, capable of easily containing forty or fifty sloops.

In all parts of it, is found at least two fathoms and a half, and often four fathoms. of water. It is so located that vessels can hardly be prevented entering it by any wind. The shore is very low, in a level country, the point of which runs far out. The passage in front is scarce a quarter of a league, and canoes going up or down cannot pass elsewhere. A fort on this point would be impregnable; it could not be approached and nothing commands it.

The Eastern shore is somewhat more elevated, and with a gradual ascent forms an amphitheatre. A handsome town could be hereafter built there.

This port is, moreover, so much the more advantageous, as the English and Iroquois can easily run down to Montreal by the River la Présentation, which rises in a lake bordering on the country of the Mohawks and on Corlar.

Had they taken possession of this river they would block the passage of that of Fort Frontenac, and would more easily succor Choueguen; whereas by means of a fort on the

Point it would be easy to have a force there in case of need to proceed against Choueguen and intercept the English and Indians who would wish to penetrate into the Colony, and the voyage from Missilimakinac, by the river, would be accomplished without any fear.<sup>1</sup>

Moreover, this establishment is only thirty-five leagues from Montreal, twenty-five from Fort Frontenac, and thirty-three from Choueguen; a distance sufficient to remove the Indians from the disorders which the proximity of forts and towns ordinarily engenders among them.

It is convenient for the reception of the Lake Ontario, and more distant, Indians.

Abbé Picquet's views are to accustom these Indians to raise cows, hogs and poultry; there are beautiful prairies, acorns and wild rice.

On the other hand it can be so regulated that bateaux carrying goods to the post might stop at La Présentation.

The expense of transportation would become smaller; men would be found to convey these bateaux for fifteen to twenty, instead of forty-five and fifty, livres, which are paid for the entire voyage.

Other bateaux belonging to La Présentation would convey them farther, and the first take, in return, plank, boards and other timber which are abundant there.

This timber would not come to more than twelve to fifteen livres, whilst it sells for sixty-eight livres at Montreal, and sometimes for more. Eventually this post will be able to supply Fort Frontenac with provisions, which would be a considerable saving to the King.

Abbé Picquet adds, in his letter, that in the course of his voyage he examined the nature of the rapids in the Fort Frontenac river, which is of great importance to secure us the possession of Lake Ontario, on which the English have an eye.

These rapids are fourteen in number; the most dangerous are Le Trou and Le Buisson. Abbé Picquet points out a mode to render this river navigable; and to meet the expense, he proposes that each canoe sent up shall pay ten livres, and each hand one écu, which according to him would produce three thousand livres, a sum sufficient for the workmen.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Jonquière and Bigot observe that they consider this establishment necessary; also the construction of a saw-mill there, on account of the advantage to accrue therefrom in the diminution of the price of timber; but as regards the rapids they will have them verified, in order to ascertain whether the river can in fact be rendered navigable, and will transmit an estimate of the work.

They have caused five guns, of two pound calibre, to be sent to Abbé Picquet for his little fort, so as to inspire the Indians with confidence, and to convince them that they will be safe there.

M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière, in particular, says, that he will see if proprietors of bateaux would be willing to contribute to the expense necessary to incur for the rapids; but he asks that some convicts from the galleys, or people out of employment (gens inutiles) be sent out annually to him to cultivate the soil. He is in want of men, and the few he has exact high wages.

1st 5<sup>bre</sup>, 1749. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot transmits a special memoir, also, of the expense incurred by Abbé Picquet for improvements, amounting to three thousand four hundred and eighty-five livres, ten sous; he has been supplied, in addition, with provisions for himself and workmen, and this settlement is only commenced.

M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière will not be able to dispense with sending an officer thither with some soldiers; Sieur de la Morandière, engineer, is to be sent there this winter to draw a plan of barracks for this detachment, and a store for the provisions. Were no garrison at that post, a considerable foreign trade would be carried on there.

7th 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1749. Subsequent to these letters M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière has written another, in which he states that M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil had informed him that a party of Indians, supposed to be Mohawks, had attacked Sieur Picquet's mission, on the twenty-sixth of October last; that Sieur de Vassan, commandant at Fort Frontenac, had sent a detachment thither, which was unable to save two vessels, loaded with hay, and the stockades of the fort from being burnt. Abbé Picquet's house alone was saved.

The loss by this fire is considerable. It would have been greater were it not for four Abenakis, who on this occasion gave a proof of their fidelity.

The man named Perdreaux had half of his hand carried away. His arm had to be cut off.

One of the Abenakis received a gun shot; the ball remained in his blanket.

M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil has provided everything necessary. M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière gave him orders to dispatch a detachment of ten soldiers thither, and will take measures, next spring, to secure that post.

M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière adds, that the Indians were instigated to this attack by the English. The Iroquois, who were on a complimentary visit at Montreal, were surprised at the occurrence, and assured M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil that it could only be Colonel Amson<sup>1</sup> who could have induced them to make the attack.

He omitted nothing to persuade these same Iroquois to undertake that expedition, and to prevent them going to pay their respects to the Governor, having presented them with Belts, which they refused to accept.

Conference of M. de la Jonquière with the Cayugas.

Propositions of the Cayugas to the Marquis de la Jonquière, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, and that General's answers to said propositions, 15th May, 1750.

By a Belt.

Father, On your arrival in this country, the Five Nations resolved to request you to accept the same name that M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière bore; we called him, "Peace." He took great care of all the Nations, and often spoke good things to us. Father, We hope you will be equally good to us; we shall always follow your advice and do our best to obey your pleasure; you know the conduct I have observed, I beg you to speak to us from the bottom of your heart, as we do to you. People often speak to us one way and think another; were only one child of the Cayuga Nation left, he will be always faithful to you. We beg of you to labor like us only in doing good.

By another Belt.

Father, It appears that you wish all the Indians who are on the Beautiful river to withdraw; you know that is a Republic composed of all sorts of Nations, and even many of those who lived near you have settled there. It is a country abounding in game, and this it is that attracts them thither. This island belongs to the Red Man (Nations noires); it is the Master of Life who has placed them on it, for he hath located those who are White on the other side of the Sea.

Father, You cannot easily get back all your Frenchmen who are dispersed throughout the entire country, each seeking to obtain a living; how do you suppose it possible to get back our young men? you know there exists no subordination among us.

Take pity on us when you send to those parts; think only of doing good, as you have hitherto done. As for me, I assure you, I shall labor always so to do, however embarrassed I may be, for often I know not whom to believe. You tell me to distrust the English; the English say the same to me of you; and this has led me to remain neutral during the War, in order to see who absolutely was wishing for my destruction. Father, be assured of my fidelity, and I shall not cease to occupy myself with what is good.

By three Strings.

You know we abandoned with pleasure our wives, our children and our country; that the sole desire of seeing you has been the motive of our remaining during the winter; but in the course of that time attempts have constantly been made to disturb our minds, by telling us that our Father, who is gone to France, had a bad heart and was conspiring our destruction; doubtless your sentiments are the same. If you desire to know those who talked to us in this way, we shall name them to you, for I, Cayuga, fear nothing and have nothing to reproach myself with. We are even threatened that, if any come hither from that country, he will be transported; and, if any do not come, people will go and kill them at home.

Propositions of the Cayugas which are to remain in the Secretary's office, in order to show them the Belt in case of need. 27th of May, 1750.

Father, You see your children, the Cayugas, who are on the point of leaving, and who thank you for all the good advice you have given them. Had it not been for you there would, perhaps, be no more mention of the Five Nations. We see clearly that the English seek only our destruction, and are grasping all the lands we inhabit. We are already in their midst.

Here is a Belt which we present you, whereby we assure you of our fidelity. It is our heart we leave in your hands; we will support each other and shall never cease being attached to you. Nothing will be capable of separating us. I, Cayuga, will never take up the hatchet against you, no matter what war may be declared. Should it happen that some of our young men stay from their duty, and do wrong, we beg you to allow us time to confer with you; this we shall also do on our side; this is the only way to live in peace; were there but one Cayuga chief remaining, he will be always loyal to you. The Master of Life disposes of us and we know not who will live the longest: Wherefore, Father, we are very glad that Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Varin and Noyan are present, so that he who will live the longest, may be able to repeat what we have just said to those who will succeed them. Should anything occur in our cantons deserving your attention, we shall communicate it to you. We hope that you will not forget us.

Whatever turn matters may take, even should war exist, come, Father, in all safety to your children, the Cayugas. You will be always well received by them.

Your son, Joncaire, here present, knows us all ; he knows the bottom of our hearts.

Should any one trouble us, we will have recourse to you; the ancients have lighted a Council fire here, and planted a tree of peace, at the foot of which we deposit this Belt, which remains as a pledge of our promise, so that it may be near us when any one will desire to see it again.

Answer of the General.

By a Belt.

Children, I receive with pleasure the name you gave my predecessor, which signifies "Peace." I shall take very great care of all my children, and particularly of you, Cayugas, who have been the most faithful to me during the war. Continue in your present good sentiments, if you follow my councils and do my will, you will find a good Father, who will receive and always solace you with pleasure. I shall not cease to converse with you in terms of friendship, persuaded, as I am, that you will pay every attention thereto. It will be always with an open heart that I shall speak to you. I entertain no doubt of the fidelity you promise me, as you must also be persuaded of the sincere attachment I shall always feel towards you.

By a Belt.

Children, It is not my intention to make all the Indians withdraw that are on the Beautiful river; I merely wish that all those who have abandoned their families and villages should return and join them.

If you find what you want in this country I am glad ; but you would not regard me as a true father, were I not to remark to you that the English are settling there, notwithstanding you have forbid them ; be careful to give good advice to those who are on the Beautiful river, so that they may be wiser in future, and not take charge of bad Belts to give to their brethren, my children.

If the Master of Life wished, at the beginning of the world, that none but Red men should inhabit this continent, it was only to give them to understand how pleasant it is to be near a good Father, and he has willed that Ontiogo (that is the King) should send some of his subjects hither to comfort you, and to engage you to acknowledge him as your good Father.

The French, who will go to the Beautiful river, will carry wherewith to supply the wants of those who are there, and will be careful not to disturb them. I send your son, Sieur de Joncaire, thither ; I know that you love him, and have great confidence in him. I hope the French, who will go to those parts, will meet a kind reception ; you ought to use your efforts to that end. I doubt not the assurance you again give me to labor only to do good. You know that I have never given you any but good advice ; the English, on the contrary, have never ceased persecuting you during the war, even with threats, to make you accept their hatchet, which would only hasten your destruction. This is what they greatly desired, and dare not undertake.

By three Strings.

I am very sensible of the attention you pay me, and doubt not the pleasure you feel at seeing me, for which I am very grateful ; the bad talk you heard during your winter encampment must not make any impression on your minds, and therefore you ought not pay any attention to it. M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière and I do not desire your destruction; on the contrary, children, I seek only to comfort you. M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron has been at the Beautiful river only to make those return who had gone astray, and to give sense to those who had lost it; you know this.

Those who will come here will be always welcome, and will have every reason to be satisfied with the reception I shall give them; you will afford me pleasure by inducing them to come.

Give me the names of those persons who told you that if your Nation came here, I would send them off, so that I may reprimand and chastise them, if they be Frenchmen.

Answer of the General to the Belt of the Cayugas.

By a Belt.

Children, I am very glad to see you depart contented; you ought never have doubted that the good advice I have continually given you aims only at the preservation of the Five Nations, whom I have always loved. It is for you to preserve yourselves in the country you inhabit, and to take care not to become the slaves of the English.

I receive, with much pleasure, the Belt you give me, whereby you promise me to be faithful; I also receive your heart, and shall take very great care to preserve it; children, persevere in the good sentiments in which I now behold you.

I accept your offers of service, and you must be persuaded that if you require mine, it will afford [ me ] pleasure [ to tender it ].

I doubt not the repugnance you felt, and ought always to entertain, at taking up the hatchet against a Father who so tenderly cherishes you, and to whom you are under so many obligations. I hope that you others, chiefs, will be so particular in speaking to the young men that they will never commit any ill act.

I am delighted that Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Varin and Noyan are present and witnesses of the promises you make me.

You will afford me pleasure by reporting to me whatever will occur in your Cantons and in those of your neighbors.

Children, I shall ever go in all security to your country, and you must never entertain any fear when you come hither; which I invite you to do.

I know that Sieur de Joncaire is acquainted with your heart; he has given me an account of it. I shall be always ready to assist you and to preserve your villages; especially yours, Cayugas, who have been ever faithful to me, and with whom I have never been at war.

I shall preserve, with very great pleasure, the Belt you present me, and which you deposit at the foot of this Tree of Peace. By this one I give you my heart; you will understand how good and sincere it is, and how well you ought to preserve it. In whatever circumstances affairs may be, never be afraid to come and see your Father, who is continually reaching out his hands to you and who will always receive you with tenderness.

Children, I recommend you not to listen to the bad advice that may be offered to you.

We, Pierre Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout New France and the territories and countries of Louisiana.

Certify that the present copy is conformable to the original on file in our Secretary's Office. In testimony whereof, we have signed these presents, and have caused the seal of our Arms to be affixed to, and our Secretary to countersign, the same.

Quebec, 16th July, 1750.

My Lord,

Previous to receiving the letter you did me the honor to write me on the 5th of March last (accompanied by an order of the King for the exchange of the prisoners respectively belonging to this government for those of New England), I adopted all the measures imaginable to effect their liberation. I proceed to render you an account thereof.

The deputation of Sieurs de Beauharnois<sup>1</sup> and L'Anniers<sup>2</sup> to the Governors of Boston and New-York having accomplished nothing, especially towards the recovery of the 26 Abenaki<sup>3</sup>, who were taken at the beginning of the war; and the Abenakis of St. Francis renewing their entreaties for the restoration of their brethren, I determined on dispatching the said Sieur de Beaubassin to New England, and gave him orders to do his best to speak to the said Abenakis and to bring them back with him. I wrote to those Governors and strongly urged them to facilitate the exchange of our people for theirs.

Sieur de Beaubassin has not yet returned, but I had the consolation to learn that my trouble and pains had some success by seeing all the said Abenakis arrive. Nothing could be compared to the satisfaction this afforded the entire Abenakis Nation. They are our most faithful allies, and will never forget what I have done for them.

Sieur de Beaubassin's arrival is apparently delayed only by the arrangements the English Governors adopt in consequence of the orders of the King, their master, to collect again together all our prisoners and give them up to him. I expect his return immediately.

On my part, my Lord, I have executed the King's order in every particular.

The very moment I received it, I sent for M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, the English officer, who had been deputed to me on the part of the Governor of New-York, and who had remained in this city to await the effect the Sieur de Beaubassin's new mission may produce. I communicated to him said order and notified him that I was going to carry it out; that all the English in my hands would be at once surrendered to him, and that as regarded those detained among the Indians, I would dispatch the Interpreter of these Nations, and issue orders to the commandants and missionaries to do everything in their power to have them given up.

M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert and M<sup>r</sup> Van Schaick, who speaks the language of the Indians and their prisoners, set out with said Interpreter and assisted at all the conferences held with said Indians. They had liberty to speak to their people, and if these have not returned with M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert it is not my fault.

As I have had time, since I came to this Colony, to be acquainted with the English Governors, and have found them very unmanageable and disposed to create difficulties, I have taken my precautions that the truth of all that I have done may appear in an authentic form.

You will see it, my Lord, by the three procès-verbaux, copies whereof I have the honor to send to you annexed hereunto, wherein I mention everything said on one side and the other on the subject of the exchange and ransom of said prisoners, and that the majority of them have desired to remain with the Indians, having been adopted and having made their abjurations, as appears by the letter written me by Sieur Douville, commandant of Sault St. Louis, the original whereof I have handed to said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert. You have a copy of it annexed.

You will see, also, that I have forced Sieur Mangé to give a prisoner up to M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, though he had purchased him from the Indians. This is a direct proof of my good will, and that I would have done the same for those in the power of the Indians had the matter depended on myself, and had said Indians not had the effrontery to tell M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert that if I obliged them to release those prisoners, the English would be the victims of their resentment, and that they would avenge themselves on them; which they would have done.

I cannot avoid performing the promise I have given M. Mangé, to request you, my Lord, to be pleased to give orders that he be repaid out of the Public Treasury the sum of 500<sup>li</sup>, which he paid to get said prisoner out of the hands of the Indians.

In regard to the negro, in the possession of Sieur de la Corne St. Luc, I thought proper not to send him back, every negro being a slave wherever he be, as I have observed in the procès-verbal. Besides, herein, I only do what the English themselves did in 1747. Ensign de Malbronné, on board Le Serieux, had a negro servant who was at first taken from him; I took pains to reclaim him, the English refused to surrender him on the same ground, that every negro is a slave, wherever he happen to be.

As for the rest, my Lord, you will perceive by the general list, hereunto annexed, that this affair is in the best condition; that M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert has made an exchange with me of all the prisoners, and that as for those who have remained in this Colony, he declares he was unable to carry them back with him, what facilities soever I had afforded him for that purpose.

M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert left with said prisoners on the 28th of last month, for Fort St. Frederic, whence he will dispatch one or two of the prisoners to inform the Governor that they are at liberty, so that the latter may forthwith send back all the prisoners, both French and Indians, in his power, to M<sup>r</sup> Lydius, on the frontiers of New England, and order the officer who will be in command of them to send him an express with word, so soon as they shall have arrived, and to halt one day so that they may be mutually exchanged at the foot of the Great Carrying Place of Lake St. Sacrament, whither he will proceed in order to conclude the reciprocal liberation of the French and English prisoners.

I sent with M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, Sieur de Bleury, Ensign of Infantry, whom I ordered to go as far as Orange, and even to New-York, if necessary, to claim all our prisoners, both French and Indians, and to bring them back with him.

I wrote, at the same time, to M<sup>r</sup> Clinton, Governor of New-York, and have sent him the King of England's Order, which you did me the honor to address me.

Thus, my Lord, all the English are at liberty; you see that I have used great diligence; there is every reason to hope that the English Governors will respond to it, and that our prisoners will be soon on their return to this Colony, whereof I shall have the honor to render you an account in my next letter.

I am with the most profound respect,
My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient Servant,

LA JONQUIÈRE.

Minutes of the Exchange of Prisoners. 1750.

On the twenty-third day of June, in the year one thousand, seven hundred and fifty, Before us, the Marquis de la Jonquière, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Commodore in the Navy, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout all New France and the territories and countries of Louisiana, and in the Castle wherein we are quartered in the town of Montreal, in presence of M<sup>r</sup> Varin, Commissary of the Marine, Superintendent (ordonnateur) in said town; M. de Celeron, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Major and Commandant of Detroit; M. de Noyelles, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Captain of Infantry; Sieur de Montresson, Lieutenant-General in the Royal Jurisdiction of this town; Sieur de la Chauvignery, Ensign of Infantry, Iroquois Interpreter; Sieur Joseph Gamelin, Interpreter to the Abenakis of St. Francis; Joseph Maddox, English Interpreter, in our service:

Appeared, agreeably to our orders, M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, Lieutenant of Infantry in the New-York troops, and M<sup>r</sup> Anthony Van Schaick, Captain of a Company of New-York Militia, to whom we said that in consequence of the orders of the King, our Master, we had sent to St. Francis for the man named John, an Englishman by nation, taken near Kaskebec,<sup>1</sup> in the government of Boston, in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-six, by an Abenakis of Panaouanké, who gave him, somewhere about the same time, to an Abenakis of the village of St. Francis, belonging to the family (cabanne) of one Francois Xavier Abemission, with the intention to deliver him up to the said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, with the other English prisoners detained within our general government, and as the said John, an English prisoner, refuses to return to New England, we have summoned said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert to speak to him, himself, in order to ascertain his wishes. Whereupon M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert told him he had come to this town by order of M<sup>r</sup> George Clinton, Governor of New-York, for the purpose of taking back all the English prisoners who are detained in this Colony. The said John answered him that he would not return to New England, and that he wished to remain with the Abenakis of St. Francis, where he had been instructed in the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman Religion, in which he wished to live and die. We, the said Marquis de la Jonquière, told the said English deputies that we did not intend to keep the said John in our government, and that we from this moment gave him liberty to leave it, and that the said deputies had only to persuade him to follow them; whereupon, the said John persisted in his first answer; said English deputies told us they would report the aforesaid to their Governor, and as evidence of their diligence requested us to draw up the present Minute, which we have done to serve and be valid for their discharge.

Which Minute we have signed in Duplicate with the gentlemen present, the said English deputies, said John, the English prisoner being illiterate, to whom we have given one of the said originals.

LAJONQUIÈRE.

In the afternoon of the twenty-fifth day of June, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty, Before us, the Marquis de la Jonquière, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Commodore in the Navy, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout all New France, and the territories and countries of Louisiana, and in the Castle wherein we are quartered in the town of Montreal, in presence of M. de Varin, Commissary of the Marine, Superintendent of said town; Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Noyelles and de Verchères, Knights of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis and Captains in the troops of this Colony; and of Montresson, Lieutenant-General of the Royal Jurisdiction of this town, Sieur de la Chauvignery, Ensign of Infantry, Iroquois Interpreter, and M<sup>r</sup> Joseph Maddox, English Interpreter in our service :

Appeared M. Stoddert, Lieutenant of Infantry in the New-York troops, and M<sup>r</sup> Anthony Van Schaick, Captain of a Company of New-York Militia, to whom we said that in consequence of the orders of the King, our Master, we had caused to come to this town the Iroquois of Sault St. Louis, in whose hands are Philips Philips, Simon Fort and Thomas Volmer, English prisoners, in order that they should deliver up the said English prisoners to the said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, and agree with him respecting the terms of their ransom, on our causing to be communicated to the Indians that they had only to make their demand, and the said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert having represented to us that he had neither orders nor funds from his Governor to redeem said prisoners, and that, nevertheless, said M<sup>r</sup> Van Schaick took on himself to advance the ransom on said Simon Fort, the sister of Agouareche, to whom he belonged by adoption, having stated that she would not give him up at any price, whatever, we have ordered the said Squaw and her brother to deliver, forthwith, the said Simon Fort to M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert for the sum of six hundred livres, which M<sup>r</sup> Van Schnick offered to pay, and if she refused we should authoritatively oblige her to give up the said Englishman without any ransom; said Indian and his wife told us they were ready to obey our order, without exacting anything, but if said Simon Fort returned to New England they would follow him so close that the English would be the victims of their resentment, which the said Mess<sup>rs</sup> Stoddert and Van Schaick having heard, we have concluded that it was prudent not to force said Squaw to give up the said prisoner, and that it was better to lose him than to occasion the Iroquois to make an attack on the English.

Of the whole of what precedes we have drawn up this our minute, which we have signed with the gentlemen present and the said English gentlemen in duplicate, whereof one remains in our hands and the other has been given to the said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert.

In the forenoon of the twenty-sixth day of June, of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty, Before us, the Marquis de la Jonquière, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Commodore in the Navy, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout all New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, and in the Castle where we are quartered in the town of Montreal, in presence of M<sup>r</sup> Varin, Commissary of the Marine, Superintendent of said town; of Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Noyelles and de Verchères, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Captain in the troops of this Colony; of Montresson, Lieutenant-General of the Royal Jurisdiction of Montreal, and of M<sup>r</sup> Joseph Maddox, English Interpreter, and in our service:

Appeared M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, Lieutenant of New-York Infantry, and M<sup>r</sup> Antony Van Schaick, Captain of a Company of New-York Militia, to whom we said, that in conformity with the orders of the King, our Master, we had caused to be brought to our Castle the men named Elisha Stansbury, Timothy Colbe, Southerland Ford and Thomas Colson, English prisoners, them to surrender to the said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, whom we empowered from this moment to take and carry them back to their country, which the said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert immediately did; we, likewise, delivered to him the man named Matté Gatroup, an English Indian, a servant of the Superior of the Seminary of St. Sulpice, in this town, who gave him up to them without exacting any repayment of the sum he had paid for the purchase of said Indian. Sieur Mangé, a citizen of this town, in whose service is one Peter Bogamot, another Indian, having represented to us that in return for surrendering him to the said M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, it was just that he be repaid the sum of five hundred livres, which he had paid the Iroquois of the Sault St. Louis for the said Indian; we have ordered him to give up the said Indian to M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert, which he did, and we have promised him to write to the Court to have him indemnified; and in regard to Samuel Frement, a negro, in the service of Sieur de la Corne St. Luc, Lieutenant of Infantry, we have ordered that he remain in the Colony, all negroes being slaves, in whatever country they reside.

Of the whole of what precedes we have prepared this Minute, which we, with the gentlemen present, and said Mess<sup>rs</sup> Stoddert and Van Schaick, have signed in duplicate, whereof one copy has remained in our hands and the other has been given to M<sup>r</sup> Stoddert.

Copy of the letter written by Sieur Douville, commandant at Sault St. Louis, to the Marquis de la Jonquière, Governor-General of New France, 27th June, 1750.

Sir,

The English prisoner, belonging to la Delisle, has come to tell me that I could have the honor to inform you he did not desire any longer to return; that the principal reason is that he has embraced our religion; that when he told the English he wished to return, he acted unreflectingly. On the other hand that his father is dead, and by the laws of his country whoever has been ransomed, if obliged to borrow the money, is bound to service until he have repaid, by his labor, the sum he cost; that he prefers being a slave with the Indians than in his country where there is no religion.

He who belongs to Ononraguete's nieces has come to tell me, also, that inasmuch as his elder brother, who is at the Lake of Two Mountains, will not return, neither will he; that his father was poor; that he must work all his life to pay his ransom; on the other hand, he has embraced our religion, which is the strongest reason.

Ononragueté said to him, in my presence: You are at liberty to go away if you like. He answered, No; that he hated too strongly the English Nation, where he was almost a slave, to give up his religion and his liberty.

I have the honor to be, etc.

LAJONQUIÈRE.

Earl of Albemarle to M. Puyssieux.

The underwritten Ambassador extraordinary and Plenipotentiary from his Majesty of Great Britain, has orders from the King, his master, dated Hanover the 26th of last month, to represent to the Court of France, how much he is surprised at hearing the violent proceedings of the French in America, under the authority and direction of M. de la Jonquière, who has readily avowed them.

M. Cornwallis, Governor of Nova Scotia, has informed the Duke of Bedford, by a letter dated the 1st of May, this year, that the French have taken possession of Nova Scotia, beyond the Bay of Fundy, from the River Chignecto to that of St. John, making the first the limits of that Province.

They have reduced Beubassin to ashes, and carried to the other side of the river the inhabitants, with their effects; compelled them to take up arms, and form'd them into companies; so that the Sieur La Corne, a French officer, has at that place, under his command, a body of 2500 men, made up of regular troops, Canadians and Indians.

The Sieur La Corne and Father Loutre, a French missionary, have made use of repeated and innumerable promises and menaces, in order to persuade all the inhabitants of the Province to leave the country.

The inhabitants declare openly their abhorrence of these proceedings; but the Sieurs La Corne and Loutre threaten them with a general massacre of the Indians, our declared enemies, who enlist under the banners of the French. They detain the King's subjects, his officers and soldiers prisoners. They excite the King's French subjects to rebellion, and those who remain loyal they threaten with destruction. They send their Indian slaves all over the country, where they are guilty of all sorts of outrages.

They have set fire to the town acknowledged by themselves to appertain to his Britannic Majesty.

Governor Cornwallis sent the Sieur Lawrence, Major of foot, with a detachment to Chignecto, where he arrived on the 20th of last April. They saw the French set fire to the town of Chignecto, French colors planted on the ditches, and the Sieur De la Corne at the head of his detachment, braving Major Lawrence, and declaring that he would defend to the last that ground as belonging to France.

The Sieur De la Corne having sent to desire a conference with the Sieur Lawrence, the latter, accompanied by two captains of foot, went to meet him, and demanded by whose orders he had thus come into his Britannic Majesty's territories, and committed such acts of violence. The Sieur De la Corne answer'd, it was by those of M. De la Jonquiere, who had also commanded him to take possession of Chippodi, John's river, Mamram, Cooke, Pitcoirdiack and of all that country, as far as the river, which was on the right hand of Major Lawrence, as belonging to his most Christian Majesty; or, at least, that he was to keep and defend it as such, till such time as the limits were settled by commissaries appointed for that purpose.

Though the Sieur Lawrence had under his command a detachment of regular troops, very little inferior to that commanded by Sieur De la Corne, he forebore committing any hostilities, in obedience to the King of Great Britain's orders for that purpose.

The King cannot persuade himself that these acts of violence have been committed with the knowledge of the Court of France, and he is so fully convinced of his most Christian Majesty's equity, and his desire to maintain a good understanding between the two Crowns, that he assures himself the most Christian King will readily show his disapprobation of such conduct.

Governor Cornwallis has never made nor designed to make any settlements out of the limits of the Peninsula, which the French before never pretended to belong to them: the King of Great Britain having had no intention in forming a settlement in his Province of Nova Scotia, to encroach on the rights of his most Christian Majesty, or to take forcible possession of a country, of which the King had referred the right of property to the decision of commissaries appointed for that purpose, before it was possible for them to have met in order to proceed to the settling of the limits.

The underwritten ambassador has orders to demand, that the conduct of M. de la Jonquiere be disavowed; that positive orders be sent to him immediately to withdraw his troops and the Indians under his authority, from the places which belong to Great Britain; that amends be made for the acts of violence which have been committed, and the damages which the King's subjects have suffered. And his Majesty is persuaded that the Court of France will make no difficulty, to give the underwritten Ambassador a duplicate of the orders, which will be sent to the Governor of Canada, that he may transmit them to his Court.

Sir,

In the memorial, which your Excellency has given me concerning the complaints of M. Cornwallis, Governor of Acadia, are contained many facts, so contrary to the equity of his Majesty, the instructions of M. De la Jonquiere, that, if they are found to be such as they are represented, the King will take care justice shall be done to his Britannic Majesty's subjects, and will give such fresh orders as will prevent the rise of any dispute of what kind soever between the two nations, his Majesty being thoroughly persuaded his Britannic Majesty will give, on his side, orders to the same purpose.

Give me leave, sir, to tell you I cannot be prevailed upon to believe but that the facts are exposed with too much exaggeration, and from my knowledge of M. de la Jonquiere's prudence, and the instructions which he has, I am sorry M. Cornwallis has not applied for redress before he had made complaint to his Court. I sent your memorial, as soon as I received it, to M. Rouillé, and desir'd he would take the proper steps, to be informed in a speedy and precise manner, of what has passed at Canada, so as I may be enabled to give your Excellency a more positive answer.

I have the honor to be &c.,

M. Bigot to M. Rouillé.

My Lord,

Some months ago the English killed in Fort St. George some Abenakis Indians belonging to the village of Panasamské; the latter complained of this assassination, and were promised justice by putting the guilty to death in their presence at Boston. This affair went to sleep, the Abenakis of Panasamské and that vicinity being so connected with the English, that they did not wish to insist on justice.

But we have caused to be represented to the Abenakis of Bécancourt and St. Francis, the disgrace which would rebound on their nation, should they leave this crime unpunished; Sieur Tonnancourt, my deputy at Three Rivers, and who is adopted by these villages, has induced them to take this course, as the government could not appear, so that they are gone from Three Rivers to attack the English. Some are of opinion to unite with the Micmacs; others wish to lay waste the frontiers of New England; the great point is, they have marched the day before yesterday to the number of one hundred and fifty, including Abenakis and Algonkins, and their party will increase according as they approach other Abenakis villages.

They had sent a belt to the Iroquois of the Sault to join them, but these are too much English to do so, and I am persuaded they will have immediately sent off an express throughout New England to give notice of the project. They at Three Rivers were wrong to have allowed that Belt to be sent.

I had ordered M<sup>r</sup> Tonnancourt to make them some small trifling presents to engage them to this act of vengeance; it cost a mere trifle; I had them supplied also with provisions to enable them to reach the other Abenakis villages of Panasamské and Narantsouak.

I have the honor to be with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant

6th August, 1750.

Ministerial Minute on Despatches from Louisiana.

We learn by letters just received from M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, Governor of this Colony, dated the month of June and month of July, that the English are more active than ever, not only in spreading themselves over the Continent both in the direction of Louisiana and in the interior of the Canadian territory which unites the two Colonies, but moreover in exciting the different Nations of Indians against us.

They have been for a long time at work to gain over the Chactas, a very numerous Nation of Louisiana; they had succeeded in attaching to their party a pretty influential Chief named Red Mocassin (Soulier-Rouge), who for many years gave trouble to our Colony, and by whose death the influence of the English was much weakened. By force of presents they have, however, preserved some villages, from which a few warriors came last year to make an attack on two of our settlements. M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil has required of the villages of our allies to avenge this insolence, which they did with so much success, that they brought him one hundred and thirty scalps to Mobile on the fourteenth of April last. This brilliant achievement on the part of our allies has determined the greatest portion of the revolted villages to alter their sentiments, or at least their conduct in our regard; and in order to afford M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil proofs of their sincere return, they have been out against the Chicachas, twelve of whose scalps they brought him, and have, likewise, killed three English traders, who were opposed to their reconciliation with their brethren; all the villages of the Nation except two, came afterwards in a body to M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, to whom they made the strongest protestations of their resolution to labor earnestly to root out the English from among them.

Everything passed off well in the conferences with these Indians, among whom he distributed some presents; in that distribution he made a distinction in favor of those who were most prominent, and remarks, that he hopes to succeed in expelling the English from among that Nation, and in destroying that of the Chicachas, which is already greatly diminished.

He has also received the visit of some fourteen villages of Alibamons, Talapouches and Abékas,<sup>1</sup> Nations inhabiting the frontier of the English Colonies, and has had reason to be well satisfied with the dispositions in which he found them.

He is equally so with the other allied Nations, and observes, that with the assistance to the Colony which he has been promised, he will be able to make more progress than he has hitherto done.

He is, however, not free from uneasiness in regard to the projects of the English. He has learned that they have succeeded in causing a revolt among the Miamis, at present settled on the Rock river (marked with a cross on the map), the Ouyatonons, a Miami tribe, the Maskoutins settled in the same quarter and the Peanguichias on the River Ouabache, and in engaging them in a conspiracy against us. These Indians had even invited the Illinois to join them, but the latter refused, and it was by them that M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil has been informed of these movements. This Governor observes that he will not spare any effort to dispel this storm, but that M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière, who has been informed of it, was to have adopted some measures in Canada.

We have learned, in fact, that M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière had been in receipt of nearly the same intelligence, and was to send last spring a detachment to that quarter, according to other information which he was expecting.

We must not be surprised that the English are seeking to insinuate themselves among our Indian Nations; they cannot even be prevented making that attempt, besides our doing the same thing. Most of these movements on the one side and the other can be attributed only to the cupidity of private Traders, who run every risk to extend their commerce.

But what merits most our attention is the design of the English to push their settlements into the interior of the country so as to be able to interrupt the communication between the two Colonies of Canada and Louisiana.

With this view it is that they, since a long time, are projecting a settlement on the Beautiful river; M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière, who had been informed before his departure, that they had dispatched some people thither, determined on sending a detachment also there, to force them to retire, and M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière has observed, lastly, that the officer in command of that detachment had returned and reported that the English had retired at the first summons.

Moreover, the regulation of the boundaries was arresting these sort of enterprises; but in the uncertain state of that regulation, no other course remains than to watch the conduct of the English, in order to prevent their undertakings, and this is what has been recommended to the Governors of the two Colonies.

18th September, 1750.

Memoir on the French Colonies in North America.

By M. DE LA GALISSONNIÈRE.

The pretensions set up by his Britannic Majesty's Commissioners respecting the extent of Acadia, and the measures which England is prosecuting to reëstablish herself on that part of the American Continent, are of a nature to demand the most serious attention on the part of the government.

Whilst peace appeared to have lulled the jealousy of the English in Europe, this bursts forth in all its violence in America; and if barriers capable of staying its effects be not opposed at this very moment, that nation will place itself in a condition to completely invade the French Colonies at the opening of the first war.

It is with this view that it would secure to itself all the avenues of Canada. In order to show the importance of this matter it will be necessary to enter into some detail regarding that Colony and the neighboring countries.

The utility of Colonies in general will be first, but briefly, established. None of the objections that can be presented against Canada, in particular, shall be concealed, but it will be demonstrated that there are essential and paramount reasons for carefully attending to the preservation, strengthening and increase of that Colony.

Its description will be begun at the North and with Hudson's bay, which bounds it on that side; thence we shall review, in succession, the settlements in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Ile Royale and Acadia; whence we shall proceed along the River St. Lawrence towards the centre of the Colony. The importance of the posts of Chouaguen, Niagara, Detroit and Illinois will be examined; the necessity of keeping up the communication with Louisiana by the Beautiful river; and from this various information, will be deduced the means considered indispensable to effect the overthrow of the ambitious projects of England, and to preserve to France countries which have become one of the most interesting portions of the Domain of the Crown.

All these different subjects will be treated in so many separate Articles.

ARTICLE 1st.

Of the Utility of Colonies and the Necessity of Attending to their Preservation.

It is not proposed to dwell on the Utility of Colonies. There are few persons at this day who do not admit that they are in some degree necessary to a great State.

If any doubt on this point still exist in men's minds, it would suffice, in order to remove it, to cast an eye on the accounts of the revenue of the King's farms, the immense quantity of all sorts of commodities and manufactures sent to the Colonies, the returns which come from them, some whereof are necessary to manufactures, others to wants which have become habitual, and in some degree indispensable, in the Kingdom; finally, on the surplus exported to foreign countries, and which contributes essentially to make the balance of wealth incline in favor of France: objects which become daily more interesting, according as each State forms new projects in order to dispense with the products and manufactures of its neighbors.

Those who have had occasion to visit the Islands, in the neighborhood of the Tropics, have had an opportunity to see for themselves the quantity of very rich lands at present in St. Domingo and Martinico; and without crossing the seas are not a vast number of families seen, every day, who were poor and have acquired very considerable wealth in a short time, almost without risk, and with trifling industry and labor.

Moreover, and this is a reflection deserving of particular attention, the question is not whether Colonies shall in future be established or not; they are established, and the most of them firmly established. It is to be determined whether they will be handed over to jealous neighbors, whose entire ambition is to strip France of them.

ARTICLE 2nd.

Objections against the Preservation of Canada and Louisiana.

It may be objected that we must carefully preserve such of the Colonies as are a source of revenue to the State and of wealth to the Kingdom, as St. Domingo, Martinico and the other Tropical Islands; but that those Colonies, which, far from being productive of revenue or wealth, are, like Canada and Louisiana, an expense, ought to be abandoned to themselves.

It is not designed to lessen the weight of this objection, on the contrary it will be corroborated by the enumeration of all the inconveniences or disadvantages which nature, events or circumstances have attached particularly to these two Colonies.

1st Their immense extent often prevents their being ruled by the same mind, and able to afford each other that assistance they mutually stand in need of.

2nd They cannot send nor receive anything except by sea, and by the mouths of two rivers more than nine hundred leagues distant, whatever course be taken. The interior of the country is liable to be exposed to great scarcity of goods from France and to be glutted with its own products should a maritime power, such as England, undertake to blockade the only two outlets of that vast Continent.

3<sup>d</sup> It is not even impossible for that power, or some other, to seize on the lower part of one, or of both, rivers, and erect forts there, which would, doubtless, most seriously jeopard these two Colonies.

4th Although these Colonies may be able to furnish Europe and the Islands of America with the same commodities as New England, we must not flatter ourselves that they can ever do so as cheaply, especially those of great bulk which ordinarily constitute the principal and most certain object of trade: the difference arising from the difficulty of navigating both rivers, from the length of the voyages, and from the inability of going to Canada except at a certain season of the year, whilst it prolongs the voyage and renders it more expensive and difficult, and increases its dangers, augments, at the same time, the rate of insurance.

5th If this be not an inconvenience in time of peace, and on the contrary, it may, perhaps, be an advantage that these two Colonies should not be able to dispense with France as well for clothing and liquors as for powder and arms; such is not the case in time of war. The apprehension of a scarcity obliges a large stock to be kept continually on hand; independent of the current expense, which is considerable, we are necessarily obliged to make very large advances.

6th The expenses of the Colonies not only exceed, and will continue for a long time greatly to surpass, their revenue, but they are very unequal and subject to forced augmentations, especially in time of war, when the want of the Indians renders it necessary to gain these over by force of presents.

None of the particular objections that can be offered against these Colonies have, it is believed, been omitted, and it is presumed that they have been presented in all their force. The reasons which avail for the preservation of those Colonies, notwithstanding all these disadvantages, remain to be examined.

ARTICLE 3<sup>d</sup>.

Of the Importance and Necessity of Preserving Canada and Louisiana.

Motives of honor, glory and religion forbid the abandonment of an established Colony; the surrender to themselves, or rather to a nation inimical by taste, education and religious principle, of the French who have emigrated thither at the persuasion of the Government with the expectation of its protection, and who eminently deserve it on account of their fidelity and attachment; in fine, the giving up of so salutary a work as that of the conversion of the heathen who inhabit that vast Continent.

Yet we shall not insist on these motives; and how great soever may be the inconveniences set forth in the preceding article, neither will we object to them, the future and uncertain revenues both of Canada and of Louisiana, although, nevertheless, these are extremely probable, since they have for basis an immense country, a numerous people, fertile lands, forests of mulberry trees, mines already discovered, &c.

We shall confine ourselves to regarding Canada as a barren frontier, such as the Alps are to Piedmont, as Luxembourg would be to France, and as it, perhaps, is to the Queen of Hungary. We ask if a country can be abandoned, no matter how bad it may be, or what the amount of expense necessary to sustain it, when by its position it affords a great advantage over its neighbors.

This is precisely the case of Canada: it cannot be denied that this Colony has been always a burthen to France, and it is probable that such will be the case for a long while; but it constitutes, at the same time, the strongest barrier that can be opposed to the ambition of the English.

We may dispense with giving any other proofs of this than the constant efforts they have made, for more than a century, against that Colony.

We will add, however, that it alone is in a position to wage war against them in all their possessions on the Continent of America; possessions which are as dear to them as they are precious in fact, whose power is daily increasing, and which, if means be not found to prevent it, will soon absorb not only all the Colonies located in the neighboring islands of the Tropic, but even all those of the Continent of America.

Long experience has proved that the preservation of the major portion of the settlements in the Tropical islands is not owing so much to their intrinsic strength, as to the difficulty of conveying troops thither from Europe in sufficient numbers to subjugate or keep them, and of supporting such troops there; but if the rapid progress of the English Colonies on the Continent be not arrested, or what amounts to the same thing, if a counterpoise capable of confining them within their limits, and of forcing them to the defensive, be not formed, they will possess, in a short time, such great facilities to construct formidable armaments on the Continent of America, and will require so little time to convey a large force either to St. Domingo or to the Island of Cuba, or to our Windward islands, that it will not be possible to hope to preserve these except at an enormous expense.

This will not be the case if we make a more energetic and generous effort to increase and strengthen Canada and Louisiana, than the English are making in favor of their Colonies; since the French Colonies, despite their destitute condition, have always waged war against the English of the Continent with some advantage, though the latter are, and always have been, more numerous; it is necessary to explain here the causes to which this has been owing.

The first is the great number of alliances that the French keep up with the Indian Nations. These people, who hardly act except from instinct, love us hitherto a little, and fear us a great deal, more than they do the English; but their interest, which some among them begin to understand, is that the strength of the English and French remain nearly equal, so that through the jealousy of these two nations those tribes may live independent of, and draw presents from, both.

The second reason of our superiority over the English is, the number of French Canadians who are accustomed to live in the woods like the Indians, and become thereby not only qualified to lead them to fight the English, but to wage war even against these same Indians when necessity obliges.

Hence 'twill be seen that this superiority of the French in America is in some sort accidental, and if they neglect to maintain it, whilst the English are making every effort to destroy it, 'twill pass into the hands of the latter. There is no doubt but such an event would be followed by the entire destruction of our settlements in that part of the Globe.

This, however serious it may seem, would not be our only loss; it would drag after it the superiority which France must claim over England.

If anything can, in fact, destroy the superiority of France in Europe, it is the Naval force of the English; this alone sustained the house of Austria at the commencement of the war of the Spanish succession, as it caused France to lose, at the close of the last war, the fruit of the entire conquest of the Austrian Lower Countries.

We must not flatter ourselves with being able long to sustain an expenditure equal to theirs; no other resource remains then but to attack them in their possessions; that cannot be effected by forces sent from Europe except with little hope of success, and at vast expense, whilst by fortifying ourselves in America and husbanding means in the Colonies themselves, the advantages we possess can be preserved, and even increased at a very trifling expense, in comparison with the cost of expeditions fitted out in Europe.

The utility of Canada is not confined to the preservation of the French Colonies, and to rendering the English apprehensive for theirs; that Colony is not less essential for the conservation of the Spanish possessions in America, especially of Mexico.

So long as that barrier is well secured; so long as the English will be unable to penetrate it; so long as efforts will be made to increase its strength, 'twill serve as a rampart to Louisiana, which hitherto sustains itself only under the shadow of the forces of Canada, and by the connection of the Canadians with the Indians.

Should any unforeseen revolution disturb the intimate union now existing between the two Crowns, we should even be able, by means of Louisiana, to share with the Spaniards the profit of the rich settlements they possess in America; but this event appears so distant, that it is the opinion that France, for its own interest, and in order to remove every jealousy, must not seek to extend its possessions Westward, that is to say, towards the Spaniards, but apply all its resources to strengthen itself at the East, that is, in the direction of the English.

In fine, Canada, the fertility whereof is wonderful, can serve as the granary of the Tropical Colonies, which, in consequence of the men they destroy, sell their rich products very dear. It is proved that the number of Canadians who die in these Colonies that are admitted to be the most unhealthy, is much less than that of European French.

All that precedes sufficiently demonstrates that it is of the utmost importance and of absolute necessity not to omit any means, nor spare any expense to secure Canada, inasmuch as that is the only way to wrest America from the ambition of the English, and as the progress of their empire in that quarter of the globe is what is most capable of contributing to their superiority in Europe.

Of Hudson's Bay.

Having treated of Canada in general, we consider ourselves bound to enter into some details respecting its different parts, and shall commence with those of the North.

Hudson's bay, which was one of its most lucrative establishments, has been ceded to the English by the Treaty of Utrecht under the denomination or title of restitution. They carry on a profitable trade there, but the excessive cold and the difficulty of subsistence will never permit them to form establishments there capable of affording any uneasiness to Canada; and if the strength of the latter country be augmented, as proposed, 'twill possibly be in a condition, in the first war, to wrest Hudson's bay from the English.

The Treaty of Utrecht had provided for the appointment of Commissioners to regulate the boundaries of Hudson's bay; but nothing has been done in that matter. The term, Restitution, which has been used in the Treaty, conveys the idea clearly that the English can claim only what they have possessed, and as they never had but a few establishments on the sea coasts, 'tis evident that the interior of the country is considered as belonging to France.

Of the French Posts in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; of Ile Royale and Acadia.

We shall say but one word on the posts France possesses as well on the coast of Labrador as on the Gulf of St. Lawrence for Seal fishing. These posts are useful to commerce in time of peace, but afford trifling advantage over the enemy in time of war.

The loss of Acadia has necessitated a very particular attention to be paid to Ile Royale, where Louisbourg has been built and fortified. Acadia constituted, formerly, a part of Canada, and is doubtless one of the most serious losses we have experienced at the peace of Utrecht. The establishment of Louisbourg, with a view to repair that loss as much as possible, is but a feeble recompense.

'Tis universally admitted by all those acquainted with the locality, and cannot be too often repeated, that if Canada does not take Acadia at the beginning of the next war, Acadia will take, or cause the fall of Louisbourg.

It is not, however, to be concluded, as many seem to have done in the last war, that the preservation of Canada depends absolutely on Louisbourg. It has been proved that Canada could sustain herself without that place; but 'tis no less true that it is of great advantage to her in time of war.

The simple view of the position of Louisbourg dispenses with entering into any detail in this regard; but if it be evidently useful to New, it is no less so to Old, France both in time of war and of peace.

The harbors of Ile Royale, especially that of Louisbourg, are most favorably situated as a place at which vessels may touch on their return from long voyages, also as a retreat for privateers and a point whence they can have an opportunity of destroying the enemy's trade, inasmuch as on leaving that port they are almost on the track of all the rich ships of the world.

In fine, it is, next to Acadia, the best adapted situation for the fishery; a branch of trade as useful on account of the money it saves to and brings in the Kingdom, as well as on account of the great number of seamen it employs, accustoms to labor without exposing them to acute and mortal diseases; an advantage not enjoyed by the rich Colonies of the Tropics.

The importance of these objects must tend to excite more attention than ever to the means of securing the preservation of Ile Royale, and arresting the progress of the English in the direction of Acadia, so that the settlements they are making there may approach Canada and Louisbourg only as little as possible.

Nothing is more essential to the preservation of Ile Royale than to secure for it the means of communication with Canada, and to spare no pains to establish entrepôts of provisions, and especially of cattle as well in Ile Royale itself, though they cannot be either considerable or sufficient, as in the Island of St. John ( which is better adapted for that purpose ), and in that part of Canada bordering on the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

There is a part of the year when there is no communication between Louisbourg and Canada by the River St. Lawrence, and no route practicable except by way of the River St. John.

This is one of the principal considerations that gives interest to the preservation of that part of Canada, which the English would appropriate under the name of Acadia. Its soil, of itself, is of little fertility; any detachments at all considerable cannot be supported there for a long time to come; but the River St. John, which runs through that country, is the sole available route during six months of the year, between Louisbourg and Quebec; and the only one affording a passage to small detachments, which, dispersed through the woods and sustained by the Indians, are often capable of disconcerting the projects of the English and rendering their execution of them difficult and murderous. Were they masters of this communication, the aid of the Indians would at the same time be lost, Louisbourg would find itself abandoned too often and for too long a time to its own strength, not to succumb to the first hostile attack, and the environs of Quebec would be exposed to the incursions of the enemy by reason of the facilities the latter would possess of reaching that city by ascending the River St. John, which rises in the vicinity of the settlements bordering on the River St. Lawrence. So many powerful reasons show the necessity of attending to the preservation of that part of Canada.

Hence it results that too much precaution cannot be used in arranging the boundaries of Acadia. According to strict construction of the Treaties, and the ancient descriptions of that Province, the cession made to the English terminates at Port Royal and its liberty (banlieue<sup>1</sup>), and at the part of the coasts which extends from the extremity of the Bay of Fundy unto Cape Canso. They must not possess anything on the Bay of St. Lawrence nor towards the Isthmus, nor towards what is called Minas, the inhabitants of which are French and Catholics. If, nevertheless, for the sake of peace, it be determined to cede to them a portion of the Peninsula, which doth not appertain to them, it seems that it ought not to be done, except in return for some advantages, and that it could not be done with safety but by attaching some conditions thereto, without which it would be better perhaps that the claims on both sides remain, with the resolution to maintain them by force in case the English should employ any to extend their possessions beyond what is legitimately their right.

The conditions on which it is presumed that France could cede the part of the Peninsula belonging to her, are

1st That the English should not erect any fort, make any sedentary settlement, nor any improvement on the Island of Canso, which should remain neutral; nor along the coast of the Peninsula from Cape Canso to Bay Verte, which coast should remain in the possession of the Indians; that the Isthmus should not be fortified by either party within a distance of three or four leagues, and that the passage across it should remain open to the French to go from one sea to the other; that the English should not be at liberty to pass the Gut of Canso, nor navigate the Gulf; and in order not to afford them reason to complain that exorbitant conditions are exacted, it might be stipulated that France would not, on its side, build any fort within three leagues of the coast of the Etchemins<sup>1</sup> and of the Bay of Fundy, nor establish any Fishing post in that part of the sea.

2nd That all the French settlers should be permitted to leave English territory with their property and cattle, and for this purpose should be allowed a period of 18 months, to count from the day they would have commenced to enjoy this permission.

3rd That the boundary line of New England should remain fixed at the River Kinibequi, or at such other (river) to be agreed upon, which would be on the Boston side, at least twenty leagues from the River St. John; that, moreover, the Abenakis should be maintained in the possession of their villages of Narantsouak and Panaouamské and continue to enjoy the protection of France.

4th That in future the water-shed (les eaux pendantes) should serve as the boundary line reciprocally of both nations along the frontiers between New England and the other Colonies which lie along the same line as far as and including Georgia on the one side, and Canada and Louisiana on the other; this would carry with it the abandonment by the English of Fort Chouaguen, otherwise it would be impossible to maintain a durable peace between the two Colonies, and this circumstance must render it evident how essential this last condition is. Its importance will be more fully developed in the next article.

ARTICLE 6th

Of the Canadian Posts Inland.

The interior of Canada is traversed by the River St. Lawrence, and the Lakes which supply the waters of that great stream.

Its navigation and trade can be interrupted more easily than people suppose. That facility, which a powerful maritime enemy can possess, is one of the greatest misfortunes of Canada; a partial remedy only can be applied to it, by building one or two forts at Gaspé and the Seven Islands, under the cover of which vessels may retreat, but the true remedy would be, to place the Colony generally in a position to overawe those in the possession of England, and to make her fear war in America.

We shall not speak of the naval expedition the enemy might be able to make for the conquest of Canada. Though they should succeed, which could not be the case except by a very rare combination of circumstances in their favor, we do not think they would find it easy to retain that place even one minute.

But should they continue to increase the strength of their Colonies, and should the French Colonies not advance in the same proportion, 'tis not to be doubted but the former will soon be in a condition to lay Canada waste nearly to Montreal, and even to pillage the latter place, which would render the French as despicable in that country as they are now respected there, and terminate shortly in their entire ruin.

One of the principal means to avoid this misfortune is to strengthen, still further, not only Quebec and Montreal, but also Fort St. Frederic, at which place it would be essential to settle a large, well fortified French village, in time of peace, and to attract thither an Indian village in time of war. All that will cost little, if at the same time we take care to settle some farmers on Lake Champlain, and form some villages there.

It would be proper, also, to fortify, but discreetly, the post established in 1748 on the River St. Lawrence by M<sup>r</sup> Picquet near La Galotte, Fort Frontenac and to settle some villages in the vicinity.

Fort Frontenac is at the outlet of Lake Ontario, on which the English have established a post or fort called Chouaguen; an usurpation the most flagrant, and at the same time the most pernicious to Canada.

This post, located on ground, and on the borders of a lake, always in the possession of the French, has not been erected by the English until a number of years after the Treaty of Utrecht, and in a period of profound peace. The Governor of Canada then confined himself to protests, and the post has continued, and remains, when it ought to have been pulled down in the beginning by force.

Now the English regard that post as an acquired right, and rely on the article in the Treaty of Utrecht, which states that the French will not molest the Five Cantons of Indians, subjects of Great Britain. The engagement that France has contracted by that article reduces itself to not attacking the Iroquois, against whom the English were, at that time, apprehensive the Canadians would wage war. But, besides, what is said of the authority of the English over the Iroquois, is a simple enunciation; it does not constitute a title; it could not make subjects of the Iroquois; they do not depend on England either in fact or of right; they have made war and peace before and since the Treaty of Utrecht, without the consent and against the will of the English; they have publicly protested their independence, which they have constantly enjoyed without the English having dared or daring to contradict them in America.

Moreover, this article of the Treaty of Utrecht, however favorable it may be presumed to be to the English, leaves the question of territory totally undecided; the stipulations it contains respecting the liberty the Indians shall enjoy, of visiting indiscriminately the Colonies of both Nations, and the mutual obligations not to molest them, deprive the French of no possessory rights they might have acquired, anteriorly, over territories not yet subject to any proprietorship, whereof the Indians have not even an idea; besides, the personal subjection of these Nations would not entail that of a country, because they have no circumscribed limits, and being liable to change of habitation, being, really, dispersed in divers places, in which privilege they are not to experience any molestation, it would follow from the pretension of the English that the Iroquois would transport the dominion of England in every place they might transport their habitations to, even were it in the centre of the French Colonies, such as the vicinity of Montreal, where two villages have been formed. The absurdity of the consequence demonstrates both the little foundation of this pretence and the necessity to return from it to the preliminary question, to wit: Who first took possession of that territory? Then the question can neither be doubtful nor equivocal in favor of France.

We shall not enter here into any lengthy discussion on the point of right; but we must not omit observing that this post, which has been almost regarded as an object of trifling importance, is capable of causing the entire ruin of Canada, and has already inflicted on it the greatest injury.

There it is that the French often carry on a fraudulent trade which transmits to England profits the most unquestionable, that Canada ought to afford to France.

There it is that the English scatter rum among the Indians, the use of which had been forbidden them by the King's Ordinances, because it set them crazy.

In fine, it is there that the English entice all the Indian Nations, and endeavor by force of presents, not only to debauch them, but also to induce them to assassinate the French traders dispersed throughout the vast extent of the forests of New France.

As long as the English will possess Chouaguen there will be a perpetual distrust of Indians the most loyal to the French; twice more troops than the state of the Colony requires, or comports with its condition, will have to be maintained in times of the most profound peace; forts will have to be established and kept in an infinite number of places, and very numerous and very expensive detachments sent almost every year, to restrain the different Nations of Indians. The navigation of the lakes will be always exposed to be disturbed; agriculture will not advance, except very slowly, and cannot be pursued except in the heart of the Colony; in fine, matters will be always in a situation possessing all the inconveniences of war, even without any of its advantages.

Nothing, then, must be left undone to destroy this dangerous post, on the first occasion for reprisals the English will offer by some of those hostilities they are but too much accustomed to commit in time of peace; supposing that its cession, by common consent, cannot be obtained, for some equivalent.

What has been observed already in the course of this Memoir, when treating of the utility of Canada in regard to the preservation of Mexico, shows the absolute necessity of the free and certain communication from Canada to the Mississippi. This chain, once broken, would leave an opening of which the English would doubtless take advantage to get nearer the silver mines (la source de l'argent). Many of their writings are full of this project, which will never amount to anything but a chimera, if France retain her Canadian possessions.

That of the River Oyo, otherwise called the Beautiful river, is the most interesting in this relation. It rises near the country at present partly occupied by the Iroquois, runs southwardly, falls into the Ouabache, and with that river into the Mississippi.

This last has been discovered by Sieur De la Salle, who took possession of it in the King's name; and it would perhaps to-day be full of French settlements, had not the Governors of Canada been deterred from establishing permanent posts there by the apprehension that a counterband trade between the French traders and the English would be the consequence.

Neither have the English any posts there, nor did they come to that quarter to trade, except clandestinely, until the last war, when the revolt of some neighboring nations against the French, encouraged them to come more boldly.

They have been summoned since the peace, to retire, and if they do not do so, there is no doubt but the Governor of Canada will constrain them thereto by force, otherwise the case would be the same as at Choueguen, and this misfortune would be still more disastrous, for a post on the Beautiful river would possess more opportunities to do damage than Chouaguen alone.

1st They would have much greater opportunities there than at Chouaguen to seduce the Indian nations.

2nd They would possess more facilities to interrupt the communication between Canada and Louisiana, for the Beautiful river affords almost the only route for the conveyance from Canada to the River Mississippi, of detachments capable of securing that still feeble Colony against the incursions of the neighboring Indians of Carolina, whom the English are unceasingly exciting against the French.

3<sup>d</sup> If the English ever become strong enough in America to dare attempt the conquest of Mexico, it will be by this Beautiful river, which they must necessarily descend.

4th By it alone will they also be able to attack, with any considerable force, and any hope of success, the Illinois posts and all those which will be established along the River St. Louis, otherwise, Mississipi.

5th It is, moreover, by that route that they can attack the post of the Miamis, which, again, cuts off one of our best communications with the River Mississippi, and involves the loss of Detroit, an important post whereof mention will be made hereafter.

The establishment of some posts on the Beautiful river is considered, then, one of the most urgent expenses; but 'tis believed, at the same time, that these posts will not acquire any solidity except so far as the strength of Niagara and Detroit will be augmented.

This last mentioned place demands, now, the greatest attention. Did it once contain a farming population of a thousand, 'twould feed and defend all the rest. Throughout the whole interior of Canada, it is the best adapted locality for a town where all the trade of the lakes would concentrate; were it provided with a good garrison and surrounded by a goodly number of settlements, it would be able to overawe almost all the Indians of the Continent. 'Tis sufficient to see its position on the map, to understand its utility. It would stand on the River St. Lawrence within reach of the Oyo, the Illinois, the River Mississipi, and in a position to protect all these different places, and even the posts north of the lakes.

Continuing the same route and the same views, the post deserving of most attention next to Detroit, or concurrently with it, is that of Illinois.

Here the climate is almost altogether changed; we are no longer exposed to the rigors of a seven months' winter; nor obliged, as in the neighborhood of Quebec, to make ruinous clearances for the purpose of improving very poor lands. Beyond the banks of the river, the entire country is open, and waiting only for the plough; there are, already, some settlers supplied with a pretty good stock of cattle, but nothing in comparison with what they could accommodate. Moreover, these vast praries, which, in various directions, extend as far as several hundred leagues beyond the River Superior, are covered with an innumerable multitude of buffaloes, a species which will probably not run out for many centuries hence, both because the country is not sufficiently peopled to make their consumption perceptible, and because the hides, not being adapted to the same uses as those of the European race, it will never happen that the animals will be killed solely for the sake of their skins, as is the practice among the Spaniards of the River de la Plata.

If the Illinois buffaloes do not supply the tanneries with much, eventually, advantages at least equivalent may reasonably be expected, on which we cannot prevent ourselves dwelling for a moment.

1st These animals are covered with a species of wool, sufficiently fine to be employed in various manufactures, as experience has demonstrated.

2nd It can scarcely be doubted that by catching them young and gelding them, they would be adapted to ploughing; perhaps, even, they would possess the same advantage that horses have over domestic oxen, that is, superior swiftness; they appear to be as strong, but perhaps are indebted for this to wild breeding; in other respects, they do not seem difficult to tame; a 4 or 5 year old Bull and Cow have been seen that were extremely gentle.

3<sup>d</sup> Were the Illinois country sufficiently well settled to admit of the people inclosing a great number of these animals in parks, some of them might be salted, a business susceptible of being extended very considerably, without Illinois possessing a large population for that purpose. This trade would perhaps enable us to dispense with Irish beef for Martinico, and even to compete with the English, and at a lower rate, for the supply of the Spanish Colonies.

'Twill, doubtless, be objected that these advantages are very remote, and that possibly unforeseen obstacles will occur; but be this consideration ever so remote, one question always remains, not whether this post must be abandoned, but whether it will be delivered up to England, who will make a permanent entrepôt of it for the purpose of attempting the conquest of Mexico.

We pass over the mines which 'tis pretended have been discovered in that quarter. Apart from the insufficient information we possess respecting them, it is the opinion that no attention ought to be paid to the subject, until we will have received a sufficient accession, principally of men, grain and cattle.

ARTICLE 7th.

Of Louisiana.

We shall not dwell at any length on what relates to Louisiana, which, in its present feeble condition, cannot sustain itself independent of Canada.

Louisiana is a country very susceptible of useful husbandry, and lacking only settlers. It can be peopled from the mouth, and from the upper part, of the river, and neither of the two is to be neglected. The progress of trade will be most rapid by filling up the section convenient to the sea; but it is doubtful whether this is the part to which government ought to direct its principal attention. Aside from being most liable to excite the envy and clamors of the neighboring Colonies, it is the section which will be soonest peopled without any intervention on the part of government.

If the strength and permanency of the posts alone are to be considered, then Louisiana must be settled from the upper part of the river. It ought to derive its principal strength and resources from the post of the Illinois mentioned in the preceding article. This post, as represented, is by no means so attractive as the lower part of the river; it is in some sort a lost country, where trade will not flourish for a long time, nor rapid fortunes be realized; but as a recompense for that, they will be perhaps more solid than in any other part of the Colonies.

It must be considered, also, that the difficulties of ascending the river are so great that the lower section of the Colony can never feed Illinois; the latter post, on the contrary, appears to be located expressly to secure the subsistence of New Orleans, whither 'twill be able to send grain and meat in all seasons, and despite all the Naval force of the world.

Some observations might be made on the neighboring posts of Georgia and Carolina, but as they are immediately connected with the government of Louisiana, and I have only an imperfect knowledge of them, I shall abstain from speaking of them, the rather as this Memoir is already lengthy, and the remarks on the Beautiful river and Chouaguen are applicable to those posts.

CONCLUSION.

The result of this memoir is, that no means must be neglected to increase and strengthen Canada and Louisiana; to settle permanently the neighborhood of Fort St. Frederic, and the posts of Niagara, Detroit and the Illinois.

For this purpose the resolution ought to be adopted to send a great many people to New France, in order to enable those who have the administration thereof, to work at the same time at the different proposed posts.

These people ought to be principally soldiers, who can in a very short time be converted into good settlers.

Some smugglers, and even some bad women (femmes de mauvaise vie), may be added to them, but none of the latter must be sent until applied for, which probably will not be soon, as there are generally more women than men in Canada.

Some sturdy beggars can be also added, but they must be few at a time, so that they may be forwarded, according as they will arrive, to the different places where they are to work.

In fine, nothing must be spared to strengthen these Colonies, since they may, and are to be considered as the bulwark of America, against the attacks of the English; since they alone can make up for the want of Naval forces, and the outlay they will occasion will save more considerable expense whereof the effects are much less certain, especially if we allow ourselves to be reduced to the necessity of having to transport reinforcements thither from France, in order to preserve these Colonies in time of war; and since they cannot be abandoned to their actual strength alone, without being delivered over in some sort to the English, who, by the wealth they would draw thence, to the exclusion of other Nations, would most certainly acquire the superiority in Europe.

December, 1750.

Propositions of the Onondagas of the Five Nations to the Marquis de la Jonquière, Governor, Lieutenant-General for the King, throughout the entire of New France, the territories and country of Louisiana, in presence of the Civil and Military Chiefs of the Iroquois of the Sault Saint Louis, and of the Lake of the Two Mountains, of the Abenakis of Saint Francis, and of the Otagais Sinagos and Kiskakons of Missilimakinac, which propositions, as well as the answers, have been interpreted to each Nation, word for word. The 11th of July, 1751.

PROPOSITIONS.

Kaksenthiony, Onondaga speaker. By two strings.

1.

I speak for the Onondagas, and on behalf of the Five Nations.

2.

You see all your children assembled here by your order; we met with an accident yesterday, a woman belonging to our Nation was dangerously wounded by her grandson, who was drunk; we are sorry for it, but we console ourselves because this woman belongs to us, and the affair was between relations. 'Twere well that no Brandy be drank until business shall have been transacted.

3.

Father, You have had the goodness to send persons to meet us at Lachine to wipe away our tears and clear our throats; we thank you for your kindness; permit us to do the same in your presence, by our brethren of the Sault and of the Lake.

Addressing those of the Lake and of the Sault, by three Strings.

4.

Brethren of the Sault and of the Lake, I wipe away your tears; we ought all forget our past trouble; the presence of our Father Onnonthio must render us more joyous; I clear your throat and ears with these three Strings.

By three Strings.

5.

We are very glad to give you news of your warriors, who, to the number of eighteen, were defeated last year at the Ant-hill (montagne de la Fourmi); we learned from an Oneida that two of our young men, who had been with them, were killed by the Cherakis, but we doubt not they were accompanied by the English, and that these struck the blow, for none had been scalped, and your men have been found with their arms, clothes and wampum, which the Cherakis would not have failed to take; it is to be presumed that the English committed this murder.

6.

Exhibiting a Belt.

Here is a Belt which was given to us by Mékinack, an Otasais chief of Detroit, on the behalf of the Marquis de la Galissonnière in the name of all the French and ten other Nations, his children, who were, then, assembled with him, to inform us that we had committed a grave error in allowing a settlement to have been made on the Beautiful river, and to persuade us to cause our young men and the Nations who are gone thither to retire; we are always ready to obey that message; we have summoned the English to withdraw from the other side of the mountain, in order that the earth be free, it being essential to preserve the hunting of those countries for the warriors.

7.

We have already obeyed M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonniere's Belt, by showing it to the young men who are on the Beautiful river; 'tis true our people resort there, but 'tis only for the purpose of hunting, of which the English deprive them; we have sent these English word to retire.

8.

By a Belt deposited at the Store in Montreal.

Father, Here is a Belt on which you will find marked the Nations who united with us to make those young men retire; we assure you we will not permit any Nation to establish posts there; the Master of Life has placed us on that territory, and we alone ought to enjoy it, without anybody having the power to trouble us there.

There are people belonging to all Nations on the Beautiful river, we pray you to have them sent off, especially those of the Sault and of the Lake, the Abenakis and Outagais, whose chiefs are here present.

9.

When Mékinac gave us M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonniere's Belt, he recommended us to obey our Father's message; to be careful not to commit blunders; he threatened us, and requested us not to allow ourselves to be spoken of in connection with bad business.

10.

I told Mékinac in reply, that he was as foolish as I; that trouble originated as much with him as with me. I added: remember, when you met us at Chouaguen, you communicated news to us, and have always created trouble; control your people only, I will control mine, and you will see that things will go well, and that the nations will be quiet; we are Onnontio's children and as loyal as you can be.

Answers of the General, by two Strings.

Son Kaksenthiony, I have listened attentively to all you have said to me for yourself and for the Five Nations, though each village ought to have sent deputies with you.

2.

I see you here present, my dear children, with pleasure; I would have been very glad had you come all of last year; I expected you, and though children who love their father sincerely ought to leave everything to go and see him, yet, impatient as I was to give you proofs of my goodness, I deputed Sieur Chabert de Joncaire to go to all your villages to pay you a visit from me; and charged him to come himself and bring me news of the Five Nations.

I feel great interest in the assault committed on a woman of your village by her grandson. I hope the attention paid her by my Surgeon will operate her cure; it is for you, children, to administer such correction as you will find suited to this young man.

Were my orders not contravened, my children would never get drunk; but they are so smart that they deceive me, and find Frenchmen who treat them to brandy in secret, of which you ought to take care.

3.

My attention in sending to meet you at Lachine, must prove to you my good feelings; I desired not that you should arrive in my village with wet eyes; I had your tears wiped away by your son, M<sup>r</sup> de la Chavignerie, and had your throat cleared in order that your words may flow free and easy.

By three Belts.

Children, You have done well to wipe away the tears of your brethren of the Sault and of the Lake; I would be rejoiced if my presence made you forget all your troubles; if you interpret my sentiments toward you all, correctly, you will be persuaded that I labor only to make you happy.

4.

I grieve much for the melancholy fate which befell, at the Ant-hill, eighteen Iroquois of the Sault, whereof two were young men of yours. I unite with you, my dear children, in bewailing them.

5.

I see the Belt which was sent by the Marquis de la Galissonnière in the name both of the French and ten other nations.

I applaud your constant readiness to obey that Belt, and cannot sufficiently exhort you to do your best to get your people and the other nations to retire from the Beautiful river to their ancient village; 'tis certain, my children, that these tribes cannot do anything but mischief there, and if you would make use of the authority you have over them, they would conclude on following your good advice.

The steps I have taken to oblige these nations to withdraw, ought to convince them that I have only their interest at heart, and I am sufficiently disposed to believe that they would have profited by the amnesty I granted to them, had the English, who are with them, not urged them not to listen to my voice.

You cannot deny that these English are the authors of all the mischief; you ought to oblige them not to appear any more on the Beautiful river; I agree that you should hunt there; the French have never troubled you, whilst the English occupy themselves only with their own plans which tend to your ruin; confess, my children, that they have no right to go there, and that they would be careful not to make their appearance in that quarter, did you not receive them there.

You ought not content yourselves with showing the Marquis de la Galissonnière's Belt to the Nations on the Beautiful river; you ought, also, to tell them decidedly, that you would constrain them to obey that Belt; had you spoken to them in this tone, you would have made them think seriously, and the Earth would be at peace.

I know that you are accustomed to go to hunt at the Beautiful river, and that you never come back without having transacted some business with the English; I can also add, that some of your young men, as well as some belonging to other nations, always remain there; it is in this way that that country now finds itself inhabited by several bands of different nations, who prefer a lawless life to living in their village in the centre of their families.

The English are much less anxious to take away your peltries than to become masters of your lands; they labor only to debauch you; you have the weakness to listen to them, and your blindness is so great, that you do not perceive that the very hand that caresses you, will scourge you like negroes and slaves, so soon as it will have got possession of those lands.

By a Belt deposited in the store at Montreal.

I shall always preserve the Belt you have given me to let me know the nations who have united with you to carry out M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière's good views.

I cannot but believe the assurance you give me that you will not permit any nation to establish posts at the Beautiful river; doubtless you have not spoken without reflection; but how comes it—do you deceive me?—that the English traders have each their house, or their huts there? Whence comes it—do you desire to conceal from me—that your people live with them, hand and glove (à pot et à feu); truly, my children, your conduct hardly corresponds with my intentions; I cannot perceive, without deep pain, that the blindness of all the nations does not permit them to see that they are nourishing vipers in their bosom, whose sting will be more dangerous to them than the death of themselves, their children and all their posterity.

I repeat that the lands on the Beautiful river are to be reserved for your hunting, and you may be assured that I will aid you with all my might to drive from them all those who will trouble you there.

No nation is ignorant that I have, up to the present time, used every mild means to recall back to their villages the nations who have taken refuge at the Beautiful river; I must not even conceal from you that they have somewhat abused my kindness, and yet my heart, which breathes only love for my children, would be disposed to pardon them all their past faults, and I would still open my arms to receive them. You of the Lake and you Otasais, pay attention to what I have just said, and on your side, use all your efforts to recall all your people back to your village; I recommend you to do so, and require it of your friendship for me.

Mékinac could not too earnestly recommend you to obey M<sup>r</sup> de la Galissonnière's message, and not to allow yourselves to be spoken of in connection with bad business.

9.

The answer you gave Mékinac pleases me, and you surprise me by saying that he has meddled with bad business; I shall not fail to reproach him with it.

I see that he has been at Chouaguen like many others; Rum draws you all to that place; you have no idea, children, how pernicious that liquor is to you. The English employ it to spoil your heart and senses, and you must, moreover, have perceived that such liquor injures your health. How many of your brethren has it not killed.

We, Pierre Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout all New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana.

Certify the present copy to be conformable to the original remaining the office of our Secretary. In testimony whereof, we have signed these presents, caused the same to be sealed with the seal of our Arms, and to be countersigned by our Secretary.

The General's Answer.

God has favored us with the fine weather yesterday, to enable us to reach you in safety; these are people who come from the head of the islands (bout des îles); we rejoice to see you in perfect health; all these are chiefs and warriors who bid you good morning.

2.

We have not the talent of the French; we are Indians; we pray you to pardon us if our speech be not couched in appropriate terms.

3.

We are newly born children; we have heard of the attack on the people of the Sault; we have made every search to discover who committed it.

4.

We have ascertained that they were Cheraquis; we ask if it be your pleasure that we take up the hatchet against them; they have shed our own blood; our brethren, the people of the Sault, of the Lake, and all those who are under your wing will join us.

5.

How do you wish us to proceed; we are born only to-day; we have embraced Prayer; our young braves, who have taken refuge among us, are resting themselves, and are desirous to strike a blow, if you will favor our mission, we must avenge the death of our Children, I feel sincere pleasure in seeing you. I thank you for the interest you take in my health.

I know that you are young, and that you cannot yet be great orators; I am, however, pleased with your speech; it has been well spoken; you will not fail to acquire great talents, and to be able to work sedulously for the public good by executing whatever the Abbé Picquet will direct you from me to do for the service of the King, my master.

3.

You can only weep for your brethren of Sault St. Louis who have experienced a sad fate; I regret them as well as you; you have done well to search out the true authors of their death.

4.

I cannot disapprove your taking up the hatchet to strike the Cheraquis, who have steeped their hands in the blood of your brethren; your brethren of the Sault, of the Lake, and all those who are under my wing, will confer a pleasure on me by uniting with you.

I am very glad that you are firm in your plan and that you will execute it ; I receive your Belt with pleasure, and give you another to assure you that on the breaking up of the ice, I shall order the powder and lead you will require to be delivered to you.

By a Belt.

I give you also this Belt, whereby I wish to bind myself to you ; present it to the people of the Sault, of the Lake, to the Iroquois of the Five Nations, and to all those who are under my wing ; I tie them to you so that they may not separate from you until you will have avenged the death of your brethren.

Ministerial Minute on the Attempts of the English to settle on the Ohio.

CANADA.

The English always occupied with plans to extend their possessions, and to confine those of his Majesty, in North America, have undertaken since the last war to carry their trade towards the Beautiful river, which is situated in the interior, between Canada and Louisiana, and forms the principal communication between these two Colonies ; to corrupt the Indian Nations of that quarter, and even to establish posts there.

The Marquis de la Jonquière having been informed of those attempts, adopted measures last year to prevent their success. He organized divers detachments of Frenchmen and Indians, which, according to his arrangements, were to form a junction this spring to proceed at once to the Beautiful river, drive the English from it, and bring back the Indians who might have allowed themselves to be debauched by the intrigues of that Nation.

News of the result was expected at the end of this year, but private letters have arrived from Canada stating that the Marquis de la Jonquière has abandoned that project, and insinuating that private interest has led some one, in whom he had placed his confidence, to dissuade him from it, by making him apprehend creating thereby a general Indian war.

This motive would be good, if it were valid. It is proper always to avoid, as much as possible, war with the Indians ; but, it appears, that on this occasion, it was not difficult to guarantee himself against it.

The question is not to operate against the Indians, but to prevent the interloping trade the English are driving in a country belonging to us, and which, previous to the last war, they would be careful not to dispute us ; this is proposed to be effected by checking at the same time the views they entertain of establishing posts there. It is easy, therefore, to render the Indians indifferent in this regard ; nay, even to induce them to understand that for the sake of their own tranquillity and of the freedom of their trade, in which we have never clogged them, they must wish that we should stop the progress of the English schemes.

'Twould therefore be unfortunate if the Marquis de la Jonquière has abandoned the project he had formed for that purpose ; and although the private advices announcing that change on his part may be unfounded, it appears, nevertheless, proper not to keep him in ignorance of them ; to inform him, at the same time, that his Majesty continues to expect the execution of this project ; that there is, in fact, no other course to adopt than to drive from the Beautiful river any European foreigners who will happen to be there, so as to make them lose all taste for returning thither, observing, notwithstanding, the caution practicable in these sorts of matters.

As for the rest, there is no reason to apprehend any justifiable complaints on the part of the Court of England. The French were the discoverers of the Beautiful river, which has always served as a communication, as already observed, between Canada and Louisiana. We always carried on trade there without any interruption, and have sent considerable detachments thither on various occasions.

CANADA, 1752.

The Marquis de la Jonquière reported last year, that the Indian Nations of the Upper Countries were threatening a sort of general conspiracy against the French, and that the

English who succeeded in debauching them by presents and intrigues, were pledged to sustain them by arms.

He stated, at the same time, that the reports made to him by some faithful Nations, caused him to conclude that effectual measures must be indispensably adopted, both to bring the nations that had joined the conspiracy, back to their attachment to France, or to oblige them to return to their duty, and to destroy, by force of arms, the posts the English might have undertaken to erect on our territory toward the River Oio, whence they set all these movements on foot; and this Governor transmitted at the same time, a plan of operations which he was to execute, and which consisted principally in dispatching at the beginning of autumn last year, several detachments for various posts, whence they were to make a junction at the opening of the spring, at a rendezvous indicated to them, to act according to circumstances.

We learn by letters received from the Marquis de la Jonquière, and dated last September, that his plan was badly executed; that the officers entrusted with its execution had undertaken nothing against the rebellious Indians, nor against the English posts, and that the movements of those Indians are becoming every day more dangerous.

The Marquis de la Jonquière states, however, that he does not despair of reëstablishing tranquillity in the Upper Country; he has adopted new measures for that purpose, and explains the details thereof in the annexed letter.

Meanwhile, he has caused the arrest of 4 Englishmen who were trading on the lands of the Colony, and were endeavoring to debauch our Indians. It appears from the interrogatories they were subjected to at Quebec, that they were authorized by the English Governors, though they had not, however, produced their passports. The Marquis de la Jonquière has sent three of them to France, the 4th being unable, from sickness, to embark. Those three have been imprisoned at Rochelle, and 'tis proper that they be left there. It is not expected that the Court of England will reclaim them; at least they have not claimed that class of prisoners who had been taken in Louisiana, some years before the last war, and sent to France. But at all events, should any complaint be made on this subject, it will be easy to give an answer to it. As for the rest, the seizure of these trading posts is the least expensive, least inconvenient, and perhaps the most effectual way to put a stop, in the Indian country, to the movements the English are endeavoring to excite there.

Paris, March 1, 1752.

My Lord,

I must acquaint your Lordship, that in the month of November last, I received a letter from three persons, signing themselves John Patton, Luke Irwin and Thomas Bourke, representing to me that they were Englishmen who had been brought to Rochelle and put into prison there, from whence they wrote; having been taken by the French subjects, who seized their effects as they were trading with the English and other Indians on the Ohio, and carried prisoners to

Quebec, from whence they have been sent over to Rochelle, where they were hardly used. Upon this information I applied to M. St. Contest,<sup>1</sup> and gave him a note of it, claiming them as the King's subjects, and demanding their liberty and restitution of their effects, that had been unjustly taken from them.

These three persons, I find by the paper your Lordship has sent me, are of the number of those demanded of the French by Mr. Clinton, and named in M. de la Jonquière's letter. I have wrote a merchant at Rochelle to inquire after them, and to supply them with money, to make their journey hither, if they are not gone, that I may receive from them all the informations necessary; on my seeing M. St. Contest next Tuesday, I will represent the case to him, in obedience to his Majesty's commands; that M. la Jonquière may have positive orders to desist from the unjustifiable proceedings complained of; to release any of his Majesty's subjects he may still detain in prison, and to make ample restitution of their effects. And I shall take care to show them the ample necessity of sending instructions to their several Governors, not to attempt any such encroachments for the future.

Minute of Instructions to be given to M. Duquesne.

CANADA. INDIANS.

It appears from a letter of the Marquis de la Jonquière, that the efforts the English are making, and the expenses they incur, to gain over the Indians, are not without success among several Nations.

Information has been received last year of the progress they had already made among the Indians in the environs of the River Ohio, where they have undertaken, since the peace, to form some establishments.

The Marquis de la Jonquière had rendered an account of a plan he had prepared both to drive the English from that river and to chastise the Indians who allowed themselves to be gained over. That plan was to dispatch several detachments of Frenchmen and Indian allies, who were to form a junction at a rendezvous which was indicated to them, to operate afterwards relative to the object of that movement. Although the details of the Marquis de la Jonquière's dispositions in this regard might call forth some observations; yet as the project was good, and was, besides, to have been executed before that Governor could receive these remarks, his Majesty thought proper to approve what he had done. But all the consequent operations reduce themselves to the seizure of some English traders with their goods, and to the murder of two Indians of the Miamis Nation.

The seizure of the English traders* whose effects have been confiscated and even plundered by our Indians, cannot but produce a good effect, by disgusting the other traders of that Nation. But the murder of the two Miamis may be attended by unfortunate consequences; and in fact intelligence has been received that it had already caused a good deal of excitement among the rebel Nations.

<sup>1</sup> FRANÇOIS DOMINIQUE BARBERIE, Marquis de Saint Contest, was born 26th January, 1701, appointed King's Advocate at the Châtelet of Paris, 27th November, 1721, and, after filling various other important offices, and being Ambassador to Holland in 1750, he was, through the influence of Mice, de Pompadour, called on the 11th September, 1751, to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the dismissal of the Marquis de Puyseulx. His principal policy was the preservation of peace. He remained in office until his death, which took place on the 24th July, 1754. Biographie Universelle. — En.

The Marquis de la Jonquière pretends that if his expedition has not had the success he expected, it was because Sieur Celoron, Major and Commandant of Detroit, which was to be the centre of all the operations, has badly executed the orders and instructions he had given him.

But it would be useless, now, to enter into the examination of the faults that may have been committed. We must start from our present position, and establish some principles on which his Majesty may issue such orders as he may deem proper.

The English may pretend that we are bound by the Treaty of Utrecht to permit the Indians to trade with them. But it is certain that nothing can oblige us to suffer this trade on our territory.

Accordingly in all the alliances or quasi treaties or propositions we have had with the Far Indians, we have never obliged them expressly to renounce going to the English to trade; we have merely exhorted them to that effect, and never did we oppose that treaty by force.

The River Ohio, otherwise called the Beautiful river, and its tributaries belong indisputably to France, by virtue of its discovery by Sieur de la Salle; of the trading posts the French have had there since, and of possession which is so much the more unquestionable as it constitutes the most frequent communication from Canada to Louisiana. It is only within a few years that the English have undertaken to trade there; and now they pretend to exclude us from it.

They have not, up to the present time, however, maintained that these rivers belong to them: they pretend only that the Iroquois are masters of them and being the Sovereigns of these Indians, that they can exercise their rights. But 'tis certain that these Indians have none, and that, besides, the pretended sovereignty of the English over them is a chimera.

Meanwhile 'tis of the greatest importance to arrest the progress of the pretensions and expeditions of the English in that quarter. Should they succeed there, they would cut off the communication between the two Colonies of Canada and Louisiana, and would be in a position to trouble them, and to ruin both the one and the other, independent of the advantages they would at once experience in their trade to the prejudice of ours.

Any complaints that may be presented to the Court of England against the English Governors would be altogether futile. On the one hand it would be very difficult to obtain proofs of the most serious facts; and on the other, no matter what proofs may be produced, that Court would find means to elude all satisfaction, especially as long as the boundaries are not settled.

It is necessary then to act on the spot, and the question to be determined is, what means are the most proper.

It is not known what steps the Marquis de la Jonquière will take this year; but whatever they be, it appears that the orders to be given on this subject to Mr Duquesne, who is to succeed him in the government, must have principally for their object, to avoid, as much as it will be possible, an Indian war on that account.

Wars of this character are always extremely expensive, and very rarely productive of any real advantage.

Therefore, without undertaking, as the Marquis de la Jonquière appears to have proposed, to drive from the River Ohio the Indians who are looked upon as rebels or suspected, and without wishing even to destroy the liberty of their trade, it is thought best to adhere to two principal points.

1st To make every possible effort to drive the English from our territory, and to prevent them coming there to trade.

2<sup>d</sup> To give the Indians to understand at the same time that no harm is intended them, that they will have liberty to go as much as they please to the English to trade, but will not be allowed to receive these on our territory.

There is reason to believe that by this course of conduct; by providing our posts with plenty of goods and preventing our traders dictating to the Indians, our trade will soon recover the superiority over that of the English in those parts; for 'tis certain the Indians do not like to go into their towns, nor forts.

The Marquis de la Jonquière has rendered an account of a solemn Council which was held on the 11th of July last,<sup>1</sup> with the Onontagués of the Five Iroquois Nations, in presence of the chiefs of the Iroquois domiciliated at the Sault St. Louis and at the Lake of the Two Mountains; of the Abenakis of St. Francis and of the Outaouois of Michilimakinac. Everything appears to have gone off well in that Council on the part of those Indians, who have evinced very favorable dispositions. But two articles were discussed there, respecting which it is proper to give M<sup>r</sup> Duquesne particular orders.

The first is relative to the lands on the River Ohio. The Onontagués asserted in their speech, that these lands are the property of the Five Nations. The Marquis de la Jonquière has unadvisedly answered them so as to countenance that pretension, by giving them to understand that the French would not settle on those lands without their permission.

'Tis necessary to disabuse them on this head. They have, in fact, as has been already observed, no right to the River Ohio. We had discovered it long before they themselves had known it, and we have resorted to it when no other Indians were there but the Chaoüanons, with whom they were at war, and who have always been our friends.

The second turned on the murder of 18 Iroquois by some Cherokees. The Marquis de la Jonquière took advantage of that occasion to induce the Iroquois to make war on the Cherakis, who are allies of the English. He expects great advantages from this war; and by letters from M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, Governor of Louisiana, it appears that such is his opinion, also, on that point. But 'tis not known whether it would not be of more advantage to endeavor to make peace between these two Nations, and to profit by that occasion to conciliate the Cherakis in our favor. There is, at least, no doubt that the English pursue that course, and will succeed in it sooner or later.

However that be, 'tis considered proper to direct M<sup>r</sup> Duquesne to lay down henceforward in Canada a different system from that always followed hitherto in regard to wars among the Indians. With a view to occupy and weaken them, the principle has been to excite and foment these sorts of wars. That was of advantage in the infancy of the settlement of Canada. But in the condition to which these Nations are now reduced, and in their present dispositions generally, it is in every respect more useful that the French perform between them the part of protectors and pacificators. They will, thereby, entertain more consideration and attachment for us; the Colony will be more tranquil in consequence, and we shall save considerable expense. Cases, however, may occur in which it will be proper to excite war against certain Nations attached to the English; but even such cases call for two observations; one, to endeavor, first, to gain over these same Nations by reconciling them with ours; and the other, to be as sure as possible that our Indians will not suffer too much from these wars.

The Marquis de la Jonquière has likewise reported the measures he has adopted for the continuation of the Indian movements in the direction of Acadia. They correspond with the caution prescribed to him in regard to the English. There is nothing to be changed on this head in M<sup>r</sup> Duquesne's instructions. It appears merely proper to enjoin on him expressly to prevent the French painting or dressing themselves like Indians, in order to assault the English. 'Tis a flagrant treachery which must not be permitted even in time of war.

There are still other particular details in the Marquis de la Jonquière's letters respecting the Indians; but they do not deserve his Majesty's attention, and, besides, do not call for any special instructions to M<sup>r</sup> Duquesne. It is observable, however, that all that transpires among the different nations, goes to show that the English are employing every sort of manœuvre to debauch them. What is most unfortunate is, that they are now incurring more expense than they have ever done.

My Lord,

The late Marquis de la Jonquière had the honor to report to you, in his letter of the 13th 7<sup>ber</sup>, the ill success of the orders he had given in a secret instruction to M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron; that the band of La Demoiselle and other Indians of the Beautiful river had pushed their rebellion to excess, had adopted the English and had openly declared themselves the sworn enemies of the French.

In the same letter that General had the honor to inform you that he had adopted wise measures to secure the conquest of La Demoiselle's fort, to expel the English from the Beautiful river, to punish the Indian nations and to make them feel the King's power.

I doubt not, my Lord, but that letter had at first created great hopes of the execution of the expedition which was projected and concerted in the best possible manner by the late M. de la Jonquière.

But the despatch which that General had the honor to write you on the 29th of October, on the subject of M<sup>r</sup> de Belestre's voyage, and of the scalps taken by the Nepissings, will only create an apprehension in your mind that his orders and purest intentions would still be fruitless.

In fact, my Lord, the orders which M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière dispatched last spring to M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron, and repeated in his letter to him of the first of October, were not executed any more than those he had given him as far back as 1750, before his departare for Detroit. I cannot actually fathom the reasons which prevented that officer obeying them, as he makes no mention thereof in the letter he has written to the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière on the twenty-sixth day of January last.

That letter has been preceded by several other despatches from M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron and the Commandants of our other posts at the South, even, I think, at Illinois, but neither the one nor the other has reached me. M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron had addressed these despatches to M<sup>r</sup> de la Lavaltrie, the Commandant at Niagara, who detached a soldier to convey them to Fort Rouillé,<sup>1</sup> with orders to the storekeeper of that post to transmit them promptly to Montreal. It is not known what became of that soldier. About the same time a Mississagué from Toronto arrived at Niagara, who informed M<sup>r</sup> de Lavaltrie that he had not seen that soldier at the fort, nor met him on the way. 'Tis to be feared that he has been killed by Indians, and the despatches carried to the English. M<sup>r</sup> de la Valtrie has not failed to recommend to this Indian to make every search on his way back to his village, and to assure him, that should he find that soldier, and convey the despatches entrusted to him to the storekeeper of Toronto, he would be well rewarded.

M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron's letter is accompanied by one that M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris wrote to the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière on the 4th of January. 'Tis from this last letter that I learned more particularly the unfortunate state of our affairs.

From the accounts which M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron transmitted to the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière subsequent to those, a detail of which that General had the honor to give you, and previous to M<sup>r</sup> Celoron's being able to receive his last orders, sent in his letter of the first of October, it appears that it will be out of his power to make any movement.

He observes, first, that after the arrival of the Militia men under the command of Lieutenant de Longueuil, and twenty days' consultation among the nations, the latter had concluded, our force being insufficient to attack La Demoiselle and his allies, to keep the hatchet to use it when complete success would be certain, and to wait until the spring; that the delay these Indians demand, puts it out of his power to execute anything with the few Frenchmen he has; that is easy to perceive, by the manœuvre of the Indians, that they cannot be induced to follow the French unless the latter are in strong force; that he has notified the Commandants of the River St. Joseph and of the Syatonons of the resolution these Indians had adopted, and that, should their Indians be of the same mind, nothing can probably be effected, and they must confine themselves to putting their post in a secure state.

In a letter of the 18th of September, M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron notifies M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière that no dependence is to be placed on the Indians for any expedition, although Mikinac had assured him that nothing but the fear of the small pox had stopped him, and that all the villages will march in the spring, if forces be sent. Finally, M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron states, in his last letter, that he cannot say anything positively respecting the nations of his post, as he had not seen them since their departure for their winter grounds.

M<sup>r</sup> de Ligneris, Commandant at the Syatanons, believes that great reliance is not to be placed on the Maskoutins, and that their remaining neutral is all that is to be expected from them and the Kispapous. He even adds, that we are not to reckon on the nations which appear in our interests; no Syatanon Chief has appeared at his post for a long time, although they had promised to inform him of all that they knew.

Mr. de Villiers, Commandant at the Miamis, has been disappointed in his expectation of bringing the Miamis back from the White river, part of whom had been to see him, the small pox having put the whole of them to the route. Coldfoot and his son have died of it, as well as a large portion of our most trusty Indians. Le Gris, Chief of the Tepicons, and his mother, are likewise dead; they are a loss because they were well disposed towards the French.

<sup>1</sup> M. de la Jonquière had a fort built which was named Rouillé, after the Minister of the Marine; 'twas more commonly called Toronto, which is the present name of the place. Collections of Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, p. 13. — Ed.

The Nations of the River St. Joseph, who were to join those of Detroit, have said that they would be ready to perform their promise so soon as Onontio would have sent the necessary number of Frenchmen. The Commandant of this post writes on the 15th of January that all the Nations appear to take sides against us, that he would not be responsible for the good dispositions these Indians seem to entertain, inasmuch as the Miamis are their near relatives.

The Missilimakina Nations who had in like manner promised, have not budged either. M<sup>r</sup> Duplessis Fabert writes on the first of January that he has been informed some of the enemy have been seen on the Grand river.

It is exceedingly probable that the Commandant at Fort Chartres will not have any greater authority over the Nations of his post.

The result of all that I have the honor of reporting to you, my Lord, is that not only have our rebels of the Beautiful river not experienced any ill treatment from the Nations that the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière had excited against them, but even moreover, that the same Nations promised wonders to that General only with a premeditated view to deceive him, and that at heart they preserve the same feelings of attachment for those rebels to whom they are connected by blood.

The perfidy of these Nations, however unfortunate it may be, is not the most untoward event that could happen to us, and it was not without reason that the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière questioned whether the two scalps taken by the Nepissings would give any trouble to our rebels, or render them more mutinous. His alternative has been but too well realized to our greatest disadvantage.

On the one hand, M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire repeats that the Indians of the Beautiful river are all English, for whom alone they work; that they are all resolved to sustain each other, and that not a party of Indians goes to the Beautiful river but leaves some there to increase the rebel forces.

On the other hand M<sup>r</sup> de St. Ange, Commandant of the post of Vincennes, writes to M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris to use all means to protect himself from the storm which is ready to burst on the French; that he is busy securing himself against the fury of our enemies.

The Commandants of our posts have so much more cause to be on their guard against all events as our enemies have steeped their hands in French blood, and as we deeply feel the cost of the two scalps taken by the Nepissings near La Demoiselle's village.

The Miamis of Rock river have scalped two soldiers belonging to M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers' fort; this blow was struck last fall, doubtless shortly after that of the Nepissings.

The Pianguichias, who were at war with the Chaouanons, according to the report rendered by M<sup>r</sup> St. Clin to the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière, have declared entirely against us. They killed at Christmas five Frenchmen at the Vermillion.<sup>1</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris, who was aware of this attack, sent off a detachment to secure the effects of the Frenchmen from being plundered, but when this detachment arrived at the Vermillion, the Pianguichias had decamped. The bodies of the Frenchmen were found on the ice.

M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris was assured that the Pianguichias had committed this act, because four men of their Nation had been killed by the French at the Illinois, and four others had been taken and put in irons. It is said that these eight men were going to fight the Chikachas, and had, without distrusting anything, entered the quarters of the French who killed them. It has been reported, also, to M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris that these Frenchmen had recourse to this extreme measure only, because a Frenchman and two slaves had been killed a few days before by a party of Pianguichias, and that the Indians in question had no knowledge of that circumstance.

The like report was made to M<sup>r</sup> de St. Ange, Commandant at the post of Vincenne, and that many of the Illinois had been defeated.

On the 19th of October the Pianguichias had killed two more Frenchmen, who were constructing pirogues, lower down than the post of Vincenne.

Two days afterwards the Pianguichias killed two slaves in sight of Fort Vincenne.

The murder of these nine Frenchmen and these two slaves is but too certain.

M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire has informed the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière, by a letter of the 6th of September, that he had been assured by a party of the warriors, that the Flatheads had scalped three Frenchmen at a place called La Chutte,<sup>1</sup> in the lower part of the Beautiful river, and took a fourth Frenchman prisoner, whom they delivered, with the scalps, to the English; this news may be false, though there is reason to believe that it is true.

I expect nothing less than to learn by accounts I shall receive this spring, that other Frenchmen have been killed. The advices I have received from all quarters leave me no doubt on this head.

M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris thinks that many of the Syatonons, who form with the Pianguichias and the Miamis but one Nation, may join them.

A Squaw, the widow of one of the Frenchmen who had been killed at the Vermillion, has reported to M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris that the Pianguichias, Illinois and Osages were to assemble at the Prairies of _____, the place where Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Villiers and de Noyelle attacked the Foxes about twenty years ago, and when they had built a fort to secure their families, were to make a general attack on all the French.

'Twas also reported to M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris that a Pouteouatami chief, of the River St. Joseph, being at the Syatonons in the fall with letters for him, whilst he was at the Miamis, told a Pianguichias chief, privately, that his Nation would never accept the tomahawk to strike the Miamis. This assurance may have greatly emboldened the Miamis.

M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire writes, on the 30th of August, that he had just learned that a meeting of the Illinois, Syas, Pianguichias, Miamis, Delawares, Chaouanons and the Five Iroquois Nations, was to be had this year at La Demoiselle's, and that the whole tends, in his opinion, to a general revolt.

The storekeeper of Toronto writes to M<sup>r</sup> de Verchères, Commandant at Fort Frontenac, that some trustworthy Indians have assured him that the Saulteux, who killed our Frenchmen some years ago, have dispersed themselves along the head of Lake Ontario, and seeing himself surrounded by them, he doubts not but they have some evil design on his fort.

There is no doubt, my Lord, but 'tis the English who are inducing the Indians to destroy the French, and that they would give a good deal to get the savages to destroy Fort Toronto, on account of the essential injury it does their trade at Choueguen.

The capture of the four English traders by M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron's order last year, has not prevented other Englishmen going to trade to the Vermillion river, where the Reverend Father la Richardie wintered.

It has been reported to M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris that other English traders had been to the Beautiful river and to the White river to trade, under the guidance of some Wyatanons who were wintering there.

An English trader assured M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire that the Governor of Virginia was coming in the beginning of September with 800 horses, to the Beautiful river to hold a council with the Chaouanons at Cheningué.<sup>1</sup>

Finally, the English have paid the Miamis for the scalps of the two soldiers belonging to M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers' garrison.

To so many circumstances equally critical, are superadded the scarcity of provisions, and great appearance of famine at our Southern posts.

M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron writes, on the 12th of September, to M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière that the Indian corn is worth twenty livres the minot, payable in peltries, and that he will possibly be obliged to send away some of the Canadians from Detroit owing to the want of provisions.

To add to the misfortunes, M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris has learned that the Commandant of the Illinois would not permit Sieurs Delisle and Fonblanche, who had contracted with the King to supply the Miamis, Wyatanons, and even Detroit with provisions from the Illinois, to purchase any provisions for the subsistence of the garrisons of those posts, on the ground that an increase of troops and families had arrived who would consume the stock at the Illinois.

M<sup>r</sup> de St. Ange, Commandant at Fort Vincenne, does not state anything in this regard to M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris; he merely says that he has no intelligence from the Illinois, and that he is still uncertain whether the convoy had arrived there.

Whatever augmentation of troops and families may have taken place at the Illinois, 'tis certain that, on receipt of the letter, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Jonquière and Bégon have written to the Commandant and Commissary of Fort Chartres, who will do their best in order that Mess<sup>rs</sup> Delisle and Fonblanche may perform their contract, unless they suffer from a similar scarcity to ours. The great difficulty is, the arrival of the General and Intendant's orders at their destination. M<sup>r</sup> Desligneris sent them off on the 3<sup>d</sup> of January by 4 Mascoutins, but he doubts much if they will reach the Illinois; he knows not, even, that they will arrive at the post of Vincenne, on account of the enemies that encompass him.

The crops have also failed at the Beautiful river. M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire and the other Frenchmen have been reduced to a couple of handfuls (une jointée) of Indian corn a day; neither meat, nor grease, nor salt.

Famine is not the sole scourge we experience; the small-pox commits ravages; it begins to reach Detroit. One woman has died of it at the Huron village.

This disease prevails also at the Beautiful river.

'Twere desirable that it should break out and spread, generally, throughout the localities inhabited by our rebels. It would be fully as good as an army.

Before the small-pox broke out at Detroit, 40 persons died belonging to the village of the Stags, and almost as many at the Poutéatamis.

Kinousaki is likewise dead. We lose a chief who was, apparently, much attached to the French.

M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron has been again told that the remainder of the fugitive Hurons will retire to Detroit this spring. The contagious disease will contribute a great deal to their return.

You are fully informed, my Lord, by the detail that I have just had the honor to submit to you :

1st That the expedition which M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron was ordered to get up, did not take place.

2nd That the promises the Indians had made to the late M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière were feigned, and that they are more in favor of our rebels than of us.

3<sup>d</sup> That the attack of the Nepissings has only rendered our rebels more dangerous.

4th That the Miamis have scalped two soldiers.

5th That the Pianguichias have killed 7 Frenchmen and two slaves.

6th That the same Nation had, shortly before, killed another Frenchman and two slaves.

7th That, according to what has been stated to M. de Joncaire, the Flatheads have scalped three Frenchmen and taken a 4th, whom they delivered to the English with said scalps.

8th That we are menaced with a general conspiracy.

9th That we must fear even for Tbronto.

10th That the English are the indirect authors of the murder of the French.

11th That famine at Detroit and its dependencies is quasi certain.

12th That small-pox is ravaging the whole of that Continent.

You perceive, my Lord, the sorrowful condition of the entire of that Upper Country. I am invested, by the death of the Marquis de la Jonquière, with the government of Canada, under very unfortunate circumstances. I lay before your eyes the blood of the French of that Colony, of which you are the powerful protector. My zeal, my fidelity for the King's service, and the love I feel for my country combine to inspire me with just sentiments of vengeance; everything urges me not to defer it, and to make our enemies feel his Majesty's power. But I have thoroughly searched for solid means to second my wishes. Though I overcome, at first, certain obstacles, I am always met by the insufficiency of provisions, canoes and time, which prevents me guaranteeing that I shall make peace succeed the most vigorous war.

This I shall undertake next year to do, with as much prudence and firmness as I dare flatter myself with.

I do not lose sight, my Lord, of what you have prescribed to the late M. de la Jonquière,<sup>1</sup> in your letter of the 27th of August, which reached him only in the beginning of winter. I owe it to the memory of that General, who had no other object than to reëstablish good order in the countries which cause us so much trouble [to bear witness] that everything that has been written against him is the work of calumny, which is the sole talent of certain evil spirits of this country, whom I beg you, my Lord, to visit with the punishment due to their audacity.

It is notorious that M<sup>r</sup> de la Salle took possession of the Beautiful river in the King's name, <sup>1</sup> JACQUES PIERRE DE TAFFANEL, Marquis de la Jonquière, was born in 1686, at La Jonquière, a small country seat in Languedoc, France. The family was, originally, from Catalonia. He entered the Navy in 1698; was in the expeditions in favor of Philip V., of Spain, and Adjutant in the army, in 1703; was taken prisoner, near Barcelona, in 1706; served at the siege of Toulon in 1707, and in the expedition to Rio Janeiro in 1711; was created Knight of St. Louis, and appointed Captain of an Independent company in 1731; Captain in the Navy in 1736; Inspector of Marine in 1741, and in 1744 was flag-officer of Vice-Admiral de Court, when he engaged Admiral Matthews; accompanied the Duke d'Anville's fleet in 1746, and in 1747 was appointed Governor of Canada, but was taken prisoner by the British on the 3d May, on his way to that country, where, consequently, he did not arrive until 2d September, 1749. He was tall in stature, well made, and of an imposing figure, excessively brave, but he tarnished his reputation by his avarice, which embittered his last hours. For though worth millions, during his last illness he ordered the wax tapers that were burning in his room to be changed to tallow candles, observing that the latter would answer every purpose and were less expensive. He died at Quebec, 17th May, 1752, in the 67th year of his age, and was buried in the church of the Recollects. Collections of the Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, p. 24; Smith's Canada, I., 223. — Ed.

at the time of the discovery of the Mississippi; that his Majesty's property of it cannot be validly questioned; that we are clearly authorized not to suffer any European strangers to undertake resorting thither, and that hereupon depends the free communication by that river between this Colony and Louisiana.

I likewise know that 'tis not the Indians who carry on the contraband trade; that 'tis not they who desire to establish posts on our lands, and that 'tis not against them that there would be any question of acting, since we do not seek to embarrass them in their trade, and leave them free to settle wherever they please.

In fine, experience teaches us but too well, that the English look with eyes of concupiscence both on the lands of the Beautiful river, and generally on all that vast country; that they are the fomenters of the rebellion of the nations who, from all time, have been loyal to us, and who, at their instigation only, have been led to the extreme of killing our Frenchmen.

No remedy for our evils would have been more effectual than to drive the English from our lands, and no other course would remain to be taken to insure its success than to send a sufficient force to Detroit and the Beautiful river, to adopt all possible precautions to protect the French from the fury of the Indians and to guarantee their effects against pillage. My first object is in every point of view interesting, and if not accomplished, 'twill not be for want of foresight on my part.

I shall dispatch this summer 400 Canadians, under the command of Chevalier de Longueuil, to Detroit, to proceed thence to winter at the other posts nearest our enemies. Next spring I shall send off five or six hundred Canadians to form a junction with the former at the rendezvous to be designated by M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil. I shall transmit to him, then, my orders which I regulate according to his experience, and the accounts he will send me during the winter. I could not be beforehand with my orders, because our affairs will possibly change from one moment to another.

I shall not employ any Indians on this expedition, unless they offer to follow the French, to aid them in looking up the bones of their brethren.

Should Chevalier de Longueuil's mission be as successful as he and I dare hope, the Upper country will be free, and the French able to trade there in all surety. The Indian nations will return to their attachment to us, and then I shall have it in my power to adopt measures to oblige the English to disburse. But I must have the honor to observe to you, my Lord, that however fortunate this expedition may be, and whatever foresight I may have in closing the road on the English, their avidity will lead them to surmount all risks, and the Indians are capable, besides, of making by-roads to escape my vigilance.

My Lord, it would therefore be of infinite importance to limit the possessions of the English, and that the boundaries of the two extremities of this Colony should be so firmly regulated that the English could not find any pretext to trouble us in our territory. I am persuaded that the capture of the four English traders by M<sup>r</sup> de Celoron, and the letter M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière had the honor to write you on the 16th of 7<sup>ber</sup> will not have contributed a little to accelerate the labors of the Commissioners. The tranquillity of this Colony depends on their decision.

I am with most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and most

Conference of Captain Phineas Stevens with the St. Francis Indians.

Propositions of the Abenakis of St. Francis to Captain Phineas Stevens, delegate from the Governor of Boston, in presence of the Baron de Longueuil, Governor of Montreal, Commandant of Canada and of the Iroquois of the Sault Saint Louis and of the Lake of the Two Mountains, 5th of July, 1752.

Atiwaneto, Chief Speaker.

Brother, We speak to you as if we spoke to your Governor of Boston.

We hear on all sides that this Governor and the Bostonians say that the Abenakis are bad people. 'Tis in vain that we are taxed with having a bad heart; it is you, brother, that always attack us; your mouth is of sugar but your heart of gall; in truth, the moment you begin we are on our guard.

Brothers, We tell you that we seek not war, we ask nothing better than to be quiet, and it depends, Brothers, only on you English, to have peace with us.

3.

We have not yet sold the lands we inhabit, we wish to keep the possession of them. Our elders have been willing to tolerate you, brothers Englishmen, on the seaboard as far as Sawakwato; as that has been so decided, we wish it to be so.

4.

But we will not cede one single inch of the lands we inhabit beyond what has been decided formerly by our fathers.

5.

You have the sea for your share from the place where you reside; you can trade there; but we expressly forbid you to kill a single Beaver, or to take a single stick of timber on the lands we inhabit; if you want timber we'll sell you some, but you shall not take it without our permission.

6.

Brothers, Who hath authorized you to have those lands surveyed? We request our brother, the Governor of Boston, to have these Surveyors punished, as we cannot imagine that they have acted by his authority.

7.

Brother, You are therefore masters of the peace that we are to have with you; on condition that you will not encroach on those lands we will be at peace, as the King of France is with the King of Great Britain.

8.

By a Belt.

I repeat to you, Brothers, by this Belt, that it depends on yourselves to be at peace with the Abenakis.

9.

Our Father who is here present has nothing to do with what we say to you ; we speak to you of our own accord, and in the name of all our allies ; we regard our Father, in this instance, only as a witness of our words.

10.

We acknowledge no other boundaries of yours than your settlements whereon you have built, and we will not, under any pretext whatsoever, that you pass beyond them. The lands we possess have been given us by the Master of Life. We acknowledge to hold only from him.

11.

We are entirely free ; we are allies of the King of France, from whom we have received the Faith and all sorts of assistance in our necessities ; we love that Monarch, and we are strongly attached to his interests.

12.

Let us have an answer to the propositions we address you, as soon as possible ; take this message in writing to give to your Governor ; we, also, shall keep a copy of it to use in case of need.

Without stirring a step it is easy for your Governor to transmit his answer to us ; he will have merely to address it to our Father who will have the goodness to send it to us.

Brothers, I shall report your Message to my Governor, and in order that it may not suffer any alteration I shall take it in writing. He will transmit his answer to the Baron de Longueuil as you desire.

The English demand of the Abenakis.

Brothers Abenakis, I ask you if the attack which your Nation has made these two yaars, on the English is in consequence of encroachments by the later on your lands ?

2.

Are you satisfied with the death of your people on account of your attacks on the English ?

3.

I know that it is not permitted to go on your lands ; those who have been there are young fools, without any character.

The Answer of the Abenakis.

Brothers, When peace was concluded we hoped to enjoy it, like the French, but we learned at the same time, that you, English, had killed one of our people, and had hid him under the ice.

We asked you wherefore you killed us? You answered that you would give us satisfaction, but your ill-will having been sensibly indicated by your inaction, pending seven months, we resolved to avenge ourselves, and to pull down one house.

Since then we have missed one man and one woman belonging to our village; we learned their sad fate only from an Englishwoman, who is at present at our place, who assured us that that man and woman were killed in her presence by Englishmen, and in order to afford us a convincing proof thereof, she gave us a bag which we perfectly recognized as having belonged to those unfortunate people. We felt, as we ought to do, this murder, and avenged it last year.

The two Englishmen that we killed this year on the head waters of our river, and the two others that we have taken prisoners, must attribute their misfortunes to themselves, because they hunted Beaver on our lands, and on this point we repeat to you, with all the firmness we are capable of, that we will kill all the Englishmen we shall find on the lands in our possession.

Our heart is good, and since we struck the blow our thirst for vengeance is extinguished.

3.

Listen, Brothers Englishmen, to what is our Indian custom among ourselves, with persons we would find on the lands we possess; we should take their game, and if they made any resistance, we would knock them on the head.

How can you suppose, Brothers, that we should suffer you on those lands?

You have only to excite fear in your houses. We are not capable of offering the least insult, but should any of you be found on our lands, they shall die.

The Iroquois to the Abenakis.

We have heard, with pleasure, what you said to the English deputy; we are charmed that you have vigorously maintained your rights. We exhort you to keep your word with the English; should the case require it, we oblige ourselves to aid you with all our might.

We, Pierre Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout the entire of New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, Certify that the present transcript is conformable to the original remaining in our Secretary's office; in testimony whereof we have signed these presents, caused the same to be sealed with the seal of our Arms and to be countersigned by your Secretary.

Done at Montreal the 15th of February, 1758.

Signature of the

MARQUIS DE VAUDREUIL.

By my Lord,

SAINT SAUVEUR.

M. Duquesne to M. de Rouillé.

My Lord,

I have the honor to inform you that I have been obliged to alter the arrangements I had made, whereof I rendered you an account last fall.

You will see, my Lord, by the extract of the Journal, hereunto annexed, the reasons which compelled me to reduce, to almost one-half, the van-guard that I had informed you consisted of 400 men, and those that determined me to prefer landing the troops at the harbor of Presqu'isle,<sup>1</sup> on Lake Erie, which I, very fortunately, discovered, instead of at Chatacouit,<sup>2</sup> where, I informed you, I would begin my posts.

This discovery is so much the more propitious as 'tis a harbor which the largest barks can enter, loaded, and be in perfect safety. I am informed that the beach, the soil and the resources, of all sorts, were the same as represented to me.

The plan I send you of this place is only a rough sketch until it be corrected. I have given orders that this be proceeded with.

The letter I received on the 12th of January last from M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire, has obliged me to proceed to force to obtain provisions from the farmers to enable me to oppose the projects of the English, who, he advised me, had sent smiths to Chinengué<sup>3</sup> and the River au Bœuf,<sup>4</sup> where they were even settled, and that there was a terrible excitement among the Indians, who looked upon it as certain that the English would be firmly settled there in the course of this year, not imagining that my forces were capable of opposing them. This fear which made me attempt the impossible, has had, hitherto, the most complete success; all the provisions have arrived from without, after a delay of fifteen days, and I had them transported, with all imaginable diligence, into a country so full of difficulties, in consequence of the great number of voyageurs which I required to ascend the rapids, the race of which is getting scarce.

I was not long without perceiving that this movement made a considerable impression on the Indians, and what has thrown more consternation among them is, that I had not recourse to them, for I contented myself with telling our domiciliated tribes that if there were eight or ten from each village who had the curiosity to witness my operations, I would permit them to follow Sieur Marin, the commander of the detachment, whom they were well acquainted with, and in whom they have confidence; of two hundred whom I proposed to send forward, only 70 are sufficient for scouts and hunters.

All the nations that came down to see me from the Upper country, and who met the multitude of bateaux and canoes which were conveying the men and effects belonging to the detachment, presented themselves all trembling before me, and told me that they were aware of my power by the swarm of men they had passed, and [begged me] to have pity on them, their wives and their children. I took advantage of their terror to speak to them in a tone firm and menacing the first that would falter, and instead of a month or five weeks that they were accustomed to remain here consuming the King's provisions, I got rid of them on the fourth day.

It appears, up to this time, that the execution of the plan of my enterprise makes so strong an impression on the Nations that all the vagabonds who had taken refuge on the Beautiful river have returned to their villages.

I keep the Five Nations much embarrassed, because they have not come down to Montreal, and the only step they have taken has been to send the Ladies (Dames) of their Council to Sieur Marin, to inquire of him, by a Belt, whether he was marching with the hatchet uplifted, or to establish tranquillity. This Commander answered them, that when he marched with the hatchet, he bore it aloft, in order that no person should be ignorant of the fact, but as for the present, his orders were to use it only in case he encountered opposition to my will; that my intention was to support and assist them in their necessities, and to drive away the evil spirits that encompassed them and disturbed the earth.

I was aware that the English of Philadelphia had invited them to a General Council, and that they had refused to attend it; further, I knew from a man worthy of credit, who happened to be among these Indians when the English arrived, that they have rejected the Belts which had been offered them to oppose the entrance of the King's troops into the River Oyo, since they had sold it to the English. They answered that they would not meddle with my affairs, and that they would look quietly on, from their mats, persuaded, as they were, that my proceedings had no other object than to give a clear sky to a country which served as a refuge for assassins who had reddened the ground with blood.

This Nation, which possesses a superior government to all others, allowed itself to be dazzled by continual presents, and did not perceive that the English are hemming it in, so that if it do not shake off this yoke, 'twill soon be enslaved. I shall lead them to make this reflection, in order to induce them to pull down Choueguen, which is destroying them, and will be the ruin of the Colony.

Should we have had to use reprisals, I would soon have taken that post. I have already forwarded to Fort Frontenac, the artillery and everything necessary for this coup de main.

Sieur Marin writes me on the 3rd instant, that the fort at Presqu'isle is entirely finished; that the Portage road, which is six leagues in length, is also ready for carriages; that the store which was necessary to be built half way across this Portage is in a condition to receive the supplies, and that the second fort, which is located at the mouth (entrée) of the River au Bœuf, will be soon completed.

This Commandant informs me, moreover, that he is having some pirogues constructed, whilst men are actively employed in transporting his stores, and he tells me that all the Delawares (Loups), Chaouanons and Senecas on the Beautiful river had come to meet him, and that he had so well [received] them, that they are very zealously assisting, with their horses that they have brought along with them, in making the Portage.

There has not been, up to the present time, the least impediment to the considerable movements I have caused to be made; everything arrived at its destination with greater celerity than I anticipated, and among the prodigious number of bateaux or canoes that have passed the rapids, only one has upset, drowning seven men.

As it is impossible, in a moment as vast as it was precipitous for this country, that some of the provisions should not be spoiled in open craft, despite all the precautions that could be taken, I have sent on as much as was necessary to repair the loss.

Everything announces, my Lord, the successful execution of my project, unless some unforeseen accident have occurred, and the only anxiety I feel is, that the River au Bœuf

Portage will delay the entrance of our troops into the Beautiful river, as it is long, and there is considerable to carry, and the horses I have sent thither have arrived there exhausted by fatigue. But I hope this will be obviated by those the Indians have brought thither, and that the mildness of the climate will admit of the completion of the posts.

The extreme boldness with which I have executed a project of so much importance, has caused me the liveliest inquietude; the famine which met me on my arrival at Quebec, having reduced me to forwarding only 900 barrels of flour, as the whole supply.

From the knowledge I have acquired this winter, I would have composed my van-guard of 700 men, had I had an entrepôt of provisions at Niagara, because that body of men would have assuredly advanced to the Portage which I was desirous of occupying, having to fear some opposition on the part of the Indians of the Beautiful river, at the instigation of the English, my plan having been discovered and bruited abroad since M<sup>r</sup> de la Jonquière's death, in consequence of the explorations that I caused to be made by some bark canoes, notwithstanding the color I wished to give to these movements.

I leave you to judge, my Lord, the trouble of mind I felt at the reduction of this van-guard to 250 men, which I was obliged to send like, what is called in the army, a forlorn hope, when dispatched to explore a work; on the other hand, I should proceed at a snail's pace (me mettre à la tortue) could I continue my operations only with the assistance derived from the sea, the inconveniences of which I understood.

In fine, my Lord, if there be any merit in doing everything contrary to the prudence of a person of my age, who has not the reputation of being devoid of that virtue, the enterprise in question would be entitled to very great [credit], but necessity having constrained me to it, I do not adopt it, and attribute its success only to singular good fortune which I would not, for all the world, tempt again.

The discovery I have made of the harbor of Presqu'isle, which is regarded as the finest spot in nature, has determined me to send a Royal assistant pilot to search around the Niagara rapids for some place where a bark could remain to take in its load. Nothing would be of greater advantage in the saving of transport and the security of the property of the new posts and of Detroit, but it is necessary to find a good bottom, so that the anchors may hold, for it could safely winter at Presqu'isle, where it would be as it were in a box. I impatiently await the return of this pilot, and I would be much flattered could I be able to announce to you in my latest despatches, that I have ordered the construction of this vessel.

I must not leave you ignorant, my Lord, how much I am pleased with Sieur Marin, the commander of the detachment, and with Major Péan. The former, who has an experienced capacity, manages the Indians as he pleases, and he has, at his age, the same zeal and activity as any young officer that may enter the service. The second is endowed with all the talent imaginable for detail and resources, and knows no other occupation than that of accomplishing the object he is entrusted with. He alone had charge of dispatching all the canoes and bateaux, and acquitted himself of that duty with great order. Chevalier Le Mercier, to whom I assigned the duties of engineer, and who is also entrusted with the distribution of the provisions, is an officer possessing the rarest talent. Sieur Marin expresses himself to me in the highest terms of all those who are under his orders, and who vie with each other in diligence.

I am with the most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,

Montreal, 20th August, 1753.

DUQUESNE.

Governor Dinwiddie to M. de St. Pierre.

Sir,

The lands upon the River Ohio, in the western parts of the Colony of Virginia, are so notoriously known to be the property of the Crown of Great Britain that it is a matter of equal concern and surprise to me, to hear that a body of French forces are erecting fortresses and making settlements upon that river, within his Majesty's dominions. The many and repeated complaints I have received of these acts of hostility lay me under the necessity of sending, in the name of the King, my master, the bearer hereof, George Washington, Esq., one of the Adjutants-General of the forces of this dominion, to complain to you of the encroachments thus made, and of the injuries done to the subjects of Great Britain, in violation of the law of nations, and the treaties now subsisting between the two Crowns. If these facts be true, and you think fit to justify your proceedings, I must desire you to acquaint me by whose authority and instructions you have lately marched from Canada with an armed force, and invaded the King of Great Britain's territories, in the manner complained of; that according to the purport and resolution of your answer, I may act agreeably to the commission I am honored with, from the King, my master. However, sir, in obedience to my instructions, it becomes my duty to require your peaceable departure; and that you would forbear prosecuting a purpose so interruptive of the harmony and good understanding, which his Majesty is desirous to continue and cultivate with the most Christian King, &c.

M. de St. Pierre to Governor Dinwiddie.

[Pennsylvania Colonial Records, V., 715.]

Sir,

As I have the honor of commanding here in chief, Mr. Washington delivered to me the letter, which you wrote to the commander of the French troops. I should have been glad that you had given him orders, or that he had been inclined, to proceed to Canada to see our General, to whom it better belongs, than to me, to set forth the evidence and the reality of the rights of the King, my master, to the lands situate along the River Ohio, and to contest the pretensions of the King of Great Britain thereto. I shall transmit your letter to the Marquis du Quesne. His answer will be a law to me. And if he shall order me to communicate it to you, Sir, you may be assured I shall not fail to dispatch it forthwith to you. As to the summons you send me to retire, I do not think myself obliged to obey it. Whatever may be your instructions I am here by virtue of the orders of my General; and I entreat you, Sir, not to doubt one moment but that I am determined to conform myself to them with all the exactness and resolution which can be expected from the best officer. I do not know that in the progress of this campaign anything has passed which can be reputed an act of hostility, or that is contrary to the treaties which subsist between the two Crowns; the continuation whereof interests and pleases us as much as it does the English. Had you been pleased, Sir, to have descended to particularize the facts, which occasioned your complaint, I should have had the honor of answering you in the fullest, and, I am persuaded, the most satisfactory manner, &c.

Count Christiani's writings, though not clothed with authenticity, do not the less merit the most serious attention. There is no doubt but that Minister is informed of the designs of their I. M., and the papers he has just given, shed such strong light on the views of the Courts of Vienna and London to renew the war, that by connecting them with all that has hitherto transpired on the subject, it is not difficult to penetrate them entirely.

From this connection, it results that the two Courts, having discovered, in the last war, that France was one of the greatest obstacles to the superiority they wished to arrogate, the one on land and the other at sea, and that alone they could not destroy her, have adopted the system of ruining her through her allies, either by detaching them from her, or by oppressing, if they could not detach, them. With this design, in order to save themselves from the reproach of having infringed the peace reestablished by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, and to gain time to make their arrangements quietly, they have concluded on having Russia commence the execution of their project in the North and in Germany, and the Emperor in Italy, because these powers not having been parties to the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, no engagements can be pleaded against them. Both the Courts of Vienna and London fully expect that they will be called on, as contracting parties to this treaty, to endeavor to arrest the enterprises of the other two; but they will answer, in regard to Russia, that they are not masters of their allies, and in regard to the Emperor, that his I. M. only exercises the rights of the Empire which were confided to him agreeably to the capitulation he has sworn to, especially as relates to the Italian fiefs, and that as the Emperor and the Empire have made no engagements contrary thereto, they cannot be prevented exercising their rights in all their extent; but that, notwithstanding, they will, willingly, employ their influence with these two powers to reconcile them if possible. The two Courts, under the specious mask of these peaceable dispositions, will endeavor to blind Europe and to lull the vigilance of France; the Russians will, during that time, continue their intrigues against the King of Prussia, and the Emperor, his against the Republic of Genoa; the Infanta Don Philip will be placed in check, and the said Courts will take their measures to openly join his friends, and accomplish the object of their project, as soon as they will believe themselves in a position to do so with impunity, a period which does not seem very remote, and which everything indicates to be shortly after the election of the King of the Romans, and the election of the new British Parliament.

The fullest evidence exists that such is the project of the Courts of Vienna and England, and it seems, by the dispositions of the Russians and of the Imperial Court, that it already begins to be put in execution both in Germany and in Italy, where, assuredly, the place of Imperial Commissioner has not been given to the Marquis Botta with a view to keep up a good understanding with Genoa.

From the whole of this exposé it follows that there is not a moment to be lost in order to oppose the progress of the enemies of the public tranquillity. The first step to be taken appears to be, to denounce to Spain the views of the Courts of Vienna and of London, confirmed by Count Christiani's memoirs, to enlighten them as to the dangers the Infanta, Italy and herself run. It is a settled principle that if France is to behold her ruin in that of her allies, Spain must see hers in that of France, for it is only by putting it out of the power of the latter to succor the former, that England can hope to achieve its plans of aggrandizement in America. It is to be hoped that these reasons will lead the Court of Madrid to adopt measures in concert with France to avert the danger. There remain no defenders for Europe except the King and the King of Spain, and on their combined foresight rests the safety of their Empire and that of the entire of Europe.

M. Varin to M. Bigot.

Montreal, the 24th July, 1754.

M. l'Intendant,

I have the honor to inform you that M<sup>r</sup> du Sablé has just arrived from the Beautiful river, where the English, to the number of 500, surrendered by capitulation on the 3rd or 4th of this month, to M. de Villiers, seconded by M<sup>r</sup> Le Mercier, after an engagement of 10 hours, although they were in a fort covered by an intrenchment, with 9 pieces of cannon. The capitulation, whereof a copy is hereunto annexed, will show you the glory our Canadians have acquired on that day, and the humanity with which the English have been treated. We lost on that day 2 Canadians [one] of whom [was] Sieur Desprez' oldest son, and have had 70 wounded, the majority of them slightly; of these, two are Indians. M<sup>r</sup> Péan's Panis has been also killed. The English, on their side, have had 80 or 90 men killed or mortally wounded. M<sup>r</sup> le Mercier has had their 9 pieces of cannon broken, and the English, who took to their heels after the capitulation, have abandoned even their flag. M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers had 700 men with him, 600 of whom were French, and 100 Indians, who attacked Fort Necessity<sup>1</sup> in broad day; he discovered, despite the fire of the enemy, who had at first come out of their fort, [that] they had formed themselves in the order of battle to meet M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers, whose first fire, however, they did not wait before they wheeled back under their intrenchment. Fire has been set to all the buildings in that fort, as well as to some houses at this side of it, and to a large storehouse constructed to serve as a dépôt, within 10 leagues or thereabouts of Fort du Quesne. There is reason to believe that this action will disgust the English with the Beautiful river, and that the defeat they have just experienced for the second time, will entirely disgust the Indians with taking any manner of part with them. You judge correctly, Sir, that this brilliant news has greatly pleased the General, and I am persuaded it will no less gratify you.

M<sup>r</sup> Péan is gradually improving, and I believe is to make his circuit by way of Detroit and Missilimakinac, now that all is peace and quietness on the Beautiful river. M<sup>r</sup> le Mercier states that he was about starting with the detachment to join M<sup>r</sup> Péan at Presq'Isle and make the circuit. The General originally intended to send orders to them to form a junction, but on reflecting that his messenger would not arrive in time, he has detained him for some days, being pleased, in other respects, that the Detroit and Missilimakinak Nations should see the conquerors of the English, and he forthwith set about dispatching Trudel to take these good news to you.

I have the honor to be with inviolable attachment and infinite respect, Sir,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,

On the 3<sup>d</sup> of July, at break of day, I prepared to depart from the camp abandoned by the English. I invited the Indians to provide some scouts. The weather was inclining to rain, but I foresaw the necessity of anticipating the enemy in the works he might construct. I even flattered myself that he would be less on his guard in such bad weather.

The Nepissings and Algonquins did not wish to proceed; I told them they could remain; I set out with the other Nations, which made the former so much ashamed that they all joined me except two. Before marching, two of my first scouts came to me and told me that they had taken three prisoners, who were coming from the Chouanons, and that they had left them at the storehouse. This fact was confirmed by the letter of the sergeant whom I had left there with twenty men. We marched the entire day in the rain, and I sent scouts after scouts. I halted at the place where my brother<sup>2</sup> had been assassinated, and saw some dead bodies there yet.

When I came to about  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a league from the English fort, I ordered each officer to march in column, that I might be better able to dispose of them as necessity would require.

<sup>1</sup> FRANÇOIS VICTOR VARIN was a Frenchman of very low origin; some say the son of a shoemaker, others, of a schoolmaster. He was vain, lying, arrogant and the most capricious and obstinate of men—small in stature, nothing imposing in his physiognomy, licentious and a libertine in his habits, which frequently led him into scrapes. He possessed, however, a good deal of smartness; understood finance perfectly and was industrious; sought, like others, the way to enrich himself, and retained whatever he could get. He had the supplying of all the Western posts. Associated with others, he monopolized everything, fitted out canoes, built a large storehouse, which was carefully furnished with whatever was wanting in the King's stores, for which they charged their own price. Means were also found to furnish the same article several times to the government, and always at an advance. As Varin was the Commissary at Montreal, his orders were arranged accordingly. The people, who clearly perceived the object of this new store, called it in derision La Friponne, or, The Swindle. Collections of the Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, pp. 67-69. — Ep.

I sent scouts out as far as the camp, 20 men to sustain them, and I advanced in order, when I was informed that we were discovered; that the English were approaching in the line of battle to attack us, and hard by; I ordered my men to form themselves in a suitable manner for a bush fight. It was not long before I discovered that my scouts had misled me, and I ordered the troops to advance on that side where we might be attacked. As we had no knowledge of the locality, we presented our flank to the fort, whence they began to fire cannon on us; almost at the same time I perceived the English on the right coming in order of battle against us. The Indians, as well as we, set up a great shout and advanced towards them, but they did not give us time to fire before they wheeled into an intrenchment adjoining their fort, which we, then, prepared to invest; it was situated advantageously enough in a meadow, within a musket shot of the wood. We drew as near them as possible, that we might not expose his Majesty's subjects to no purpose.

The fire was very brisk on both sides, and I selected that place which appeared to me the best to resist a sortie. We succeeded in silencing (so to say) the fire of their cannon with our musketry. 'Tis true, the ardor and zeal of our Canadians and soldiers made me uneasy, because I saw that in a short time we should perhaps be out of ammunition. M<sup>r</sup> le Mercier proposed to me to have fascines constructed to secure our posts, and hem in the English, during the night, in their fort, and wholly prevent them leaving it. I ordered M<sup>r</sup> de Bayeul to go and collect as many men as possible to succor the quarter that would be attacked in case of a general sortie. We took during that time some caches of provisions, ammunition and goods which circumstance encouraged the Indians and the Militia.

The enemy's fire increased towards six o'clock in the evening with more vigor than ever, and lasted until eight. As we were all the day under the rain, and as the detachment was tired and the Indians sent me word that they would depart next day, etc., a cessation of hostilities was proposed to the English, and a captain came to speak to us. The conditions of the capitulation were accepted. (They are annexed.)

The English have had 70 @ 80 men killed or mortally wounded, and many others slightly.

The Canadians have had 2 men killed, Desprez, Junior, and the Panis, belonging to M<sup>r</sup> Péan, and 70 wounded, two whereof are Indians.<sup>1</sup>

M. Duquesne to M. de Machault.<sup>2</sup>

My Lord,

I have the honor to report to you what has occurred at the posts during the year.

<sup>2</sup> JEAN BAPTISTE MACHAULT of Arnouville, was born 13th December, 1701. He became President of the Grand Council in 1738; Intendant of Haut in 1743, and in 1745, Comptroller-General of the finances. On 9th December, 1750, he received the additional appointment of Keeper of the Seals; he succeeded M. Rouillé 28th July, 1754, in the Colonial department, and organized the fleet which defeated Admiral Byng. Through the intrigues of Mme. Pompadour, he was sent, 31st January, 1757, into exile with Count d'Argenson (supra, p. 29), where he remained until the fall of the Bastille. In 1792, he removed to Rouen, whence he was taken in 1794, by the agents of the Revolutionary Government, and lodged, as a person suspected, in the prison of Madelonettes, where he died on the 13th July of the same year, in the 93d year of his age, without being permitted, by his inhuman jailers, even the assistance of a physician. Biographie Universelle. The French post at the mouth of French creek, Pennsylvania, was called, in his honor, Fort Machault. — Ed.

The Indians of the North are very quiet because Sieur Marin, who commands at The Bay and leads the Indians at will, has procured repose for them by the peace he has caused to be concluded with the Christinaux.

The Sauteux of Camanestigwia and Michipicoton have had a difficulty among themselves. Seventeen of them have been killed, but this animosity, which is at present abated, has been prejudicial only to the hunting, and they are now quiet.

Chevalier de Repentigny, who commands at the Sault St. Mary, is busily engaged with the settlement of his post, which is essential for stopping all the Indians who come down from Lake Superior to go to Choueguen, but I do not hear it said that this post yields a great revenue.

The Poutwatamis, Kickapoux, Maskoutins and Scioux of the prairies, have assembled together to go and destroy the Peorias, who, for a long time, regard with insolence the other Indians; they are, moreover, people of no faith, who steal, with impunity, even in their neighbors' cabins.

This war, in which I am not at all interested, can be productive only of a good effect in putting down such banditti; I have, nevertheless, ordered the Commandants to adjust all matters after these rascals will have received a sharp lesson.

As I had fixed for the Peanguichias to be at the Miamis where Sieur Péan would pass, and as those Indians have waited for that officer with all possible patience, nearly a month, evincing great repentance for their fault, I have ordered the Commandant of the Wyatanons, whither that nation had retired, to grant them pardon on condition that they would bring me, next year, the murderers; by this means it may be calculated that these Indians have at present submitted.

The Cherakis, who, for a year, had a French prisoner in their village, whom they treated very civilly, have sent him back to M<sup>r</sup> de Kerlerec, saying to him, if you are grateful for the good treatment we have shown you, go tell our Father that we are desirous of having a firm peace with him, and you will come and bring us back his answer.

M<sup>r</sup> de Kerlerec, who feared that reasons of policy did not permit the acceptance of this peace, demanded my authority to conclude it, if I thought it proper; I consented because none of our Indians go to fight the Cherakis, but really the Flatheads and Techichas, whom it is necessary to reserve in order to have a bone to gnaw. This Governor advises me that it is a consequence of my movements and that all his Indians are enchantingly docile.

M. Macarty sent me word that it would be necessary, after this peace, to build a fort at the mouth of the Cherakis river,<sup>1</sup> which falls into the lower part of the Oyo, but I have answered him, that though I should judge it very necessary, the state of the King's finances could not meet that increased expense.

Abbé Piquet's mission, reputed by our domiciliated Indians to be made up of spies of the Five Nations, has just given the strongest proofs of attachment and fidelity, by sending me the medals the English had presented to some of that village who had furtively assisted at the Council at Orange, and they have expelled one of their brethren who was suspected of having an English heart. This mission is improving, and the Abbé Piquet's presence can only increase their good dispositions.

Acadia is a gulf of indispensable expense, and the Abbé Leloutre has taken the axe in hand for the aboiteaux,<sup>2</sup> which must render it very fertile, but the Fort at Point Beausejour is hardly in a state of defence, inasmuch as the settlers who work at it are incredibly lazy. Sieur de Verger, the Commandant there, does his best to encourage them at this work, which is important under actual circumstances; this officer informs me that a fleet of four ships has arrived at Halifax, and that another of a like number is expected; this appears to me to be an indication that Old England proposes something on that side, for the English are bringing considerable people there.

It seems to me that by the census of the Island of St. John, which has been sent me by Sieur de Bonaventure, formerly Commandant there, that place is going to be considerable, if the harvest has been good; it would in that case be the granary of Louisbourg and of Acadia.

I never thought of establishing a post at Peskadamokauti before having received your orders, especially since Father Germain has assured me that not a farmer could be placed there, inasmuch as it is all rock. I have, meanwhile, informed Sieur de Boishebert, who commands at the River St. John, to repair thither whenever he can, in order to have a correct draught of it, and I expect that officer will render me an exact account thereof.

Agreeably to your orders, I have sent Sieur Pellegrin to the Seven Islands; from the plan he has drawn of the place I have remarked that it would take at least two batteries to prevent any of the enemy's ships anchoring there, which would cost an immense sum, not only for their construction but also for the maintenance of the garrisons, because the soil there is good for nothing. 'Tis true that the anchorage is excellent.

I am with most profound respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

most obedient servant,

Quebec, the 13th 8<sup>ber</sup>, 1754.

DUQUESNE.

M. Duquesne to M. de Machault.

Quebec, 25th October, 1754.

My Lord,

I have received the letter you did me the honor to write me on the 19th of August last, which reached me on the 22nd instant, wherein you are pleased to inform me of the views the King of England has manifested up to the present time, for the maintenance of peace, and that you presume he has not authorized the movements on the River Oyo.

Without referring you, my Lord, to all that I have had the honor to submit to you in my last despatches, I have to observe to you, in addition, that it is not possible that the King of Great Britain has not consented to and even ordered all the movements which the English are making on this Continent, and the consequences thereof appear to me very just.

1st The Governors of New England, besides being independent one of the other, cannot levy troops without an order of the King of Great Britain, and you will have observed by Mr Washington's Journal that all the Provinces have furnished a quota to his detachment. I know, moreover, that the Quakers, who never make war, have also furnished their contingent.

2nd Sieur Drouillon, an officer who was with Sieur de Jumonville's detachment, has been taken by this same M<sup>r</sup> Washington as a prisoner of war, as you will also see by his Journal.

3<sup>d</sup> The irruption made by M<sup>r</sup> Shirley, Governor of Boston, who has marched with a body of troops of 700 men to seize the upper part of the River Narantchouac where he has had a fort built, without waiting for the determination of the boundaries, as I have had the honor to inform you.

4th The Governor of Halifax has proclaimed throughout Acadia that every Acadian who will be taken with arms in his hands against them, shall be hanged.

5th The solemn congress held at Orange in the month of July by seven Governors, to persuade the Nations they had invited thither to attack us.

After the assassination of M. de Jumonville and the above consequent proofs, do you believe, my Lord, that I am authorized to anticipate a rupture on the part of the English? but it is easy to perceive, that before arriving at that point, they wish to gain over our domiciliated Indians, since they employ all sorts of artifices to corrupt them, and do not disdain even the most unworthy means to effect their object.

On the other hand, I remark that the English, who have observed my cautious conduct, take advantage of it to encroach on our lands; and I will confess to you, my Lord, that my position, as critical as it is disagreeable, in consequence of the prudence I have to observe, so as not to occasion a rupture, induces them to make attempts to push on to the neighborhood of Quebec.

You will see, my Lord, by the reports I have already submitted, how cautious I have been in my conduct, and I defy the English to complain that I have given the least interruption to the good understanding which is so strongly recommended to me, but it is evident that the Governors of New England have not the same orders, or do not execute them, inasmuch as they have violated the most sacred laws, and think only of usurpations.

As for the expense, which concerns me, I am unceasingly occupied in diminishing it, but troops cannot be moved here without great cost.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DUQUESNE.

M. Duquesne to M. de Machault.

My Lord,

The Indians of the Five Nations, whom I have had the honor to announce to you, have at length arrived at Montreal, but they have been careful to prolong their voyage, in order to avoid meeting me, being aware that it is indispensable that the Governor repair to Quebec either for the autumn despatches, or to wind up the affairs of the Colony, which accumulate at that season.

Vol. X.

You will see, my Lord, by my answer to their propositions, that I do not spare them, and that I reproach them not only with their infamous treason, but threaten, moreover, to punish them, if they do not soon recall the dogs of their village, whom they have unleashed to bite me.

The Canadians, who have always observed towards these Five Nations a regard bordering on weakness, even in cases when they essentially failed us, have been partly pained with the tone I used towards these Indians; but I could not restrain myself because it is they who have compromised me with the English, and no other course but threats remained to put an end to their treason.

I am very well pleased that I assumed a haughty tone, in consequence of the good effects my menaces have produced, to such a degree, that our domiciliated Indians, who assisted at this Council, and who feared that I would mollify, have thanked me for the firmness of my language; and the Five Nations even, when leaving, could not help saying that I was a Man, and that they would assuredly come to see me at the beginning of the spring.

I consider it my duty to remark to you, my Lord, that these Indians who were in the habit of coming annually, have not condescended to come since my arrival in this Colony, because they were plotting some mischief with the English; but having learned that the Cayugas, who have been always faithful to us, had agreed with the Oneidas and the Taskarorens not to meddle with their design; chance willed it that our domiciliated Indians of the Sault and the Lake asked my leave to visit these three last nations, their brethren, to confirm their sentiments. I took advantage of that negotiation to engage them to make them come down, and it has been productive of all the good I could hope from it.

The Onontagues, who have had recourse, without success, to every expedient to prevent their brethren coming down to Montreal, have determined to follow them, but at a distance, because they wished not to appear to me suspicious, and they have not assisted at the Council, except as hearers; I paid them well for their curiosity, and as this circumstance was kept concealed from me, I sent them, after the Conference, a message ordering them to reunite with their brethren.

The Senecas, who are the most numerous of the Five Nations, have not dared to come down because they feel themselves the most culpable; but they have sent two of their young men to assist at the Conference, who will not fail to report my words, which can have only a very good effect.

There is great appearance, my Lord, that the dismemberment of the Cayugas, Oneidas and Taskarorens will considerably counterbalance any bad part the Senecas and the Onondagas may take; I shall be at least advised by the former, but as there is question of marching again to the River Oyo, I have had the policy to engage them to come down next spring, in order to keep them in check as far as regards the execution of any evil design they might project during the winter.

I must not omit informing you, my Lord, that after the solemn Conference, the Cayugas, Oneidas and Taskarorens invited our domiciliated Indians to a secret Council, even unknown to the Baron de Longueuil, the Governor, in order that I alone may be privy to their real sentiments. You perceive, my Lord, that greater affection cannot be required of Indians than these evince for me; I believe it sincere, because the Cayugas, who have always been faithful to us, have become security for those they have brought in their party.

My negotiation with the Mohawks succeeds admirably, as you will see by their propositions, but they cannot settle in the village of the Sault St. Louis, because the lands in that quarter are exhausted, so that more than thirty families belonging to that mission, being unable to collect wherewithal to feed themselves, are going to settle at Lake St. Francis, twenty leagues above Montreal, on the south side, where there are very good lands; the Mohawks have agreed with these thirty families to go and settle their village at this place, whither a missionary will accompany them; this change, which costs the King only the erection of a saw-mill, that will furnish abundantly wherewith to build the cabins, becomes very advantageous to the Colony, in as far as it will be easy in time of war, to be informed of all that might occur in the direction of Choueguen; besides, La Présentation, and this new village on Lake St. Francis, the Sault St. Louis and the Lake of the Two Mountains, will form a barrier which will protect the government of Montreal against all incursions, because in that weak quarter, the troops that might be sent thither, will be always supported by these Indians.

I have dwelt much on the consideration of this new expense, though very trifling, but I have reflected that if I had ordered the thirty families in question, to remain at the Sault St. Louis, I could not avoid having to feed them, which would cost an immense sum.

Never was there greater necessity to send back Father Tournois<sup>1</sup> to this Colony, as I have demanded of M. Rouillé.

The English are furious at the Indians abandoning them; they have ample cause, for the government of Orange is wholly unprotected, and there would be great need to attend to it in time of war.

You will have seen by my despatches, my Lord, that I have anticipated your wishes in making the Indians act under pretext of their private grievances, and I so manage that it will not appear that it proceeds from me.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Quebec, 31st Sber, 1754.

Secret Conference held by the Oneidas, Kaskarorens and Cayugas with our domiciliated Indians at Montreal, on the 23<sup>d</sup> Sber, 1754.

[Annexed to the Marquis Duquesne's letter of the 31st Sber, 1754.]

First Belt.

Brethren, We, as it were, place our lives in your hands; our land and yours will henceforth make but one; our interests and yours will be common; the lot of the one will always be the lot of the other, and our object is to form but one mind with you, so that our welfare being mutually dear, we shall not conceal from each other anything we shall have to hope or to fear.

Second Belt.

In answer to a Belt those of the Sault gave them when they were on an embassy to their country.

<sup>1</sup> Rev. JEAN BAPTISTE TOUNOIS had been Missionary at Sault St. Louis since 1742. He fell under the displeasure of the Marquis de la Jonquière, who dismissed him from that mission in 1748, and sent him to France, notwithstanding the solicitations of the Indians. Collections of Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1838, p. 22. — Ed.

This Belt was to solicit earnestly the three above named Nations to induce their brethren, the Senecas, to hearken no more to the Evil Spirit that was disturbing them, and to incline more to friendly acts.

Answer.

Brethren, We have executed your design in regard to the Senecas, and expressed ourselves most earnestly on the article that related to the Evil Spirit, by whom they allowed themselves to be ruled. We did not content ourselves with making them long speeches proper to convince them, we have even, as it were, taken hold of their head to assist them by repeatedly shaking it, to discharge all the poison that the Evil Spirit had deposited therein.

The Senecas have not yet answered this Belt, which has been presented to them in consequence, but they have promised to do so immediately.

Third Belt.

Brethren, Hearken unto us. We are about to disclose to you our true sentiments, which are not only ours but also those of all the men and women (ceux et celles) who have remained in our village.

Your blood is the same as ours; if heretofore a leaven hath corrupted a portion of it, it is now purified by the things we are about to declare to you.

1st Your warriors and ours will never have but the same object of war, and will march only for the same cause.

2nd Far from accepting the hatchet from the English, notwithstanding his urgent solicitations, we shall forbid our young men not only to touch it, but even to look at it.

3rd We renew here what we said by our first Belt, to convince you fully of the sentiments of union that we wish always to entertain towards you.

Fourth Belt.

Brethren, This Belt represents to you the two villages of the Oneidas, Cayugas and Kaskarens; you see two paths laid down there; the one or the other will always terminate at the place where you will be well received and attentively heard; these two paths will for the future be well trodden by you and by us, so that the soil thereof will be always firm and even.

In consequence of the above Conference our domiciliated Indians convoked one in the afternoon of the same day, and invited the Oneidas, Kaskarens, Cayugas, Senecas and Oontagués to it, and gave them to understand that they called them together solely in their own name, and, as it were, unknown to their Father, in order that they should fully know what were their true sentiments.

By a Belt.

Brethren, You see us here in the greatest desolation; your conduct at Orange has made us all shed tears.

We have disowned our blood when we learned that in secret Councils, in the presence of seven Governors, you have betrayed our Father's cause by agreeing with the English Evil Spirit to divest yourselves in his favor of the Beautiful river, notwithstanding the great length of time our Father has been in possession of it.

Brethren, Are you ignorant of the difference between our Father and the English? Go see the forts our Father has erected, and you will see that the land beneath his walls is still hunting ground, having fixed himself in those places we frequent, only to supply our wants; whilst the English, on the contrary, no sooner get possession of a country than the game is forced to leave it; the trees fall down before them, the earth becomes bare, and we find among them hardly wherewithal to shelter us when the night falls.

Brothers, Reflect on what we say to you by this Belt, and do not leave us long in ignorance of your mode of thinking of us, who regard as suspicious all sentiments which do not agree with our own and those of our Father.

The Iroquois cabin promised to come this spring to answer this Belt; it is supposed to be given unknown to their Father, in order that all the Iroquois may feel fully persuaded that it is not at his solicitation that our domiciliated Indians so speak.

Belt of the Oneidas in answer to one that the Missionaries of the Sault sent them, and which has been brought to the Mission by the Deputies from the Nation.

[ Annexed to the Marquis Duquesne's letter of 31st 8ber, 1754. ]

The Belt sent last spring was to this purpose:

1st The Onontagés, your neighbors, are dangerous; they seek to alarm you respecting our Father's conduct, accusing him of having formed the design of staining your and their mats with blood.

2nd Distrust the English, who propose to purchase your lands; they are seeking to spread themselves abroad, only in order to hem you in.

3rd Be careful not to shake the Tree of Peace which our Father, M<sup>r</sup> de Calières, has so firmly planted.

4th In order to enjoy quietly the sweets of peace, which you will not taste except by participating in good works, try the religion professed by your brethren of the Sault; desire to be praying, and we shall go and instruct you.

The answer is:

1st We will be deaf to the words of the Onontagés as well as to those of all others, unless they accord with those of our Father.

2<sup>d</sup> The English will never obtain anything from us, nor even settle on our lands.

3<sup>d</sup> Far from shaking the Tree of Peace, we will ward off from it as much as we can, the blows of the hatchet that the evil disposed might direct against it.

4th In regard to prayer, this is the word of only one of our two villages, the other not having yet taken the matter into deliberation. This is what it says: Father, you will be the master of our minds to teach us to pray; we will listen to you wherever you will be, provided brandy, which disturbs the heads of our young men, does not know the path where your fire will be lighted; we envy the lot of those to whom the Master of Life sends people to instruct them; you have made us all glad by your good word, but assure us of the time when you will begin to take pity on us. These two strings of wampum thank you on behalf of the village, for the good tobacco you have sent us.

M. de Machault to M. Duquesne.

Sir,

I received the letters you have written to me on the 16th, 17th, 18th and 21st of June last, and have rendered an account of them to the King.

It is not without great pain that his Majesty has learned what has befallen the detachment which Sieur de Contrecoeur has sent under Sieur de Jumonville's orders. He does not think, however, that the consequences of this ought to be, as you expect, a rupture on the part of the English. The views evinced by the King of Great Britain up to the present time, for the maintenance of peace, do not permit even the belief that he has authorized the movements which make so much noise along the Beautiful river; and there is still less appearance that he has ordered similar movements on the other frontiers.

We are going to have an explanation on that subject with the British Court; in the mean while, I profit by a vessel which is to sail from Bordeaux, though the season of the navigation of Canada is far advanced, to let you know his Majesty's intentions as to the conduct you are to observe.

You must perceive in advance, that in the uncertainty as to what will have occurred during this summer, his Majesty cannot give you detailed orders. He can only rely on your zeal and prudence to act according to circumstances. But these are in general the principles by which he desires you to regulate your operations.

In supporting his Majesty's rights and pretensions against all enterprises on the part of the English, you are most carefully to avoid giving them any just cause of complaint; to manage on occasions in which there may be acts of violence, in such a manner as not to appear the aggressor; and to confine yourself to the adoption of all possible measures to be in a position to repel force by force.

If, to assure this defensive policy on your part, you consider it necessary to make the Indians act offensively against the English, his Majesty will approve of your using that expedient, but he desires that you determine on having recourse to it, only so far as the conduct of the English will render it indispensable for the safety and tranquillity of the Colony; for his Majesty wishes you to avoid, as much as it will be possible, the shedding of blood.

Supposing, however, that contrary to all sorts of appearances, and in spite of the confidence the King must have in the equitable and pacific dispositions of the King of Great Britain, hostilities on the part of the English should reach the point of being regarded as a rupture, his Majesty leaves you, in that case, at liberty to make such arrangements as will appear to you the most suitable for the good of his service and the glory of his arms.

But there is every reason to believe that you will not find yourself in that necessity. We shall be able to ascertain immediately what the British Court thinks of that affair, and according to its answer and the news we shall receive between this and the month of December, of what has occurred in Canada, the King will adopt those measures he will consider proper, and have new orders transmitted to you at the opening of the navigation next spring.

As for the rest, you are always, as M<sup>r</sup> Rouillé<sup>1</sup> has already informed you, to make your operations subordinate to the situation of the finances, as far as the safety of the Colony will possibly permit.

M. de Machault to M. Duquesne.

Sir,

The movements which took place last year in the direction of the Beautiful river, have made considerable noise in Europe, and Sieur de Villiers' expedition has occasioned a particular ferment in England.

Things have been carried there so far, that the British Court has taken the resolution to dispatch to Virginia two regiments of Regulars, with officers, arms and clothing, for the levying of two others there, and this reinforcement sailed on the thirteenth of last month from some Irish ports.

That Court hath, meanwhile, caused the most positive assurances to be given, that it continues to adhere to the dispositions it has manifested, up to the present time, for the preservation of peace; that, in sending those troops to Virginia, it had no other object than to tranquilize that and its neighboring Colonies in regard to the attacks to which they believed themselves exposed, and that it has given the most precise orders that they stand on the most exact defensive.

The King is, indeed, persuaded that his Britannic Majesty's intention is not to come to any rupture. His Majesty does not despair even, that the propositions which have some time ago been reciprocally interchanged on the subjects occasioning all those movements, will lead us to some conciliation.

But as, whilst disposed to lend himself to all just and reasonable arrangements to accomplish that object, he is equally resolved to defend his possessions and his rights, he has thought proper, notwithstanding the assurances given by the Court of England, to send, likewise, some reinforcement to Canada to protect that Colony from any attacks to which it might be exposed.

This reinforcement consists of six battalions of troops of the line, which will form a corps of three thousand men, commanded by a Marechal de Camp<sup>1</sup>, who will be subject to the Governor-General's orders. These troops will be embarked in his Majesty's ships, convoyed by a fleet corresponding to the list I transmit you; I expect it will sail in the beginning of April from the harbor of Brest, where the troops are to embark, and from the character of the vessels it will be composed of, and the season of navigation, that its voyage will be short. The King has, meanwhile, had the frigates La Diane and La Fidelle put in commission to advise you of the fact; this letter will reach you by La Diane, commanded by Captain Froger de l'éguille, of the Navy, who will sail immediately from Rochefort. La Fidelle, commanded by Lieutenant de la Jonquière, and in which M<sup>r</sup> Bigot, the Intendant, is to return to the Colony, will leave the same port on the fifteenth or twentieth of next month; M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil will afterwards embark with the Commandant of the squadron, and, in the meanwhile, his Majesty recommends you to give your attention to four principal objects.

First, to watch the conduct of the English. The troops they have sent to Virginia will arrive there in sufficient time to act before those his Majesty dispatches to Canada can reach Quebec, and we must await their action; for, even on the supposition that they have, in fact, orders to remain on the defensive, the pretensions of the English, however unjust they be, will serve them as a pretext to wish to have whatever they will undertake to do in the localities in dispute, regarded as purely defensive. There is reason to believe, however, that if they resume hostilities, 'twill be, at least in the present conjuncture, in the direction of the Beautiful river only, without extending them to the other frontiers, and, according to the account you have rendered of the arrangements you have made, and of those you were proposing to make in that quarter, they will not find our posts defenceless, especially if you have been informed, as you will possibly be, of the movements which were making from the beginning of last autumn in the English Colonies.

However that be, his Majesty's principles and dispositions regarding the conduct you have to observe, are always the same. He wishes that, in maintaining his rights and possessions against the attacks of the English, you carefully avoid affording them any just subject of complaint; that you conduct yourself on the occasions wherein there will possibly be recourse to violence, in such a manner as not to appear the aggressor, and that you confine yourself to the adoption of all measures possible to enable you to repel force by force.

If, to assure that defensive on your part, you should judge necessary to make the Indians act offensively against the English, his Majesty will approve of your having recourse to that expedient. But he desires that you determine on that course only so far as the conduct of the English will render it indispensable to the safety and tranquillity of the Colony.

Suppose, in the mean time, that the movements of the English were carried to the extent that they must be regarded as a veritable rupture on their part, his Majesty, in such case, leaves you at liberty to make the arrangements which will seem to you the most suitable for the good of his service and the glory of his arms.

Such are the principles on which you are to continue to regulate your conduct in this regard so long as you are entrusted with the government, and such are still the orders his Majesty will give your successor.

But as 'twill not be any contravention of these principles to destroy the fort which the English have erected last summer in the direction of Naurautsouak,<sup>1</sup> inasmuch as that will be an absolutely defensive operation on your part, the King's intention is, not to allow the continuance of a post so dangerous and so contrary to his rights. Therefore, supposing that the Indians have not executed the project they had formed of expelling the English thence, and that you find yourself able to undertake it yourself, openly, his Majesty desires that you immediately adopt the measures necessary thereunto; but it must be only in case you are sure of success. It will be necessary, then, that the officer who will have charge of that expedition, shall commence by summoning the English to evacuate and abandon the fort, and that he do not proceed to any forcible attack until they refuse to surrender to the summons, whereof it will be necessary for you to give him the draft, and in which you will appear to act without having received any order, and solely in consequence of the obligation you are under to defend the possessions of the government confided to you against such like usurpations, which can be regarded only as contrary to the intentions and orders of both Kings for the maintenance of peace and good harmony between the two Nations; should the undertaking succeed, the fort must be destroyed in such a manner that not a vestige of it remain.

The second object you are to attend to is the arrangements for the reception of the troops on their arrival in the Colony. By the copy I send you of the letter which I write on this subject to M<sup>r</sup> Varin, you will learn the orders I give him. You are better able than any person to judge of all that is to be done in that regard. M<sup>r</sup> Varin will consult with you respecting all his operations, and provide for those that you will consider necessary, until the arrival of M<sup>r</sup> Bigot, who, in like manner, will have orders to arrange with you on all that matter.

I send you, also, an extract of the instruction given to Sieur de l'Eguille, whereby you will see that he will have to return to Bick, in the River St. Lawrence, to wait there for the fleet, for which I have furnished him signals; you will be careful, also, to send him back without delay to that rendezvous, and to cause Sieur Pellegrin, the Lieutenant of the Port, to embark with him, accompanied by some of the best of the river pilots, to conduct the fleet, reserving some of them for the frigate La Fidelle, which will have orders to come also and wait for the fleet at another rendezvous, of which you will have been informed.

The navigation of that same river will form the third object of your attentions. It is, in fact, proper that you examine whether, in order to avoid the risks that may be incurred in running large vessels up that river as far as Quebec, it would not be proper to let them remain at some of the good anchorages that are known, whence the troops could be transported in the frigates and other vessels which might be collected at Quebec; and on this point you will have to communicate your reflections to Count Dubois de Lamotte, the Commodore of the squadron, by the frigates you will send down to him.

Lastly, the fourth object is to prepare a plan of operations to be proposed to M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil and to the Commander of the troops, at the very first moment of their arrival, and that plan must be relative to the principles I have just reminded you of, and to the circumstances in which the affairs of the Colony will then be.

As for the rest, his Majesty does not prescribe anything to you in regard to the effects the first intelligence of the reinforcements in question will produce in Canada and in the English Colonies. On the one hand, it may be proper to keep the secret in order to prevent both the rise it will possibly create in provisions and goods of the country, and the English being on their guard; but on the other hand, it may be necessary to announce before hand the arrival of this reinforcement, in order either to tranquilize the Indians who are faithful to us, or to restrain those who might allow themselves to be debauched by the English; as the latter will not fail to vaunt the superiority they might derive from the troops sent to Virginia; or to arrest the English themselves in the execution of the projects they might be induced to undertake by the confidence inspired by that superiority. 'Tis for you to weigh all these different considerations, and his Majesty refers to your zeal and prudence as to what you will consider most advantageous in this regard.

M. de Machault to Commissary Varin.

Sir,

The King of England having sent two regiments of Regulars to Virginia, under pretence of defending that Colony against the attacks to which it is supposed to be exposed on the part of the French, the King has thought fit to send also three thousand men of his troops of the line to Canada, although there is reason to hope that all these movements will pass off without occasioning a rupture between the two Nations, and that the two Courts will succeed in terminating in a conciliatory manner the differences which are the subject and cause thereof. These three thousand men, composing six battalions, are to be embarked on board some of the King's ships which will sail from the sixth to the fifteenth of April, from Brest, under the convoy of a squadron. M<sup>r</sup> Bigot will precede them in a frigate that is to sail about the fifteenth of March; but in the meantime it is necessary that you attend to the arrangements necessary for their reception at Quebec.

The first must be for the sick that will possibly be among them on their arrival. Independent of the wards the Hotel Dieu can furnish, you will cause some to be prepared at the General Hospital for the reception of one hundred and fifty to one hundred and sixty sick; but 'twill be necessary only to arrange the wards, to mark the places and to have bedsteads constructed, because the Hospital in the Fleet will deposit in the King's store, sheets, mattresses and other hospital furniture.

You will cause to be immediately repaired the old and new barrack bedsteads, and order some made for the wards that will be in want of them.

You will visit the houses of the city to ascertain the number of rooms capable of lodging the officers of the troops for some days; your arrangements in this regard ought to be for one hundred and fifty to one hundred and sixty officers, and you will prepare in advance a list of these lodgings.

You will cause to be collected flour or wheat equal to twelve thousand quintals of flour, and if there be a desire to sell the one and the other too dear, which will not fail to be the case the moment 'twill be known in the Colony that troops are about to arrive, you will adopt, in concert with the Marquis Duquesne, the necessary measures to secure, by authority, that quantity of provisions, the price of which will be regulated on Mr Bigot's arrival. You will observe also, thereupon, not to lose any time in having the wheat ground, in order to take advantage of the fine season.

You will take the same precautions for a supply of three thousand quintals of salt pork.

And, seeing the increase these troops will occasion in the consumption of every description of articles, it is the intention of the King that [the exportation of] all sorts of Colonial provisions be interdicted, without your having the power, under any pretext whatsoever, to allow any to be put on board, except what will be necessary for the subsistence of the vessels which will possibly be dispatched in the Colony; for the ships which will proceed from France to Quebec, will be notified that they will not be permitted to take in any sort of provisions there.

You will employ the coopers of Montreal to make barrels both for the transport of the flour which will not be put in small bags, and of the liquors to be furnished to the detachments of the troops that will possibly be sent into the field.

You will cause the large store in the gate opposite the Intendance, to be prepared for the storage of the flour and other provisions and effects, which will be landed from the fleet for the magazine.

You will set men to work at the caulking of the bateaux both at Quebec and Montreal, and have others built, should there not be sufficient of them for the transportation of from two to three thousand men, and the effects they will require for a campaign.

You are to provide yourself also with bark canoes for the same purpose, and particularly for the navigation of the River au Bœuf and the Beautiful river; and bateaux being capable of serving on Lakes Ontario and Erie, you will see if there be enough of them at the Niagara carrying place, for the passage to Presqu'île, so that, should any be wanting, some may be constructed at that carrying place, or supplied by bark canoes.

In a word, you will occupy yourself until Mr Bigot's arrival, with all the arrangements that will possibly be necessary as well for the reception of the troops as for the execution of the operations in which they will happen to be employed. You are, however, not to do anything in all this until you shall have conferred and agreed upon it with the Marquis Duquène, who, being informed of the King's intentions respecting the destination of the troops, is qualified to judge of the precautions to be taken in advance relative to the circumstances. Meanwhile, if M. Duquène happen not be at Quebec when this letter will reach you, you will and even are at liberty, without waiting for him, to lay in supplies of provisions and make the other preparations I have mentioned to you for the reception of the troops and stores, which will be disembarked from the fleet.

But in all cases, you are as much as possible to keep the sending of the troops a secret until M. Duquesne thinks proper to allow the news to be circulated.

For the rest, the frigate, whereby you will receive this letter, and that which is to convey M<sup>r</sup> Bigot, are to return to the lower part of the river to await the fleet. It will be necessary, as I inform M. Duquesne, to distribute all the good river pilots that you will be able to find, between these two frigates.

M. de Machault to M. de Bompas.

Versailles, 17th of February, 1755.

Sir,

The public news will have informed you of the movements which have for some time been making on our Canada Frontiers, and particularly towards the River Ohio. The Court of England having dispatched two battalions of regulars to Virginia, and made other arrangements in that Colony and in the adjoining Provinces, the King has taken the resolution to send a reinforcement of six battalions of troops of the line to Canada, and his Majesty proposes that they shall sail in the month of April next, under a convoy of a fleet of his ships.

The King of England has caused the most positive assurances to be given that the troops sent to Virginia, and the other arrangements making in that Country, have no other object than to defend his Colonies against the invasions with which they pretend Canada is threatening them.

His Majesty, on his part, is very far from suffering any attempt at the invasion of his neighbors. He will give orders that the most exact defensive be observed in Canada, but, although sincerely resolved to confine himself thus to the defence of his right and possessions, he cannot flatter himself, especially after what has occurred last year in the direction of the River Ohio, that he will not be obliged to make use of the forces he is sending to Canada.

The dispositions his Britannic Majesty does not cease to manifest for the preservation of peace, must, meanwhile, encourage the hope that all the discussions concerning the boundaries of the respective Colonies in North America, will possibly be settled without coming to an open rupture. There is even question at present between the two Courts, of new propositions in their regard.

But, in the incertitude of events, his Majesty has ordered me to inform you, in his name, that his intention is, that you prepare yourself for all events; that you redouble the care and attention to provide, as much as possible, for every object relating to the defence of your government; that you adopt precautions to be informed of what is passing in the English Colonies in your vicinity; that you guard yourself against every surprise; but you are to observe, at the same time, in all the dispositions you make, not to allow it to be suspected that you have received any orders to this effect.

You will be so good as to render me an account of what you will do in the matter, and I shall take care to inform you of the circumstances it will be proper for you to know, with the new orders they may require.

But in all cases, 'tis necessary that the King be in a position to decide on what may interest the security of your government. His Majesty desires that you send me by the first opportunity, and with proper precautions, a report of its condition in reference to that object; the arrangements you propose making in case of war, and the estimate of the assistance you will possibly require.

Should his Majesty approve of writing this letter to the Governors of his Colonies, exclusive of Canada, it appears necessary to add, (to that) to Mr. de Bompar, Governor of the Windward Islands, the following article :

And, as in all cases, also, it is to be expected that the English will not lose sight of their projects on the Islands in dispute, particularly St. Lucia, the King desires that you conform to the orders his Majesty has already given you on that point, not only in case the English make an attack on any one of those Islands, but also on the first certain intelligence you may receive of a rupture on their part.

The orders referred to in this article relate to St. Lucia. M<sup>r</sup> de Bompar, has, in fact, been directed on several occasions to be always on his guard in relation to that Island, in order not to allow himself to be surprised by the English; to adopt, for that purpose, all measures possible to be informed of the movements they may have recourse to, and to be in a position to anticipate them himself on the first opportunity.

Same to the Marquis de Vaudreuil and to M<sup>r</sup> de Kerlerec<sup>1</sup>, suppressing the first article.

Messrs. de Drucour and Prévost to M. Duquesne.

Copy of the letter written by Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Drucour and Prévost, from Louisbourg, to the Marquis Duquesne, on the twenty-seventh of February, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five.

Sir,

It is certain that the English are preparing to make their appearance on the lands bordering on the Ohio, or Beautiful river; we also know that there have been for a long time frequent meetings between the Governors and deputies of the Provinces of Boston, New-York, <sup>1</sup>M. KERLEREC was a Captain in the Royal Navy. He had been twenty-five years in active service; had been in four general engagements, and had received several wounds. He succeeded M. de Vaudreuil as Governor of Louisiana, 9th February, 1763, and administered its affairs until June, 1763—that is ten years and five months, when he returned to France, where, on his arrival, he was thrown into the Bastille on a charge of peculation. Gayarré's Louisiana under the French, I., 96. — ED.

Merylan and Pensylvania, both for the purpose of agreeing on the projected operations on the frontiers, and of urging the Court of London on this subject, and perhaps to demand of it reinforcements and orders generally in regard to the navigation and to the provisions exporting from New England to our Colonies. You may have learned, Sir, something about them; these preparations on the part of our neighbors are of too much importance to the service and to the measures you have to adopt, for us to neglect communicating to you everything that we learn respecting them; which also makes us conclude to dispatch, this day, Sieur de la Saussaye, an officer of this garrison, by sea to the River St. John, whence he will proceed to place in your hands the despatch we have the honor to write you, whereunto we annex the extract of an enigmatical letter that M<sup>r</sup> Prévost has received from New-York three days ago, written by a man of your acquaintance who has spent a part of the winter of seventeen hundred and fifty-three and seventeen hundred and fifty-four in Canada, and as he has since made use of the same style in the advices he has had to communicate to that Commissary, we have looked together for the meaning this last may contain, which you will find reported in the margin of that extract. In fine, Sir, there is every appearance, and we believe, that your new posts will be vigorously attacked in the spring; the English are desirous of making a diversion and harassing the posts they may be able to reach by the rivers situated on the East of their Continent, in order to oblige you to diminish the forces you may have destined for the upper part. We lose not an instant to transmit you what knowledge we possess in this regard, and we believe that M<sup>r</sup> de Drucour could not confide it to any person more capable than Sieur de la Saussaye of making an expeditious journey; it is moreover, a new occasion of improving the zeal and services of that officer, whom you, yourself, have already employed, if you are satisfied with them.

Perhaps you are ignorant, Sir, that Governor Shirley is at present at New-York, and that he has dispatched thither the regiment bearing his name.<sup>1</sup> We are, also, informed that the Governor of Halifax<sup>2</sup> has furnished six officers of the troops of his garrison to organize and drill the new militia.

As for the rest, everything appears quiet in Acadia, but 'tis true that we have had no news from there since the end of November or beginning of December. Meanwhile Sieur de la

<sup>1</sup> This was the old 50th Regiment, or "Dirty Half-Hundred," as 'twas called by the populace. It was broke in 1756, in consequence of its surrender at Oswego. The following were the names of the officers on half-pay in 1758: Major-General William Shirley, Colonel; Lieutenant-Colonel, John Littlehales; Major, James Kinneer; Captains, David Patton, John Vickera, Benjamin Barber, Richard Hutchinson, Robert Armstrong; Captain-Lieutenant, John Carden; Lieutenants, Thomas Irwin, George Graham, Joseph Goldthwaite, William Felton; Ensigns, Milbourne West, William Coker; Chaplain, Philip Francis; Surgeon, John Gee. Army List, 1758, p. 167.

<sup>2</sup> Brigadier-General CHARLES LAWRENCE was sworn in a member of the Council of Nova Scotia, July 31st, 1749, at which time he was a Major in the British army. In the spring of 1750 he was sent to reduce the French at Chignecto, but they burned their town and retired before him into the woods; in the course of the summer he returned to the attack, and erected a fort at the head of the Bay of Fundy, which was called Fort Lawrence. On the retirement of Governor Hopson, in 1753, Major Lawrence administered the government; he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor in 1754 and Governor of Nova Scotia in 1756, being third in succession who filled that office. In September, 1757, he was appointed one of the Colonels commandant of the 60th Royal American Regiment, and Brigadier in America on the 31st December following. In Loudon's fruitless campaign, of 1757, he commanded the Reserve, and at the siege of Louisbourg, in 1758, the second Brigade. After the reduction of that place he returned to the seat of his government, where he died of inflammation of the lungs, on the 19th October, 1760, deeply regretted by every individual in the Province. The House of Assembly caused a monument to be erected to his memory in the Parish Church of St. Paul, Halifax. It was during the administration of Governor Lawrence that the cruel policy of expatriating the Acadians was had recourse to and executed. Knox Journal, I., 21, 170, 204; Haliburton's Nova Scotia, I., 160, 169, 170, 175, 183, 196, 199, 204, 210, 229, 317, 319. — Ed.

Saussaye will call on Father Germain and Sieur de Boishébert, in order to render you a faithful account of events, and of the situation of our posts in regard to our neighbors.

If your operations require any assistance in provisions on our part, 'tis essential, Sir, that you inform us of it very early, for you will perceive yourself how much difficulties will increase to providing them from New England, and one Prévost will have precautions to take, in that case, in order to obtain and furnish what you may demand.

A snow, belonging to Quebec, coming from Martinico has wintered here; it will probably furnish us the first opportunity of writing to you, and then we shall have received news from Europe and America, which we'll communicate to you.

We have the honor to be respectfully, Sir, your most humble and most obedient servants.

P. S. We observe to you, Sir, that what we mention concerning the movements of the English, do not amount to certainties, and we believe even that the number of nine thousand men is excessive in the conjuncture, and in view of the expenses such an armament entails; but if you are in possession of other advice, this will serve to compare with it, and you will be able, always, to draw conclusions therefrom relative to the reports which will be made to you, so as to keep you always on your guard, and to have an eye on the movements making in New England.

Extract of the letter written from New-York on the eighth of January, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, to M<sup>r</sup> Prévost, Commissary at Isle Royale.

Interpretation which we give to the letter on the other side.

Sir,

I arrived here in safety after a passage of seventeen days, which appeared to me the longer in consequence of the continual bad weather we experienced during the entire voyage, nothing less than the recollection of your kindnesses, &c., was needed to bring any respite to my misfortunes, which have only changed their nature on my arriving here, being obliged to submit to the general lot of the Frenchmen in the country, who, two days before I came, were ordered not to leave their houses; therein it is very different from what it is with you, since not only have they permission to come thither, and to work there, but even to reside there. I must esteem myself lucky, nevertheless, in my misfortune, by the pleasure procure for me every day at their house, etc.

This order has been issued in fact until a definite arrangement in regard to the acts of hostility occurring in the Upper country, and we have learned that the English, in order to justify, no doubt, their manœuvres or to excite the populace, are circulating the report that the Marquis Duquesne has sent six thousand men to the Ohio.

I expect to leave here in the beginning of May at farthest; nothing will remain but my business of the twelve thousand livres security, which has strong indications, and even a certainty, of being interrupted. Meyracq and my brother must perceive it already, they must not expect any more; proper order has been applied thereto; therefore I advise them, etc<sup>a</sup>.

I don't know whether you have had any news from your Marseilles friend, and whether he will have sent back the nine thousand livres that you had sent him for me, namely, one thousand livres for Sieur Ignan, six thousand livres for Péan and Mercier, and two thousand livres for Sieurs Chaudière and Company; this does not fail to disquiet me, as I have had no news by the ships that have arrived from London. Perhaps I shall receive some by the first that will arrive, and which are expected daily, being fully persuaded that Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vismes and Son of London will send my letters to me here, if any be transmitted to them for me. As I doubt not but you will have an opportunity to write to that gentleman, I request you to write expressly to him about this matter in order that, by early spring, at latest, I may find myself provided with goods which I am to have for these funds, and you will do me a favor to mention it to his partner, M<sup>r</sup> Brest, having particular reasons which prevent me writing to him on that subject.

M<sup>r</sup> Prevost is here given to understand that it will not be practicable for the writer to supply the slaughter-house of Louisbourg with English cattle, for the performance of which engagement the contractor had given 12000<sup>li</sup> security, and, apparently, that not only the exportation of cattle had been prohibited, but that the English had, moreover, been forbidden to come to Louisbourg, and this is observed in pointing out that the Judge and the King's Attorney of the Admiralty must perceive that hardly any vessels of that Nation have come during the winter.

The Marseilles friend must be the Marquis Duquesne, whose new posts will be attacked by 9000 men, and we believe that these will be distributed, by sending 1000 men to Fort St. Frederic, where, M<sup>r</sup> Prevost thinks, M<sup>r</sup> de Lusignan commands, or to the River St. John, but he insists on the former interpretation; 6000 men will go to the but, which is on the Beautiful river, or the Ohio; and lastly, 2000 men will find their way by all the routes that are in the vicinity of the Chaudière falls, Beckancour; the uneasiness of the writer may, besides, arise, from the fact of his receiving no intelligence of what is passing in Canada, and from his desire that you may be informed there of the projects of our neighbors and of the course they will pursue; if he would desire to give it to be understood that they are waiting for intelligence from London in order to operate, but it is more likely that he means that he has had no news from Canada, and that he is under the impression that they are safe there. This is the reason why he proposes sending an express to the Marquis Duquesne to let him know, in order that he may oppose these irruptions early in the spring, by offering resistance everywhere; and in the fear that a letter written to a military man would excite too much curiosity in existing circumstances, our man dares not risk a notice to M<sup>r</sup> de Drucour, who is designated as M<sup>r</sup> Brest, and to whom M<sup>r</sup> Prevost is requested to communicate this letter.

Draft of a Commission for the Baron de Dieskau.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

LOUIS, by the Grace of God, &c. To all who shall see these Presents, Greeting. Having resolved to detach six battalions of our troops of the line for the purpose of sending them to Canada, where they are to be employed, conjointly with the Independent companies (compagnies franches), at present maintained there for the service of our Colonies under the direction of our Governor-General of the said Country, We have concluded to confer the command of said battalions on a general officer on whom we may rely for care, to attend to their support and preservation, to maintain street police and discipline therein, and to command them on occasions when our Governor-General shall think proper to employ them for the good of our service in said country, and We, particularly confiding in the valor, experience, capacity, fidelity and affection to our service, of our dear and well beloved Baron de Dieskau, Major-General (Maréchal de Camp) in our armies, &c., considering the proofs he has given us thereof in the various commissions he has held. For these causes and other considerations us moving, We, the said Baron de Dieskau have made, constituted, ordained and established, do make, constitute, ordain and establish by these presents, signed with our hand, Commander, under the authority of our Governor-General in said country, over the said troops which are to go to Canada, and to him have given and do give power to order them all whatsoever they shall have to do, and to employ them everywhere need shall be, to give effect to our intentions; to cause them to live in good order, police and discipline, according to our military regulations and ordinances; to cause the same to be kept, maintained, and observed inviolably in all places where said troops shall be employed; to cause those to be punished and chastised who will dare to contravene them; to pay attention that all the furniture which will have been ordered, be made for them exactly, by those who shall be appointed for that purpose, and generally to do and order in regard to said troops, all that he shall think necessary to command; the whole by and under the authority of our Governor-General in Canada. We hereby command Sieur de Rostaing, Colonel of Infantry employed with said battalions, the Lieutenant-Colonels, Captain, Lieutenants and Ensigns thereof; the Commissaries, Engineers and all other officers who will accompany said troops to acknowledge Baron de Dieskau in said quality of Commander, and to obey and hear him in all things concerning said power. For such is our pleasure. In witness whereof, we have caused our seal to be affixed to these presents.

Given at Versailles, on the first day of the month of March, in the year of Grace 1755, and of our Reign the XIth.

The King's Instructions for the Baron de Dieskau, Muréchal de Camp of his Majesty's armies, chosen to command the corps of troops which is to embark at Brest.

That corps of troops being destined to sustain the Colonies of Canada in conjunction with the troops of the marine who are employed there, the orders and instructions of said Baron de Dieskau are to be directed to these two points: one relating to the command of said corps of troops of the line, its maintenance, police, discipline and daily service; the other to the said Baron de Dieskau's authority over the marine troops, and the operations they will have to carry out both on land and water for the preservation of said Colonies. As this latter part depends on the Minister of Marine, Baron de Dieskau will ascertain from him the King's intentions in this regard, and the present instruction will be confined to what relates to the former.

Baron de Dieskau will find annexed hereunto, a commission which his Majesty has caused to be issued for the command of said corps under the authority of the Governor-General of Canada, the letter of service of Sieur de Rostaing, who will be employed under him in his quality of Colonel of Infantry, that of Chev. de Montreuil, Adjutant-General, and those of Sieurs partisan captains.

He will receive, also, the return of the battalions which are to compose the said military corps, and will embark at Brest in the beginning of the month of April next, according as they shall have been inspected by Sieur de Cremille, Inspector-General of Infantry; on board the same ships will be embarked, also, two Commissaries, three Engineers, one Surgeon-Major and six other Surgeons.

Said troops will have to be victualed by the Navy during the voyage, each on board the vessel in which it will sail, where they are not to have any duty to perform, being, as well as the officers in command of them, regarded only as passengers.

They, as well as the Colonial troops, shall be, also, victualed at the King's expense out of the Navy fund, during their stay in Canada, both whilst in garrison and when detached, except the officers who will live in garrison on their pay, and they shall receive independent of that ration the pay in silver, as it is explained more in detail in the annexed table.

Exclusive of pay and rations, the Navy will, also, cause these troops to be supplied with clothing and utensils, and the sick and wounded officers and soldiers to be received and treated in the hospitals of the country, agreeably to the decision of Minister of the Marine in the memoir, copy whereof is hereunto annexed.

All payments and distribution of provisions, clothing and utensils, as well as the maintenance of the hospitals, will be made by orders of the Intendant of the Marine, on the abstracts of the reviews of the Commissaries intrusted with the Military Police, who are to address themselves to him on all occasions when there will be question of providing necessaries for said troops, and will be subordinate to him in every matter which will relate to accountability.

Baron de Dieskau will, nevertheless, pay attention that all these supplies be made in proper order, and whenever he shall direct the oldest of the Commissaries to make representations thereupon to the Intendant of the Marine; which is not to prevent himself speaking to him about the matter when judged necessary. The same will be the case, whenever there is question distributing munitions of war, and of asking said Intendant to replace arms, or of proposing to him any extraordinary expenditure.

He will take care that the subsistence money be regularly paid to the soldiers every five or ten days, according as he shall think proper to order.

His Majesty leaves him, also, at liberty to order such stoppage as he will please on the soldiers' pay, as far as one sous at the utmost, including therein the half sous (six deniers) the King allowed in France for linen and shoes, which stoppage will be expended in purchasing for the soldier the articles he may want, independent of what will be furnished him by the Navy, observing in this case that the soldier be always informed of the object of the stoppage, and of the time when the balance of it will be paid him, in order to prevent, as much as possible, even the suspicion that there is a design to do him the slightest wrong.

As the rule which is observed in the Infantry in France, that the officers rank among themselves according to the seniority of their corps, cannot be put in execution in Canada, in the mixed service which the troops going there will be daily employed on, with those of the Colony, His Majesty has issued the annexed ordinance, both for the purpose of regulating the officers' rank there according to their seniority, and of establishing the parity of grades between the officers of the Line and those of the Colony, but his Majesty's intention is, that the Baron de Dieskaw do not publish it until the arrival of the troops in Canada. This same ordinance regulates the manner in which the Courts Martial are to be held for the purpose of trying military crimes, either in garrison or in the field, and in the detachments, with the distinction that is to be drawn in the cases where crime will have been committed between officers and soldiers of the Line, and those wherein the troops of the Line and those of the Colony will be equally interested.

As regards the misdemeanors in which Colonists will be interested, inasmuch as they are plainly within the jurisdiction of the ordinary judges, Baron de Dieskaw and those who, in his absence, will be in command of the land forces, are to refer them to the said judges whensoever required by them so to do.

As there are misdemeanors naturally requiring but a momentary punishment which it is within the attributes of the Commanders of the corps to determine, Baron de Dieskaw will take care, when complaints are made to him in such cases, either by Colonial officers or by the Colonists, that they receive full satisfaction on the spot, after the facts are substantiated.

We recommend, in like manner, to the Commandants of the troops of the line, to apply, in such conjuncture, to the Commanders of the Colonial forces and to the local Magistrates, and in case of denial on their part, said Commandants will report thereon to Baron Dieskaw, who will apply to the Governor-General and the Intendant for redress.

Although, strictly speaking, no officer ought be court-martialed without express permission from his Majesty, nevertheless, as the Governor-General of Canada has the power of having the officers of the Colonial troops tried there, his Majesty has been pleased to grant Baron Dieskaw the same authority over the officers of the troops of the line, under his command, on condition, however, that he will previously communicate thereupon with the said Governor-General in order to obtain his consent, as this course is not to be resorted to except in very serious cases which require an example for the maintenance of subordination, but he will be in no case, at liberty to pardon the officers or soldiers who shall be found guilty by the Court Martial, the Governor-General himself not having that privilege.

Baron de Dieskaw will commission, under his own signature, such officers as he shall have selected, until commissions, orders, letters patent, or royal brevets of the same date, can be sent him on the report he will have made of them.

In regard to vacancies in the commands of battalions, he will submit such as he will judge suitable for such grade to his Majesty, until whose decision the vacant battalion will be commanded by the oldest Captain thereof.

He will also report the rewards which, in his opinion, the officers under his orders will have deserved for their services, by transmitting to the Secretary of State, at the head of the War Department, a memorandum of the motives which will induce him to demand them, and the detail of the actions wherein such officers will have served, in order that the same may be submitted to his Majesty, and the King's grace be communicated to him.

His Majesty expects that Baron de Dieskaw will see that the battalions under his orders be exercised on the principles adopted by his Majesty for the whole of his Infantry. If, however, he think it proper that they should learn some particular manœuvres in regard to the species of war they will have to make in Canada, and to the nature of the enemies they will have to encounter there, his Majesty allows him every liberty in that respect.

Should it be the case that these battalions will have suffered a considerable loss either by the fortune of war, disease, desertion or otherwise, his Majesty permits Baron de Dieskaw to equalize all the companies of the same battalion, by transferring soldiers from the strongest to the weakest companies. He also approves that in case of need, he unite two weak battalions in order that they perform the service of one battalion, without, however, this change depriving the Commandants of the battalions so united of the authority they are always to retain over their troops, as this junction is to be made only for the purpose of furnishing detachments and fighting. In case of such junction of two battalions, Baron de Dieskaw will be at liberty to reduce the number of their colors, and to retain only one of those belonging to each battalion. In regard to the grenadiers they will both be retained. Each battalion is to keep up its own on such footing as Baron de Dieskaw will judge proper to determine in regard thereto, it being his Majesty's intention that the soldiers belonging to one battalion shall not be transferred to another.

Although it be his Majesty's intention that the soldiers who are willing to clear lands, be permitted to remain in Canada, he nevertheless desires that no absolute discharge be granted on this or any other pretext whatsoever, until the motives for which he has sent said battalions having ceased, he think proper to cause them to return to France. In order to indemnify the soldiers who, on account of their going to Canada, will find themselves obliged to serve beyond the time when they ought to be discharged, had they remained in France, his Majesty has caused the annexed ordinance to be issued, agreeably whereunto one pistole shall be paid to each of those so circumstanced.

The manner in which Baron de Dieskaw is to conduct himself towards the Governor-General of Canada, to whom the nature of his commission renders him necessarily subordinate, remains to be disposed of. The Governor will leave to him all the details of the command, discipline, police and interior service of the land forces, but Baron de Dieskaw will be bound, nevertheless, to render him an account thereof, in order that the Governor-General be acquainted with their strength, situation, and, generally, with all that can contribute to put him in possession of the advantage he may derive therefrom, for the success of the operations he shall have to set on foot.

It is therefore indispensable that the Baron de Dieskaw maintain the best understanding with the Governor-General, acting in concert in all things, and that he avoid, as much as possible, all separation from him, unless the Governor-General put him in charge of some expedition requiring his presence.

In case Baron de Dieskaw shall find himself necessarily separated from the Governor-General, he will so arrange that Sieur Rostaing remain with that Governor, in order that the correspondence which ought always subsist between them, may be kept up through him.

Should the Governor-General think proper to assemble a council of war for the purpose of concerting the operations of the campaign, he will invite to it, without hesitation, Baron de Dieskaw, or Sieur de Rostaing in his absence, or even in company with him, if he so desire. But whether the Governor-General take the advice of a council of war or content himself with conferring in private with Baron de Dieskaw, or decide independently without any previous communication, the said Baron shall be bound to obey the orders and instructions he shall give him, either for marching detachments or heading an expedition himself, and he will not be at liberty to make any change in what shall be prescribed to him, only so far as the Governor-General will have left him free so to do, or in urgent and unforeseen circumstances, which shall be reported to him on the spot. Said Governor-General shall be at liberty to send new orders pending the expedition, and to repair, should he desire, to the spot, to assume the chief command and terminate what will have been commenced.

The local Governors of Montreal and Three Rivers having also the command not only in these places, but also of the detachments that proceed from them by their authority, in urgent cases, Baron de Dieskaw will recommend the commanders of battalions that will be garrisoned there, to act towards them and the Lieutenant-Governors and Majors of these places, according to the rule laid down for the staff of fortified places in France, which is also to be observed in regard to the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, who commands there in the absence of the Governor-General. On the other hand, said local Governors, Lieutenant-Governors and Majors will be recommended to act towards Baron de Dieskaw as is the custom in France in fortified towns, in regard to superior officers employed on the frontiers by letters of service, without, however, Sieur de Rostaing nor even Baron de Dieskaw having the power to order off any troop belonging to the garrisons of said places, unless by command of the Governor-General or consent of the local Governor of the place where he will happen to be.

Whenever the battalions will form one corps, with the Independent companies (compagnies franches) of the Colonies, the Adjutant-General will make out the detail in chief of the whole, without difficulty.

The Governor-General, in the distribution of the detachments, will so arrange that the command be divided proportionally between the officers of the line and those of the Colonies, and when both partisan officers will be detached, that no officers be sent with them who might dispute their command.

Baron de Dieskaw will recommend all detached officers to inform him of whatever will occur, whether they be in command of the detachments or not, and he shall communicate to the Governor-General any intelligence he will receive, and any matter to provide for, which will require the intervention of such Governor's authority.

He will likewise pay attention to inform the Secretary of State at the head of the War department, of the actual situation of things, at all times when a vessel will be sent to France, and of everything of interest that occurs.

M. Duquesne to M. de Drucour.

Extract of a letter written by the Marquis Duquesne to Chevalier de Drucour, the 8th of March, 1755.

A circumstance has occurred at the Beautiful river which seems to promise me that there will be less difficulty in consolidating our new post. The Chouanons, who compose the strongest Nation in that quarter, have attacked the English, taken seventeen scalps and made ten prisoners, whom they have distributed among different tribes who have taken up the hatchet. Nothing could be so advantageous under existing circumstances, for there are no barriers equal to such defenders; but with such a fine game (for my movements are the same) the Indians must be sustained, as they would soon let go did they think that all the work was left to them. I have, in consequence, sent off a detachment on the ice, and shall, at the opening of the navigation, cause (others) to march off by brigade, as usual.

Private Instructions to M. de Vaudreuil.

Private Instructions for M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil regarding the conduct he is to observe towards the English.

Versailles, 1st of April, 1755.

To enable Sieur de Vaudreuil to conform to what his Majesty has to prescribe to him, respecting the conduct he is to observe in regard to the movements with which Canada has been for some time agitated, it is necessary to explain to him everything that relates to the pretensions the English have formed to the principal frontiers of that Colony, and which have given rise to all these movements.

By article 10, of the treaty of Utrecht, it had been agreed that Commissioners should be named on both sides to settle the boundaries between the French and British American Colonies.

On occasion of an expedition that the English fitted out, in 1718, against the fishing posts which the French had in the Islands of Canso, the two Courts did, in fact, nominate Commissioners to decide the property of these islands. The Commissioners met at Paris. At the very first conference, those of the King of England, who claimed that the Islands of Canso were dependent on Acadia, which was ceded to the English by the Treaty of Utrecht, were convinced, on inspecting the Map, which they presented themselves, that those islands were, on the contrary, included in the reserves expressed in the article of the Treaty of Utrecht containing the cession of Acadia, and that, consequently, France had retained the property thereof. They withdrew, saying they required new instructions from their Court, and did not again make their appearance. Although there had been question on different occasions that since presented themselves, of naming other Commissioners in execution of the treaty, the English had always eluded it, until the last war; and Sieur de Vaudreuil is better informed than any person how they abused the moderation which had always governed his Majesty's proceedings and views, since he has been a witness of their unceasing usurpations, on the territory of Canada, during the long peace which followed the Treaty of Utrecht.

His Majesty did flatter himself that he should eventually succeed in placing bounds to their enterprises, and securing tranquillity to his Colonies by a definite fixation of the respective limits. In consequence of the last Treaty of Aix la Chapelle, whereby that of Utrecht has been renewed, Commissioners have been named on both sides, and did meet at Paris to regulate all the disputes concerning the French and British possessions. But whatever earnestness and facilities his Majesty had lent to the this settlement, the success of the labor of these Commissaries is far from responding, up to the present time, to the hopes he had entertained thereof, from the dispositions his Britannic Majesty had caused to be evinced in that regard.

As yet, the Commissioners have not entered upon the limits of Canada further than what regards Acadia. The demands the British Commissioners have made on that subject, have laid bare the ambition and unjust views of their nation. Under pretext of the cession which has been made to England of Acadia, by Article 12 of the Treaty of Utrecht, they have claimed not only all the Peninsula in which Acadia happens to be situated, but moreover that the cession included on the one side, all the territory extending up to the South shore of the River St. Lawrence, and embraced on the other side the territory which touches the frontiers of New England. But it has not been difficult for his Majesty's Commissioners to destroy ideas so chimerical, and they have shown that the cession of Acadia ought to include only a part of the Peninsula.

The English have been meanwhile desirous to sustain, by acts of violence, the pretension put forth by their Commissioners; for, on the Acadia side, they have already erected a pretty considerable fort at Beaubassin, which is, in fact, in the Peninsula, but without the limits of Acadia. It is even probable that they would have extended their posts to the Continent itself beyond the Isthmus which separates the Peninsula from it, without waiting for the decision of the Commissioners, had not his Majesty adopted the resolution of stopping them by causing a fort to be erected at Beauséjour, and establishing other posts on that frontier; and they have undertaken last year to build on the New England side, by force of arms, a fort at Naurant Souak<sup>1</sup>, which is only 35 leagues distance from Quebec. But the Marquis Duquesne is to take measures to destroy this fort; and perhaps that expedition will have been terminated when Sieur de Vaudreuil will arrive in Canada.

He is informed of what has occurred in the direction of the Beautiful river, which the English will now include within the dependencies of Virginia. But he is not aware that, not content with endeavoring to penetrate in that direction, into the interior of the country, and there cut off the communication between Canada and Louisiana, they pretend, further, to have the right to resort to the lakes of Canada, and that the lands which are to the south of Lake Erié and of Lake Ontario belong to them.

They have not yet explained themselves respecting the extent they propose giving their Hudson bay boundaries. But it is to be expected that they will wish to stretch them to the centre of the Colony of Canada, in order to inclose it in all sides.

However that be, his Majesty is firmly resolved to maintain his rights and his possessions against pretensions so excessive and so unjust; and whatever be his love for peace, will not make for its preservation any sacrifices but those which will accord with the dignity of his Crown and the protection he owes his subjects.

Such is the principle on which his Ambassador at the Court of England has orders to labor in a negotiation that has been entered into with that court for the termination of all those differences by a provisional or definitive treaty; and it is also on that principle that his Majesty wills that Sieur de Vaudreuil do regulate his conduct in relation to these objects, until the issue of that negotiation, whereof his Majesty will have him informed.

He is, in consequence, to be on his guard against all attempts the English might make against his Majesty's possessions; carefully to avoid affording them any just cause of complaint; to act on occasions wherein there will possibly be acts of violence, in such a manner that he might not appear the aggressor, and to confine himself to the adoption of all possible measures to enable him to repel force by force.

His Majesty's intention is, in fact, that he confine himself to a strict defensive, so long as the English will not make any attack, which is to be regarded as a rupture on their part.

If, to insure this defensive, he considers it necessary to make the Indians act offensively against the English, he will be at liberty to have recourse to that expedient. But his Majesty desires that he do not determine on that course, except so far as the conduct of the English will render it indispensable for the safety and tranquillity of his government.

Supposing, in the mean time, that, notwithstanding what ought to be naturally expected from the equitable and pacific dispositions, whereof the King of Great Britain does not cease to give assurances, hostilities on the part of the English should reach the point that they must be regarded as a rupture, he should not, in that case, confine himself to a simple defensive; and his Majesty wills that, in such contingency, he make use of all the powers that have been confided to him for the operations which will be best adapted to the good of his service and the glory of his arms.

As these operations must depend on circumstances, his Majesty relies on Sieur de Vaudreuil's zeal, prudence and experience for undertaking those that will appear to him the most advantageous and the most honorable. He recommends to him only to observe, in the selection of those that he will think he can undertake, to give the preference to such as will have for object the English posts that can be wholly destroyed, such as that of Choueguen and even Fort Beaubassin, or will deserve to be preserved after he shall have become master of them, either for the purpose of increasing the Colony of Canada, as would be the case with Acadia, or of being used for exchange, according to the circumstances which will possibly occur or happen, whenever there will be question of a peace, and such would be the capture of Hudson's bay.

But before coming thus to operations of an open war, his Majesty desires that Sieur de Vaudreuil do assure himself that the English will have in fact committed absolute hostilities either against the French settlements or forts of Canada, or against some other Colonies, or at sea.

In this category may be regarded the usurpations they will possibly attempt on the unsettled lands of Canada, and on which they have undertaken to set up unfounded pretensions. His Majesty's intention meanwhile is, that so long as they will confine themselves to operations of that sort, Sieur de Vaudreuil do content himself with opposing them, and even employ force for that purpose only after he has protested and made the summons which time and circumstances will have possibly permitted. And in this regard his Majesty is very glad to enter into a fuller explanation of the pretensions of the English, in order to enable Sieur de Vaudreuil to act more understandingly on occasions relative thereto.

Independent of the Hudson bay boundary, of which there has, as yet, been no question with the English, their pretensions, as has been already observed, have for object to extend the limits of Acadia on one side as far as the South shore of the River St. Lawrence, and on the other, as far as the frontiers of New England; to include in those of Virginia the lands that reach to Lake Erie, and those of the Beautiful river; and to penetrate into the Lakes of Canada; so that in this system they would wrest from the French all the posts the latter possess south of the River St. Lawrence, and the Colony of Canada would find itself reduced to those they have on the north of that river, and wherein it would be soon crippled in consequence of the extension the English will not fail to desire to give the Hudson bay boundary.

It is true that the Court of England has declared that it would consent to modification, in the demand its Commissioners have made in regard to Acadia, but the modifications that Court has enounced, still leave too great an extent to the cession of that Province made by the Treaty of Utrecht, to admit of being adopted; and his Majesty has maintained up to the present time, that that cession includes only a part of the Peninsula. Sieur de Vaudreuil will find that question fully discussed in the Memoirs that his Majesty's Commissioners have communicated to the English Commissioners, and whereof he will cause a copy to be furnished to him. He will see therein that the pretension of the English is destroyed by their title itself, which is the Treaty of Utrecht; so that, independent of the portion of the territory of the Peninsula, that is not included in the cession made by that treaty, Sieur de Vaudreuil is to regard as dependencies of Canada, all the lands extending into the Continent from the River St. Lawrence to the frontiers of New England, and to maintain possession thereof against the attempts of the English.

3 observations are to be made respecting the frontiers of New England.

First, that in strictness and agreeably to the titles even of the English, his Majesty might claim that they are bounded by the River Sagadahock, but he consents that they extend as far as the River St. George, and possibly he will consent to extending them even as far as the River Pentagouet, according as the English will lend themselves to a conciliatory arrangement.

Secondly, that in regard to the boundary of New England inland, his Majesty is disposed to agree that it be fixed at what is called the Water shed (Eaux pendantes), that is to say, the heads of the rivers emptying into the sea.

And thirdly, that Sieur de Vaudreuil must keep secret his Majesty's dispositions, both on this latter article and on that of the River Pentagouet, his Majesty communicating it to him only that he do not undertake anything contrary thereunto until new orders from him.

In respect to the limits of Virginia, they have been acknowledged from all time to be the mountains which bound that Colony on the west. It is only since the last war that the English have set up claims to the territory on the Beautiful river, the possession whereof had never been disputed to the French, who have always resorted that river since it was discovered by Sieur de Lassale. The English have not yet alleged either title or reasons in support of their pretension. They have only given to understand that they founded it on the rights of the Iroquois; rights which they were in a position to establish, either by title of acquisition or of sovereignty over these Indians. But, 1st, the Iroquois have themselves no rights to these lands; for, besides the Iroquois having set foot on a territory being insufficient to give that Nation a title to it, 'tis certain that we were in possession of the Beautiful river before these Indians had resorted thither.

2<sup>d</sup> Title by acquisition would conflict with that by sovereignty, inasmuch as the pretended sovereignty would render the acquisition useless.

3<sup>d</sup> That sovereignty is a chimera. The English desire to establish it on the 15th Article of the Treaty of Utrecht, which states that the inhabitants of Canada will not molest the Five Nations or cantons of Indians subjects of Great Britain.

But such an enunciation, inserted in a treaty foreign to the Iroquois, can so much the less decide their condition, inasmuch as, besides their not being named in it, the same Article adds, that the respective Commissioners will explain, distinctly, which are the Indians who are or ought to be reputed subjects or friends of the one or the other Nation.

And besides, Sieur de Vaudreuil knows well that the Iroquois are very far from acknowledging any Sovereign.

It is, nevertheless, from this chimerical sovereignty that the English desire still to derive their pretended right to the territory extending from the mountains which shut in their Colonies to Lake Erié, as having belonged to the Iroquois. But this pretension destroys itself by the same reasons as that which regards the territory of the Beautiful river.

Finally, the English have not been more fortunate in their explanation of the right of resorting the lakes of Canada. They will pretend, perhaps, to support it on the same Article 15 of the Treaty of Utrecht, which states, speaking of the subjects of France, of the subjects of Great Britain and of the American subjects or friends of the two Crowns, that the one and the other will enjoy full liberty of going and coming for the good of trade.

But this disposition has never been understood to mean liberty of trade between the French and English. The general law that is established in all the European Colonies of America against all foreign trade, is enforced in Canada and the adjoining English Colonies. That trade is carried on there only fraudulently; and the liberty stipulated in the Article of the Treaty of Utrecht has never regarded any but the Indians; that is to say, that the Indian allies of France may go to the English to trade, as those who are allies of England may come to the French; but this is the extent of that liberty; for the Indians, allies of France and located on its territory, cannot receive the English in their villages (chez eux) in the same manner as those who are allies of England and settled on English soil, cannot admit the French among them.

Such are the principles according to which Sieur de Vaudreuil is to be guided in whatever he will have to do in relation to the pretensions of the English, and the various movements to which they will, possibly, give rise. His Majesty expects from him that he will conform himself thereto with all the exactness and wisdom that these important objects may demand. But he recommends him, in every case, not to undertake any movement except with all the precautions necessary to insure its success, and to reconcile, as much as possible, those which he will have occasion to make for the defence of his government and the preservation of the rights and possessions dependent thereupon, with the views of the greatest economy, which he must make his principal study in every sort of expense.

Done at Versailles, 1st of April, 1755.

Extract from the Instruction of Sieur de Vaudreuil de Cavagnac, Governor and Lieutenant-General of New France, 1755.

Of all departments of the administration confided to Sieur de Vaudreuil, that which demands the closest attention is the government of the Indians. He is informed that Canada is inhabited by numerous nations, and so much the more difficult to be restrained, as levity and inconstancy constitute their most ordinary characteristic.

The experience acquired by Sieur de Vaudreuil in this important department, and the reputation he has long enjoyed among all these nations, induce his Majesty to hope that he will profit by these advantages with all the success to be desired in the most interesting circumstances. But whatever confidence the King may feel in him, he cannot avoid entering here into some particular explanations on the principles to be adhered to in this regard.

His Majesty desires that he will apply all the attention in his power to avoid, as much as possible, Indian wars. There are people in Canada much opposed to this principle. But it is no less true that these descriptions of wars serve most frequently only to occasion a great deal of expense and to disturb the tranquillity of the Colony, without being productive of any real advantage; and 'tis equally certain that they have been for the most part caused only by private interests. Therefore, Sieur de Vaudreuil cannot be too much on his guard against all the insinuations which may be offered him in this matter.

Yet, 'tis not that his Majesty agrees to submit to certain insults on the part of the Indians; and he is far from doing so. He means, on the contrary, that firmness is, in fact, necessary in certain cases, in order to restrain them. The evil is, and his Majesty has had occasion to perceive it more than once, that 'tis very customary in Canada to make great noise and even to commence wars for private commercial transactions of very little interest to the nation, whilst insults, that cause it to be despised, are tolerated, whereby the greatest disorders are produced.

Sieur de Vaudreuil will have to labor to effect another change in the system of the government of the Indians of Canada. In view of occupying and weakening them, the opinion has been to embrace every occasion to foment and excite wars among them. This policy, which is very foreign to the sentiments of justice and humanity that animate his Majesty, might be of advantage, and perhaps even necessary in the infancy of the Colony. But in the condition to which these nations are now reduced, and in their actual dispositions generally, it is more proper, in all respects, that the French act towards them the part of protectors and pacificators. The Indians will feel more respect and attachment for them in consequence. The Colony will thereby enjoy more quiet, and his Majesty will be saved more expense, not counting the number of French that always perish on these occasions. Cases, however, may present themselves, in which it is fit to excite war against nations who are ill disposed to, and might declare themselves openly against, the French. But in these cases, even, 2 things are to be observed: one, to endeavor first to gain over these same nations by reconciling them with those who are faithful; and the other, to be as certain as possible that the latter will not suffer too much by these wars.

There is another principle long established in Canada, and which his Majesty remarks is followed on all occasions. This is to draw the Indian Nations from the places they have selected as their abode, and to bring them near some French posts. The spirit of trade has contributed more than anything else to inspire this course of thinking and acting. It is, in general, a very bad use of his Majesty's money and the Commandant's authority or credit, to employ it for these sorts of migrations. The Indian allies ought to be considered well everywhere, provided it be not on English territory nor in the neighborhood of any nation openly hostile to the French; and without paying too much attention to the profit of traders nor to the prejudices entertained by many persons on this point, Sieur de Vandreuil is to allow certain nations the liberty of wandering and roaming throughout the territory of the Colony, provided they do not receive any strangers; for the latter is the most essential point.

His Majesty has had occasion, likewise, to remark in the different accounts which have been laid before him of what has occurred in relation to the Indians, that of late years they make a speculation of receiving English belts and flags, and of, then, carrying them to the French to receive presents in return. All that is very expensive to his Majesty, and moreover indecent. 'Tis not proper to be the dupe of these sort of manœuvres. Sieur de Vaudreuil must put an end thereto; this will be so much the less difficult, inasmuch as they are but too often encouraged by the French themselves.

M. Prévost to M. de Machault.

We are no longer uneasy on account of the ships Le Bizarre and Le Défenseur. The former entered this port yesterday and the latter has cast anchor an hour ago; thus all M<sup>r</sup> de Salvert's division is fortunately safe.

There are very few sick in this fleet; the officers and troops of the line have borne the voyage excellently.

I am waiting most impatiently for news from the Gulf, to learn whether M<sup>r</sup> Dubois de La Motte has collected any ships there, and entered the river; as soon as I shall have any news of them I will profit by the first opportunity to acquaint you thereof.

Whilst I have the honor of writing to you, I receive letters from Virginia and Newfoundland, which have been secretly transmitted to me, and with a great deal of caution. The one confirm me that our posts at the Beautiful river, at Crown Point, at the River St. John and at Beausejour are to be attacked by 13,000 regulars, in three divisions; and the latter assure me that they are expecting at Chibouctou 9 ships of war, which are probably those that gave fight to L'Alcide. I am assured, also, that there are six frigates in the Bay of Fundy. The English do not desire, according to these letters, to attack any of our old settlements unless there be a rupture in Europe, but they are resolved to make every attempt to put themselves in possession of the territory they regard at theirs, as far as the banks of the River St. Lawrence. They do not say a word to our little coasting vessels, and have told some that they would not attack merchantmen as long as those of their nation would not be meddled with.

I am led to expect some flour and refreshments, on condition of going for them to sea or to some uninhabited ports of Newfoundland, because no Englishman dare venture on our coasts. Whoever will be convicted of doing so risks his neck; in order to execute your commands I shall be obliged to run the hazard of that transport. I shall consult with Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Salvart and de Drucour, and do all in my power, whatever it may cost, to procure provisions for the Colony.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Louisbourg, 14th June, 1755.

Journal of M. de Vaudreuil's Voyage to Canada.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Extract of a letter, dated Quebec, 4th July last, received the 16th of August, 1755, containing an abstract of a Journal of what occurred up to the arrival of M. Dubois de la Mothe.

1755, 3<sup>d</sup> May. The two fleets sailed from Brest at noon and steered south as far as Cape Finisterre. One of them was composed of fourteen ships, three of which were armed, and two frigates commanded by Count Dubois de La Mothe, destined to transport the six battalions of Regular troops to Canada; the other consisted of six ships and three frigates armed, commanded of M. de Macnemara, who had the chief command, which was destined to convoy that of M. Dubois de la Mothe as far as a certain latitude.

4th, 5th and 6th We were followed by an English frigate, which made signals to a snow farther off. When about to double Cape Finisterre, on the 5th, we had a calm of 24 hours, duration, which gave the English frigate time to beat around and examine us. Our Generals did not appear to think much of it.

7th M. de Macnemara had chase given her and she disappeared.

8th At noon the two fleets separated. We were then in the 42<sup>d</sup> degree of Latitude, and in the meridian of Ferro.

9th to the 14th We were delayed by the calm, and by the ship L'esperance, which allowed herself to be carried to leeward, and after having joined had one of her cross-trees broken, though the wind was quite light. We got along wonderfully up to the , and perceived by the birds, fogs and icebergs that we were near the Grand Bank; on that day M. Dubois de la Mothe opened the orders from the Court, which directed the separation of six vessels, to wit: Le Bizarre, L'Esperance, Le Dauphin Royal, Le Défenseur, L'Acquillon and La Commette, under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de Salvart, with the battalions of Artois and Burgundy, in order to proceed to Louisbourg.

The boat of each ship consequently proceeded on board the Commodore to receive instructions. The fog and wind, which suddenly rose, exposed the boats to great danger of being wrecked on their return. During the night the wind was very violent.

27th Made the Great Bank; we experienced cold, fogs, calm, the pleasure of codfishing and the ceremony of the baptism.

30th and 31st The fog was so dense that the entire fleet was dispersed to such an extent that it did not come together any more. The Commodore remained with three ships, Le Bizarre, Le Denseur and L'Actif.

4th June. The Commodore perceived at day break, in the channel, between the Great and Green Bank (banc a vert) ten ships, which he took to be his fleet, and bore down on them, showing them the signal for closing up; but by the signals these ten ships were making to one another he perceived they were English, who on their side were closing on him, without, however, any press of sail. The fog, which supervened apropos, saved him, but made him lose the three ships he had; meanwhile everything was ready for battle in case of attack. During the night several discharges of cannon were heard.

Two fishing vessels, from Acadia, that he afterwards met and hailed to come on board, declared that the English had collected in Bay Verte, which lies between the Island of St. John and Acadia, forty little vessels for the embarkation of troops.

All the vessels destined for Quebec had orders, in case of being separated, to reconnoitre Gaspé where the frigates (Le Diane, 22, and La Fidele, 24 guns), which had left Rochefort in the month of March last, were to wait for them, to furnish each with a pilot acquainted with the river; but these frigates instead of being there, as the Court had directed, were at the Island of Bic, that is to say, 80 leagues farther up the river.

17th June. The Commodore (L'Entreprenant) arrived at the Island of Bic with two of his ships that joined him in the river; he learned there that two which were carrying troops had passed on the previous evening.

Two royal gabares, which sailed from Brest before the fleet, and had been separated by heavy weather at the mouth of the Channel, arrived at Bic on the 5th of June; they reported to the Commodore that they had both met, on the first of May, the one in latitude 48 degrees, 18 English men of war, and on the following day five more; the other, in latitude 20 minutes more northerly, met 10 other vessels of war belonging to the same Nation.

15th Two ships, Le Leopard and L'Illustre, of those that were transporting the troops, joined the Commodore at Bic. At this rate, there are missing no more than three of those for Qubec, one of which is an armed vessel, and the other two, troop ships.

26th One vessel, L'Actif, with troops, anchored before Quebec; two are missing, L'Alcide and Le Lys, whereof there are no tidings.<sup>1</sup>

ACADIA.

The news received from Canada on the 15th December, 1775,<sup>1</sup> state that the English had abandoned Fort St. John, on the river of that name; that M. de Boishebert, commanding in that part of New France, having been desirous of proceeding towards Fort Beausejour, encountered an English party of 300 men whom he had defeated; that M. de Villejouis, Commandant of the Island of St. John, had received, on his island, all the most wealthy Acadian farmers who came thither for protection after the invasion of the English, to whom they would not swear allegiance and in whose favor they would not take up arms against France.

M. Duquesne to M. de Vaudreuil.

Memoir respecting the Ohio and its dependencies, Fort Niagara, Fort St. Frederic, the suppression of certificates, the regulation of the Posts, the new Mission of Lake St. Francis, the Militia of the Colony and the horrible abuse of ardent spirits. Addressed to the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

By Sieur de Contrecoeur's letter of the 24th of May last, the works of Fort Duquesne are completed. It is at present mounted with six pieces of cannon of six, and nine of two @ three pound ball; it was in want of neither arms nor ammunition, and since Sieur de Beaujeu's arrival, it must be well supplied, as he had carried with his brigade succors of every description.

Note by M. de Vaudreuil. I must explain to the Marquis de Vaudreuil that much difficulty is experienced in conveying all sorts of effects as far as Fort Duquesne; for, independent of the Niagara carrying place, there is still that of Presqu'isle,<sup>1</sup> six leagues in length. There was then going 2,405 sacks of flour, pork in proportion, and 150 minots of Indian corn.

The latter fort, which is on Lake Erie, serves as a dépôt for all the others on the Ohio; the effects are next rode to the fort on the River au Bœuf, where they are put on board pirogues to run down to Fort Machault, one-half of which is on the River Ohio, and the other half in the River au Bœuf<sup>2</sup>, and serves as a dépôt for Fort Duquesne. This new post has been in existence only since this year, because it has been remarked that too much time was consumed in going in one trip from the fort on River au Bœuf to Fort Duquesne, to the loss of a great quantity of provisions which have been spoiled by bad weather. 'Tis to be hoped that, by dispatching the convoys opportunely from Fort Machaults, everything will arrive safe and sound in twice twenty-four hours; besides, it will be much more convenient at Fort Duquesne to send only to Fort Machaults for supplies.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil must be informed that, during the first campaigns on the Ohio, a horrible waste and disorder prevailed at the Presq'isle and Niagara carrying places, which cost the King immense sums. We have remedied all the abuses that have come to our knowledge, by submitting these portages to competition. The first is at forty sous the piece, and the other, which is six leagues in extent, at fifty. But we do not think the contractors can realize anything in consequence of the mortality among the horses and other expenses to which they are subject.

Had we been favored with any tranquillity, nothing would have been easier than to supply Fort Duquesne, by having the stores of Fort Presq'isle filled during the summer, the horses could have rode the supplies during the winter to that of the River au Bœuf, whence they might be sent down the Ohio on the first melting of the ice; but continual and urgent movements up to the present time have not afforded leisure to ride the effects in winter, and the horses are dying, which has determined us to give orders to draw from the Ohio as many of them as possible.

Fort Duquesne could in less than two years support itself, since, in the very first year, 700 minots of Indian corn have been gathered there, and, from the clearings that have been made there since, it is calculated that if the harvest were good, at least 2000 minots could be saved. Peas are now planted, and they have two cows, one bull, some horses and twenty-three sows with young.

At Fort Machault where the land is very fertile, it will be easy to have the same resource.

At River au Bœuf the land is not so good, but it is expected that peas, Indian corn and oats will easily grow there. Hogs can be easily raised there; they have already nine; the prairies in that quarter, which are extensive, furnish only bad hay, but it is easy to get rid of it.

At Presqu'isle there is the same uniformity of land, but the hay is very abundant and good on it.

'Tis to be observed that the quantity of pirogues constructed at the River au Bœuf has exhausted all the large trees in the neighborhood of that post; it is very important to send carpenters there soon, to build some plank bateaux like those of the English. Two advantages will result therefrom; a much greater load can be carried, and the inconvenience of readily upsetting, so common to pirogues, will be avoided.

The site of Fort Niagara is to be changed, as it is undermined by the lake and crumbling in every direction.

Fort St. Frederic is threatening to fall on all sides, in consequence of the walls being too weak to support the terraces. It could be located with more advantage near Carillon. The Court is informed of the sad state of all these forts which constitute the keys of the Colony, and I have transmitted a project thither for the settlement of Gaspé that is not less important.

On arriving in this Colony I found that the officers of the posts in the Upper Countries had the right to issue certificates, under color of stopping the Indians who wished to change their abode, and on equally specious pretexts. I have wholly reformed them, unless the General issue orders to put the Indians in motion, which is at the expense of the King.

M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil will find the explanation of the arrangements of the posts; it is the same that I have sent to the Court. He will also find the regulation of the posts which fixes the limits of each.

Although we informed the Marquis de Vaudreuil of the motives which have induced us to allow the missionaries of the Sault a new mission on Lake St. Francis, in order to attract the Mohawks thither, who had evinced some repugnance to come to the Sault, either because the land there was not fertile, or rather because they had remarked that Brandy was as abundant among their praying brethren as among the English, I repeat to him that it had never been my intention to settle the people of the Sault there, but on the contrary to attract those Mohawks and the Indians belonging to the Five Nations who would like to come thither, having already taken some steps. I have reported to the Court the necessity that existed of attracting the Mohawks to a place they asked of me, the rather as Father Billiard<sup>1</sup> in M<sup>r</sup> Varin's presence, demanded no greater advance than one hundred pistoles, at most, for a saw-mill, and that he would undertake all the rest.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil will find the militia of the country in perfect order, and submissive. It is now armed and provided with twenty rounds of powder and ball, but this cannot be preserved, except by paying attention to the reviews which I have ordered to be held every month for the inspection of arms and ammunition. When I commanded it for the Ohio, I established a rotation (tour de role), which has been so closely followed, that all my levies have been made without any murmur.

<sup>1</sup> ROBERT JEAN BTE. BILLIARD, S. J., is represented as having come to Canada in 1715. Liste Chronologique, No. 423. He was Missionary to the Indians at the Sault St. Louis, otherwise called Caghnawaga, from 1754 to 1756. Mr. Shea's Manuscript List. He is said to have died on the 8th October, 1760. — Ed.

To be prepared for all events, I have established throughout the Colony a reserve in all the Militia Companies, which amounts to thirteen hundred men. This reserve is not only named by the captains, but is ready to march at the first warning. This establishment appears to me of so much importance, that I should advise the renewal of this reserve every six months, as well in peace as in war, by which means the General would always have wherewith to offer immediate opposition to unexpected movements, even were it necessary to double the reserve in case of a coup de main. The Indians, who would meditate an attack or a robbery of a settler in his house, will certainly be very careful when they will be aware that the man is able to defend himself.

M. de Vaudreuil has read in the letter of Sieur Benoist, the Commandant at Presqu'isle, the dangers the people are exposed to by this cursed traffic in brandy, which is maintained and protected, and whose source he will soon ascertain.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil will have the means of knowing the orders I have issued to, and the punishment I have inflicted on, those who were selling brandy to the Indians at Montreal, and that I have reduced the Voyageurs to three barrels per canoe.

M. de Salvert to M. de Machault.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to report to you in my letters of the 16th and 17th of June, my arrival at Louisbourg on the 12th. The division of the fleet under my command had entirely come together again on the 14th, and the battalions of Artois and Burgundy arrived there in as good condition as if they had changed from one garrison to another in France. I have rendered you an account, my Lord, in the same despatches, of the latitude I have left M. Dubois de la Motte in on the 9th, and of the principal events which occurred during our voyage up to that time. I expect that he entered the gulf on the 12th with the ship L'Actif, and that he will have found the remainder of his fleet at the first anchorage ground in the river, with the exception of the ships L'Alcide and Le Lis, which have been captured by the English fleet and sent into Olifax.

This fleet, my Lord, presented itself at the mouth of the Louisbourg harbor on the 21st, in order of battle, so as to create the impression that it intended to take the place at a dash; 'tis very probable that the sight of the King's ships prevented such a proceeding; they then numbered 15. Two seen by the schooners at the same time off Cape Canso, and two which took L'Alcide and Le Lis into Olifax, make 19 ships or frigates the English have in those seas, independent of the small craft armed at Boston, to cut off the communication with Louisbourg, and to keep an eye on us. I have considered it my duty to inform you, my Lord, of everything that has come to my knowledge on this point, in order that you may be preadvised of the difficulties I should have to surmount, in order to seize the favorable moment to escape from these troublesome cruisers.

The English fleet made its appearance on the 15th of June off these coasts, and has not left since that time. Its cruise extends from Canso to the Island of Scatary. This manœuvre of theirs, my Lord, has given me reason to observe to you in my letter of the 21st, that M. Dubois de La Motte must have entered the gulf unmolested. I have taken care to inform him, by different opportunities, of all that has come to my knowledge since my arrival here, in order that he adopt precautions on his return. I do the like again to-day, by two vessels which are conveying to Quebec a portion of the garrisons belonging to Forts Beausejour and Gasparo, that has been made prisoners by the English, as Chevalier de Drucourt must have advised you.

The English fleet again made its appearance on the 1st of July; it anchored beyond the range of cannon shot, between Green Island and Black Cape, its boats and canoes to seaward; passed the night, which was very calm, there. Every preparation was made for their reception, had the desire seized them to attempt anything; but these gentlemen are so prudent as not to act, except on a certainty and when they have an easy game.

I am unable to tell you precisely, my Lord, when I shall have it in my power to execute the King's order thoroughly; I have, up to this time, done all in my power. The principal matter will now depend on a lucky chance, which I shall seize if it presents, and you can rely that I shall not neglect anything to entirely accomplish my mission.

I am with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

On board the Bizarre, in the } Louisbourg roads, 6th July. }

Most obedient servant,
(Signed) PERIER DE SALVERT.

There is every appearance, my Lord, that I shall be constrained to separate the King's ships. I have not yet adopted any conclusion on this point nor on the quantity of provisions I shall leave in store at Louisbourg. Time and circumstances will decide the course to be taken. I shall consult Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Davucour<sup>1</sup> and Prevost respecting it. It is very necessary to keep all these movements quite secret here, in consequence of the acquaintances the neighbors have preserved at this place.

An Account of the Battle of the Monongahela, 9th July, 1755.

[ No. 189 in the Carton marked "1755, Marine;" Dépôt Général de la Guerre, Paris. ]

M. de Contreccœur, Captain of Infantry, Commandant of Fort Duquesne, on the Ohio, having been informed that the English were taking up arms in Virginia for the purpose of coming to attack him, was advised, shortly afterwards, that they were on the march. He dispatched scouts, who reported to him faithfully their progress. On the 17th instant he was advised that their army, consisting of 3000 regulars from Old England, were within six leagues of this fort. That officer employed the next day in making his arrangements; and on the ninth detached M. de Beaujeu, seconded by Mess<sup>rs</sup> Dumas and de Lignery, all three Captains, together with four Lieutenants, 6 Ensigns, 20 Cadets, 100 Soldiers, 100 Canadians and 600 Indians, with orders to lie in ambush at a favorable spot, which he had reconnoitred the previous evening. The detachment, before it could reach its place of destination, found itself in presence of the enemy within three leagues of that fort. M<sup>r</sup> de Beaujeu, finding his ambush had failed, decided on an attack. This he made with so much vigor as to astonish the enemy, who were waiting for us in the best possible order; but their artillery, loaded with grape (à cartouche), having opened its fire, our men gave way in turn. The Indians, also, frightened by the report of the cannon rather than by any damage it could inflict, began to yield, when M. de Beaujeu was killed. M. Dumas began to encourage his detachment. He ordered the officers in command of the Indians to spread themselves along the wings so as to take the enemy in flank, whilst he, M. de Lignery and the other officers who led the French, were attacking them in front. This order was executed so promptly that the enemy, who were already shouting their "Long live the King," thought now only of defending themselves. The fight was obstinate on both sides and success long doubtful; but the enemy at last gave way. Efforts were made, in vain, to introduce some sort of order in their retreat. The whoop of the Indians, which echoed through the forest, struck terror into the hearts of the entire enemy. The rout was complete. We remained in possession of the field with six brass twelves and sixes, four howitz-carriages of 50, 11 small royal grenade mortars, all their ammunition, and, generally, their entire baggage. Some deserters, who have come in since, have told us that we had been engaged with only 2000 men, the remainder of the army being four leagues further off. These same deserters have informed us that the enemy were retreating to Virginia, and some scouts, sent as far as the height of land, have confirmed this by reporting that the thousand men who were not engaged, had been equally panic-stricken and abandoned both provisions and ammunition on the way. On this intelligence, a detachment was dispatched after them, which destroyed and burnt everything that could be found. The enemy have left more than 1000 men on the field of battle. They have lost a great portion of the artillery and ammunition, provisions, as also their General, whose name was M<sup>r</sup> Braddock,<sup>1</sup> and almost all their officers. We have had 3 officers killed; 2 officers and 2 cadets wounded. Such a victory, so entirely unexpected, seeing the inequality of the forces, is the fruit of M<sup>r</sup> Dumas' experience, and of the activity and valor of the officers under his command.

<sup>1</sup> Major-General EDWARD BRADDOCK, only son of Major-General B., was born towards the close of the 17th century. He entered the Army as Ensign in the Grenadier company of the Coldstream Guards, 11th October, 1710; on 1st August, 1716, was appointed Lieutenant, and fought a duel, with sword and pistol, with Colonel Waller, 26th May, 1718; on the 30th October, 1734, he became Captain-Lieutenant, and on the 10th February, 1736, Captain, with the Army-rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. He served in Flanders; became second Major of his regiment in 1743; was present at the battle of Fontenoy, 11th May, 1745, and was appointed 1st Major of the Coldstreams, and Lieutenant-Colonel 21st November, 1745, Brigadier-General, April 23d, 1746, and in 1747 and 1748, served again in Flanders. In 1753 he was appointed Colonel of the 14th Foot; in March, of the following year, Major-General; and on 24th September, Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's troops in America. He sailed from England 21st December, 1754; arrived at Hampton Roads, Virginia, 20th February, 1755, and was killed on the banks of the Monongahela, in Western Pennsylvania, on the 9th July of the same year. Sargent's History of Braddock's Expedition. In private character he seems to have been a heartless, broken down gambler and spendthrift. — Ed.

Quebec, 10th of July, 1755.

My Lord,

I had the honor to inform you, in my letter of the 2nd instant, that the English were sending a number of people towards Chouaguen, where they had built sloops carrying 10 guns, and two sorts of little galleys; that a force of 3000 men were assembling also at Fort Necessity, within about 40 leagues of Fort Duquesne, where the van-guard, consisting of 700 men, had already arrived.

We had confirmation of this intelligence from some reliable Indians belonging to different villages, who had given us pretty strong assurances of it, not admitting of a doubt. They have also added, as a very sure thing, that 4000 men were going to Choueguin; that the 5 Nations would form the wings of this army; that the English were desirous of seeing Niagara and Fort Frontenac, and that 600 bateaux had, moreover, been built at Orange, where they were busy constructing a great many others; that 5000 men were encamped outside Orange, covering two leagues of country; that this army was to march against Fort St. Frederic, and afterwards advance on our settlements on this Continent. I am about sending, my Lord, some reinforcements to the latter fort, but this diversion will not cause me to make any change in my Lake Ontario project, which I had the honor to communicate to you. The preservation of Niagara is what interests us the most. Were our enemies masters of it, and to retain Choueguin, the Upper countries would be lost to us, and we should have no further communication with the river Oyo.

I had the honor to inform you that I should order 400 men whom I would take from Presqu'isle, to fall back on Niagara, but the danger to which Fort Duquesne is exposed has caused me to change my mind, and they will proceed to the latter post.

I will confess to you, my Lord, that I find myself much embarrassed, and that I think any other person in my place would be equally so. I arrive in a country where, I am assured, everything is peaceable; I find, in consequence, no store of provisions laid in, no carriages built, and I must oppose the enemy's attacks on all sides in less than six weeks. The necessary preparations are hastening forward, and notwithstanding Mr Bigot's activity, I doubt if he will be able to put me in a condition to carry out my plans completely.

You will learn this autumn, my Lord, the success of my projected operations, and the event alone will enable me to decide as to the demands I shall have to make on you.

I start to-morrow for Montreal, where my presence is necessary both for the dispatch of the troops and the levy of militia.

I have the honor to be, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. Duquesne to M. de Machault.

My Lord,

I have the honor to inform you that M. de Vaudreuil went up to Montreal on the 12th instant, for the purpose of accelerating the movements he is to make towards Choueguen. These become always the more imperative in consequence of the forces the English are sending in that direction, and of the sloops they are constructing in all haste to cruise on Lake Ontario; I have no doubt of the success of Baron Dieskaw, who is intrusted with that operation.

No one in the Colony is ignorant that I have offered my services to M. de Vaudreuil for so important an operation, and that I caused it to be observed to him, that Canadian though he was, he could not have the same facilities, either for promptly assembling his militia, or yet for accelerating their departure. I received no other answer from him than that he was going up to Montreal; on this refusal, I communicated to him, my Lord, the letter you have done me the honor to write me on the 1st of April. He again answered me, that he was going up to Montreal. I have, nevertheless, prepared for him the plan of this expedition in Baron Dieskaw's presence, and have persuaded him to employ Sieurs Dean<sup>1</sup> and Le Mercier for the arrangement and prompt execution of this enterprise, these two officers having, in my movements against the enemy, afforded me strong proofs of capacity. I have placed in the hands of this new Governor some memoirs of what I have done in this Colony, and on all matters of most interest, and which require considerable attention for the maintenance of that order, regularity and economy I have introduced everywhere under my resort. I have, moreover, furnished him with a memoir of what I should have done, had the Colony devolved on me at the present conjuncture.

I cannot forbear expressing to you, my Lord, my sensibility at your not having been pleased to leave the operations in Canada to me until the fall. I nevertheless expected this favor in consideration of my labor, and the knowledge I have acquired. I have been so painfully affected thereby, that, after having performed all my duty to my successor and seeing how useless I am, I have requested of Count Dubois de la Motte the frigate La Diane, to go to Rochefort, to which place I prefer to proceed.

I am with most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DUQUESNE.

Quebec, 15th of July, 1755.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 24th July, 1755.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to report to you in my letters of the 2nd and 10th of this month, the sad condition of the Colony; that it was so much the more surprising to, as it was quite unexpected by, me, relying on the assurance which the Marquis Duquesne had given me that the government was quiet, that he had provided against everything, and that there was not a semblance of any movement on the part of the English.

Since my arrival at Montreal, I do not cease to learn the confirmation of the bad news which have increased so excessively that I cannot, consistently with my duty, forbear having the honor of laying them before you.

The English are increasing from day to day, and do not hesitate to tell the Indians especially, that they will take Fort St. Frederic, Fort Du Quesne, Niagara, Fort Frontenac and La Présentation. Their views on all these points are by no means doubtful, according to the reports which have been unanimously made to the Commandants of these posts, by their scouts, and by a number of prisoners in succession, the one after the other. I have interrogated all these prisoners, and none have contradicted the information I have received.

The English appear always to have a design on Fort St. Frederic, and to make arrangements with that view at Orange. These movements have even so frightened the settlers, whose lands are without the fort, that they have abandoned them. The detachment I have sent off to establish a camp of observation there, must have arrived at its destination. I have given orders to the Commandant to send scouts out continually, and to transmit their report to me forthwith.

Fort Duquesne is really threatened. On the 7th of this month the English were within 6 or 8 leagues of it; I am informed by letter that they number 3000, being provided with artillery and other munitions for a siege.

I would not be uneasy about this fort, if the officer in command there had all these forces; they consist of about 1600 men, including regulars, militia and Indians.

With which he would be in a condition to form parties sufficiently considerable to annoy the march of the English from the first moment he had any knowledge thereof; these parties would have harassed, and assuredly repulsed them. Everything was in our favor in this regard, and affording us a very considerable advantage.

But unfortunately no foresight had been employed to supply that fort with provisions and munitions of war, so that the Commandant, being in want of the one and the other, is obliged to employ the major portion of his men in making journeys to and fro for the purpose of transporting those provisions and munitions, which cannot even reach him in abundance, in consequence of the delay at the Presq'isle portage and the lowness of the water in the River au Bœuf.

I must also observe that Fort Duquesne has never been completed; on the contrary, 'tis open to many capital defects, as is proved by the annexed plan.

'Tis true that the Commandant, urged by the officers of the garrison, who perceived all these defects, took upon himself early in the spring, to demand sub-engineer de Lery of the Commandant at Detroit, which officer had put the fort in the best condition he was able, without, however, daring to make any alteration in it.

I dread with reason, my Lord, the first intelligence from that fort, and shall be agreeably surprised if the English have been forced to abandon their expedition.

In regard to Niagara, 'tis certain that, should the English once attack it, 'tis theirs.

I am informed that fort is so dilapidated, that 'tis impossible to put a peg in it without causing it to crumble; stanchions have been obliged to be set up against it to support it. Its garrison consists of thirty men without any muskets. Sieur de Villiers has been detached with about 200 men, to form a camp of observation there.

Such, my Lord, is a true abstract of the condition in which M. Duquesne surrendered the government to me, in respect to the parts I have treated of.

I do not think that I ought to conceal from you that the preparations of the English were not unknown to the Colony; they have been generally known, even from the moment of their inception. 'Twould have been easy in the beginning to extinguish them without compromising ourselves. I add that the two English captains who are here as hostages,<sup>1</sup> have had as much liberty as if they had been invited to learn thoroughly our situation. They have had the run of the villages of our domiciliated Indians, with whom they have had conferences, and have even advised their Governors of our forces and plans. I have had them confined.

The evil is done; 'tis so visible that I can say, without partiality, that it would have been desirable that I had been in possession of this government three years ago. The Colony and the finances would not be so excessively exhausted.

How serious soever the evil, I must apply a remedy to it; and, in order to carry out my views and my zeal in this regard, I should not lose sight of my project against Chouaguen, inasmuch as on the success of that project depends the peace of the Colony.

The expedition against Chouaguen, which at all times would have been easy, is now unfortunately very difficult, and that (I cannot but repeat) because the English have experienced no impediment to their labors and ambition.

The security of the Colony has even rendered them so proud, that having at length attained the degree of perfection to which they aspired, they have boldly raised the mask, and in the very beginning of June have been sufficiently daring to fire three balls at the King's flag which was floating from the boat of an officer that was conducting a detachment to the Beautiful river.

They have actually two and perhaps three flat-bottomed sloops with sweeps, armed for war, cruising on Lake Ontario; from one day to another they are to launch other vessels for the like purpose.

I am informed, by letters of the 20th of this month, that these two sloops have been, with several bateaux, beyond Quinté, where the English have landed, and that it is certain they are to go to Niagara.

Chouaguen is no longer a trading house; 'tis regularly fortified and suitably provided with cannon.

There is a second fort equally provided with artillery.

The woods that surrounded Chouaguen, and militated against its defence, no longer exist; the approaches to it have been rendered difficult.

The number there is large, and is becoming still more so every moment, by the troops which are coming from Orange.

Nevertheless, my Lord, I act with confidence, and dare flatter myself that I shall pull down Chouaguen.

The army will consist of about 4300 men, 2300 of whom will be regulars, 1800 Canadians and 500 domiciliated Indians. I am rejoiced to see that the one and the other evince great zeal in fulfilling my desires.

This army will be supplied with some pieces of portative artillery and generally with munitions of war and utensils necessary for a siege.

Since the 12th of this month, the troop have been filing off by brigade on their way to Fort Frontenac. I hope the remainder of the army will have left Montreal by the 10th of this month, and that, unless there be unfavorable weather, the whole of my forces will be reunited at Fort Frontenac by the 25th of the same month.

I should have had extreme satisfaction, my Lord, in marching at the head of the army persuaded of the effect my zeal for the King's service and for my country would have infused among the Canadian soldiers, and especially among the Indians. But Fort St. Frederic being equally menaced, my presence becomes necessary at Montreal.

Baron de Dieskau will command this army. I confer daily with him, and see, with pleasure, that he desires, ardently, to accomplish my views.

As for the Five Nations, I do not expect their aid, but do not despair of their neutrality.

Chouaguen, ever since it was founded, is the rendezvous of the various Indian Nations. 'Tis from Chouaguen all the Belts and Messages go, that the English scatter among the Nations of the Upper country. It has been always at Chouaguen that the English have held Council with the Nations, and by means of presents, principally intoxicating liquors, have made them resolve to murder the French.

In fine, 'tis, consequently, Chouaguen which is the direct cause of all the troubles that have overtaken the Colony, and of the vast expense they have occasioned the King.

From the destruction of Chouaguen will follow :

On the one hand, the perfect attachment of all the Upper country Indians; on the other, a considerable diminution of the expense the King annually incurs for the Colony.

Should the Five Nations have sided with the English, they will abandon them the moment Chouaguen no longer exists.

The Indian Nations, having the English no longer as a resource for obtaining intoxicating liquors, I shall insensibly cut off, at certain posts, the sale of brandy, which is injurious to the good of the service and of commerce.

These same Indians not recognizing, and being unable to have dealings with any but the French, the prodigious quantity of Beaver and Peltry that used to pass to the English, will, from that moment, reënter into the trade of France.

I beg of you, my Lord, to be persuaded of my exactness in performing all that my instructions prescribe to me, and that I shall do everything in my power to signalize my zeal for the King's service.

I am, with the most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. Bréard to M. de Machault.

Quebec, 13th of August, 1755.

My Lord,

M<sup>r</sup> Bigot's absence at Montreal since the 20th of July, and my own uncertainty as to whether the despatches he has sent me for the Court, and which I have handed to the Captain of the King's Express boat La Macreuse, on the point of sailing for Brest, will arrive safe, induce me to take the liberty of sending to your address, my Lord, by the ship Les deux frères de St. Vallery, Captain Elie, for Rochelle, copies of the pieces that the Intendant has sent me from Montreal on the subject of the Action which took place on the 9th of last month, within three leagues of Fort Duquesne, between a party of 900 men, whereof 250 were Canadians and 650 Indians, under the command of M. de Beaujeu, and 2000 English, being part of a force of 3000 men who were on their way to attack that fort.

M<sup>r</sup> Bigot directs me, my Lord, in his letter of the 7th instant, to send up to Montreal, with all possible diligence, 300 farmers required by M. de Vaudreuil from the Government of Quebec, and 50 from that of Three Rivers, to save the grain harvest, all the men belonging to the district of Montreal, fit to march, having been commanded to defend the approaches to Fort St. Frederic against the English, who are going thither with a force of 3000 men and a train of artillery. As the safety of the Colony depends on the safety of this harvest, which is expected to be good, I have not neglected anything to second the zeal of M<sup>r</sup> Bigot, and his requisition has been supplied. The capture of the fort is to be apprehended, should the enemy approach near enough to lay siege to it, these works being of no account and its garrison weak.

The movements of the English at Choüaguen, my Lord, are very considerable. The last advices received from that post state, that there are nearly 6000 men to guard it, and to oppose the designs of the French in that quarter. They do not want for artillery; they have some cannon even on board their sloops that navigate Lake Ontario, on which they have likewise a number of bateaux. The French army, which is formed at Montreal, is over 5000 men, the greater part of whom have proceeded to Niagara. 'Tis sufficiently provided with necessaries. I dare not enter into the detail of these movements, not being sufficiently conversant with them.

If the Colony be fortunate enough, my Lord, to escape the capture of Fort St. Frederic, and to make some progress against Chouaguen, it will be protected, for this campaign, against the incursions of the enemy, and the Indians of the Five Nations will assuredly decide, this winter, in favor of the French, and other Nations will follow their example.

Count du Bois de la Motte's fleet being at present between Isle aux Coudres and the Pilgrims, there remains in this harbor of Quebec only the ship L'Illustre and the frigate La Sirene. The first is to sail immediately to join the fleet, and La Sirene is to remain in port until the month of October. A schooner, which sailed a month ago from Louisbourg, reports, by one of its officers who arrived at Quebec two days since, that the English fleet continued to keep the same cruise; he believed it to number fifteen sail.

The indifferent health I enjoy in Canada, my Lord, and the dangerous attack of illness I have experienced since I am here not permitting me to continue my sojourn without running the risk of my life, I took the liberty of requesting of you, last year, permission to proceed this season to France, in order to seek, from my native air and the aid of remedies that I cannot find here, the reëstablishment of my constitution, which is impaired, I dare say, by the application I was obliged to give to the arrangement of the finances of the Colony. As the season is advancing, and the ship which is bringing the Canada orders does not arrive, I beg you, most respectfully, my Lord, to approve of my going under M<sup>r</sup> Bigot's leave. I shall be always at your orders to return and assume my employment in Canada, should my services here be agreeable to you.

I have the honor, &c.,

Return of the artillery, munitions of war and other effects belonging to the English, found on the field of battle after the action which took place on the 9th of July, 1755, within three leagues of Fort Duquesne, on the River Oyo, between a detachment of 250 Canadians and 650 Indians, commanded by Captain de Beaujeu, and a body of 2000 Englishmen under the command of General Braddock, exclusive of the considerable plunder that the Indians took.

[Annexed to Mr. Bréard's letter of the 13th of August, 1755.]

4 brass pieces with the arms of England, of the calibre of 11<sup>lbs</sup>

4 ditto, of 5½<sup>lbs</sup>

4 brass mortars or howitzers, of 7½ inch diameter.

3 other grenade mortars, of 4¼ inch.

175 balls of 11<sup>lbs</sup>

57 howitzers of 6¾ inch.

17 barrels of powder, of 100<sup>lbs</sup>

19,740 musket cartridges.

Baron de Dieskau to Commissary Doreil.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 16th August, 1755.

Sir,

I start in a moment for Fort St. Frederic to place myself at the head of a body of about 3000 men, to meet an English force of 4500 men, whose design is to seize Forts St. Frederic, St. John,

<sup>1</sup> Captain Robert Stobo drew this plan whilst a prisoner or hostage at Fort Du Quesne. See Memoir in answer to the observations of the English Ministry, by the Duke de Choiseul: New-York, 1757, p. 15. The plan is republished in a Memoir of Stobo, Pittsburg, 1854; also, in Sargent's History of Braddock's Campaign. — Ed.

Chambly, and afterwards to advance as far as Montreal. I shall try, however, to mar their plan. The troops are in the best disposition possible, and panting only for the attack. All I fear is, that the enemy, who imagine all our troops to have gone on the expedition against Chouaguen, will beat a retreat on learning that we are on the march.

The battalions of la Reine and Languedoc are of the party ; but Guienne and Bearn had, as you are aware, already arrived at Fort Frontenac when we were apprised of the enemy's movements against the Colony. We are as well acquainted as themselves with all their treacheries, from General Bradock's papers, which have been found on the field of battle near Fort Duquesne. There are some from this General to the British Minister, M<sup>r</sup> Robinson ;<sup>1</sup> copy of the latter's answer ; also one from the Duke of Newcastle and the Secretary<sup>2</sup> of the Duke of Cumberland. It appears that this last is the prime mover of the whole. Their plan was concluded two years ago, since which time they have not ceased their preparations for its execution this year. To wit, that General Bradok, with a force of 3000 men, should attack Fort Duquesne, and proceed thence to Niagara, which was to be attacked at the same time by the Governor of Baston, at the head of a force of 3000 men ; and, in order to cap their treachery, General Johnson was to come with 4500 men and enter the heart of the Colony. It is with this last that I shall have to do. In regard to the expedition against Niagara, I believe that they will not dare attempt it, inasmuch as there are 1200 men at Fort Frontenac, all ready to march against Chouaguen, in the supposition that the enemy will strip that place in order to attack Niagara, into which we have thrown 300 men.

The English have, in an intrenched camp at Chouaguen, 2500 men, exclusive of the garrison and a vast number of bateaux, for it is from this fort that they were to proceed against Niagara.

The defeat of the English on the Ohio, and especially the death of General Bradok, who has been killed, must have furiously deranged their plans, and I calculate on deranging them still a trifle more, provided they hold on.

M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil is getting a translation made of all the letters taken on the defeat of the English General on the Ohio. They have had their General and 1500 killed, and all their artillery captured. These letters will be sent to the Court on the return of my expedition.

If you find occasion, Sir, to write to France, inform Mess<sup>rs</sup> the Ministers hereof, and send them this letter. I shall not be able to render them a very positive account until I return from my campaign.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

(Signed),      BARON DE DIESKAU.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 16th of August, 1755.

My Lord,

I have the honor to renew to you my respectful attachment, and to inform you that three thousand English are coming from Orange to besiege Fort St. Frederic. The Marquis de Vaudreuil sends thither, in consequence, eighteen hundred men and four hundred Indians. Baron de Dieskau puts himself at their head, whose intention it is to attack the enemy, who are near Lake St. Sacrement, and to postpone the siege of Fort Chouaguen to next year. I have had the honor to inform you that, on the 9th of July, six hundred of our Indians and three hundred Canadians had attacked, within four leagues of Fort Duquesne, two thousand Englishmen who were coming to lay siege to it; that the enemy had lost six hundred men, exclusive of wounded; that they lost seven mortars, six brass pieces and considerable booty; if credit is to be attached to several deserters, General bradoc has been killed in this action. The King of England had confided all the operations to him. His instructions have been taken and sent to M de Vaudreuil. The battalions of Guienne and Beara are encamped under Fort Cataracoui; the nine companies of La Reine and Languedoc are going to Fort St. Frederic. Baron de Dieskau has formed a company of grenadiers in each of these two corps, commanded by the First Lieutenant. He is at Fort St. Frederic since some days; I am going to join him; he had left me here until the departure of La reine and Languedoc, which were on the road for Fort Cataracoui, and which he recalled. I hope, on this occasion, to let Baron de Dieskau see that, with a will as determined as mine, it is impossible to do wrong. I am much attached to him; he appears to me to be a very good General and a very excellent soldier. I aspire, my Lord, only to the pleasure of learning that you are in good health, and of telling you that we have beat the enemy.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

your most humble and
most obedient servant,
CH<sup>er</sup> DE MONTREÜIL.

M. de Machault to M. de Vaudreuil.

Sir,

Carried to the King
5th Tier, 1755.

I have received from you, since your arrival at Quebec, only the two individual letters of the 2<sup>d</sup> and 10th of July, and that which you have written to me conjointly with M<sup>r</sup> Duquesne on the 5th of the same month. But I think that there were others in the packets that had been delivered to the Captain of the ship Le Pierre-Alexandre, arrived at Bourdeaux, who has declared that he had thrown them overboard to the number of 22, which were tied in a bag, on meeting an English frigate who overhauled him on the 17th of August in the latitude of L'Île Dieu. And I expect to receive other news by the return of M<sup>r</sup> Dubois de la Motte's ships, which I am, from day to day, expecting with the greatest impatience.

We had already learned, by the way of England, of the capture, by the English, of the posts of Beausejour and Gaspereaux, and the march of different bodies of troops of that Nation against the forts of River St. John, St. Frederic, Niagara, and that of the Beautiful river. The King has approved the resolution you have adopted, on learning all these expeditions, to dispatch M<sup>r</sup> Dieskaw, to prevent or repair their execution, pursuant to the plan of operations you have concerted as well with that officer as with M<sup>r</sup> Duquesne. And you will easily judge that it will not be without impatience that his Majesty will await the news of these operations.

Neither is it without pain that his Majesty sees himself forced, by the hostilities of the English, to adopt measures so opposed to his love of peace, and to the efforts he has made to maintain it with that Nation. There is not, however, as yet, any declaration of war on either side. On the first intelligence of the capture of the ships L'Alcide and Le Lys, his Majesty has recalled his Ambassador from London, and his Minister from Hanover, without taking leave. The English men of war visit all our merchantmen that they meet, but we have not yet learned that they have retained any. We have, nevertheless, reason to believe that they will not spare those they fall in with having supplies for Canada and Ile Royale. And they make no secret of their plans on that head. However it be, I can, for the present, only direct you to conform yourself to your Instructions relative to the conduct of the English. They afford you, already, more occupation than we had anticipated. But his Majesty is persuaded that, with the aid you have, you will succeed in thwarting their unjust enterprises, and in maintaining the glory of his arms.

The news we have received from England, increases the King's confidence. They announce to us, in a positive manner, the entire defeat of the body of troops that marched from Virginia against the fort on the Beautiful river under the command of General Braddok, who has been killed there. I expect that the first ships from Canada will bring me the detail of the affair, with all the circumstances. And I notify you, beforehand, that the King is determined to reward, in a marked manner, those who have distinguished themselves on that occasion.

I confide to you, at the same time, that his Majesty entertains very different dispositions, but founded, nevertheless, on the same principle, in regard to the officers who were at Forts Beausejour and Gaspereaux. According to private accounts that have come here, and to what the English have, themselves, published about it, these forts have been very badly defended, and that of Gaspereaux was even surrendered before the English had arrived there. The King wishes to know what has taken place; and it is in fact, important, for many reasons, that the conduct of these officers be cleared up. His Majesty desires that you enable me to report to him what you will be able to learn hereof, and I request of you to do this without favor to any person.

5th September, 1755.

M. de Machault to Chevalier de Drucourt and M. Prévost.

Versailles, 5th September, 1755.

Carried to the King,
6th Ther, 1755.

In my despatch of the 29th of July last, I acknowledged, Gentlemen, the receipt of the letters you had written me by the schooner L'Esperance, arrived at Bayonne, the duplicates whereof reached me by the boat Le Jason, arrived at Rochelle. I have since received those you intrusted to the Captain of the boat L'Apollon, and to him of the ship L'Etienne Pierre, but he of the schooner La Genevieve has declared, at Nantes, that having fallen in, on the 21st of July, 10 leagues east of Louisbourg, with five English men of war, they overhauled him, and broke the seals of several letters; that they retained three of them, but that the packets which M<sup>r</sup> Prévôt delivered to him have been thrown overboard, agreeably to the orders he had given.

Although I have nothing to add to what I have explained to you respecting the King's intentions in regard to the defence of the Colony, in my despatch of the 29th of July, whereof I annex hereunto the triplicate, I have proposed to his Majesty to send the frigate La Valeur, commanded by Sieur Maccarthy, which I expect will sail immediately from the harbor of the Island of Aix.

Two principal reasons have determined his Majesty to give him that destination.

First. To acquaint you that affairs with England are still in the same state they were on the 29th of July. There has been no declaration of war on either side. The English do not even stop our merchantmen up to the present time; but these uncertainties ought only render each of you, in his sphere, more attentive in adopting all possible measures for the safety of the Colony, for we must be prepared for all events on the part of the English.

Secondly. His Majesty has thought that it might be useful to have a frigate at Louisbourg to be used next spring, at the opening of the navigation, either for the purpose of learning the movements of the English, or even for the defence of Louisbourg, in case that place be attacked, for then the crew of the frigate could be usefully employed in serving the artillery. The King does not, however, order Chevalier de Drucourt to retain this frigate. His Majesty refers to his prudence to adopt what he will consider the properest course in that regard, relation being had to the circumstances. If he send it back this year, it will be an occasion the more to inform me of the news and of the situation of the Colony, and to transmit any details you will have to communicate to me.

I continue waiting for M. de Salvert with the greatest impatience. And I am even the more uneasy at his delay, as I am ignorant what arrangements he was proposing to make for his return; and, on the other hand, whether he had other motives than the fear of the English fleet, to prolong his sojourn at Louisbourg.

Since the news of the capture of the forts at Beausejour and Bay Verte, the rumor has prevailed in England that those on the River St. John and at Pointe à la Chevelure, on Lake Champlain, had also surrendered to the English, but this is not yet confirmed.

We have just learned from another quarter, by way of England, the total defeat of the body of troops that were marching against Fort Duquesne under the command of General Braddock, who was killed there. And you will, doubtless, have learned from Quebec, the particulars of that action, which has been most advantageous for us.

But whatever occurs in Canada, Louisbourg requires the greatest attention, and his Majesty is disposed to bestow such on it; if the supply of provisions that has been sent thither from France arrive safely, the place will be well provided. It is with much pleasure that I have learned the arrival of those sent thither by M. Bigot, under the convoy of M. de Jonquière. I hope that M. Prévôt will have been able to procure some elsewhere, and I shall have some forwarded thither early next spring.

In regard to funds, in addition to those carried by the frigates La Diane and La Fidele, 200,000<sup>h</sup> have been put on board the fly-boat L'Outarde, and the fly-boat La Valeur will carry out 100,000<sup>d</sup>.

I am, gentlemen, perfectly yours.

Baron de Dieskau to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp of the English army at Lake St. Sacrement, 14th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1755.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to report to you everything of interest to the service, up to my departure for Fort St. Frederic.

On the very vague intelligence of the designs of the English in that quarter, I proceeded thither with 3000 men, whereof 700 were Regulars, 1600 Canadians and 700 Indians. I arrived at Fort St. Frederic on the 16th and 17th of August; a portion of the troops had preceded me; the remainder joined me there without delay.

Before quitting Montreal, I had already various reasons for suspecting the fidelity of the domiciliated Iroquois, both of the Sault St. Louis and of the Lake of the Two Mountains, whose number exceeded 300, composing half of the Indians that had been given to me. I represented it repeatedly to M. de Vaudreuil, who would never admit it, but scarcely had I arrived at Fort St. Frederic, than I had occasion to furnish him still stronger proofs thereof.

For more than 15 days that I was encamped under that fort, I encountered nothing but difficulties from the Indians; those who were good, were spoiled by the Iroquois. Never was I able to obtain from them a faithful scout; at one time they refused to make any; at another time, seeming to obey me, they set forth, but when a few leagues from the camp, they sent back the Frenchmen I had associated with them, and used to return within a few days without bringing me any intelligence. Such has been the conduct of the Indians, caused by the Iroquois. My letters from Fort St. Frederic to M. de Vaudreuil and M. Bigot, sufficiently develop the particulars of their mischievous intrigues.

At length, on the 27th of August, a Canadian named Boileau, returned from a scout and informed me that about 3000 English were encamped at Lidius' house,<sup>1</sup> where they were constructing a fort that was already pretty well advanced. I immediately resolved to go forward and to post myself in an advantageous place, either to wait for the enemy, should he advance, or to anticipate him myself, by going in quest of him.

On arriving at this post, some Abenakis who had been on the scout, unknown to the Iroquois, brought me in an English prisoner, who told me that the body of the English army had moved from Lidius', and that only 500 remained there to finish the fort, but that they were expecting 2400 men, who were to march to the head of Lake St. Sacrement for the purpose of building a fort there also.

On this intelligence I determined to leave the main body of the army where I was, and to take with me a picked force (corps d'élite) march rapidly and surprise Fort Lidius, and capture the 500 men encamped without its walls. My detachment was composed of 600 Indians, 600 Canadians and 200 Regulars belonging to La Reine and Languedoc regiments. It was four days' journey by water and across the woods to Lidius'. All exhibited an ardor which guaranteed success, but the fourth day, which ought to be favorable to the King's arms, was the commencement of our misfortune.

The Iroquois refused point blank to march to attack the fort, or rather the camp of the 500 English; but, perceiving that I was resolved to dispense with them, and that the other Indians were disposed to follow me, they sent excuses and immediately set forth to lead the van, as if to make a parade of their zeal.

Mine was a combined movement. I was to arrive at nightfall at that fort and rush to the attack; but the Iroquois, who took the lead on the march, under the pretence of zeal, caused a wrong direction to be taken; and when I was informed of the circumstance, it was no longer time to apply a remedy, so that at nightfall I was yet a league from that fort on the road leading from it to Lake St. Sacrament.

A courier that was killed, and whose despatch was brought to me, and some prisoners that were brought in, gave me the intelligence that about 3000 English were encamped near there, and that they had but a confused knowledge of the strength of my forces. I immediately gave the Indians the choice of proceeding next day to attack either the fort or this army. The vote of the Iroquois which prevailed, caused the latter course to be adopted.

On the following day, the 8th of Sept, I commenced my march. About 10 of the clock, after having proceeded 5 leagues, the scouts reported to me that they had seen a large body of troops on their way to the fort, which news was confirmed by a prisoner, taken at the time. They consisted of one thousand men or more, that had left the camp to reinforce the fort. I immediately made my arrangements, ordered the Indians to throw themselves into the woods, to allow the enemy to pass, so as to attack them in the rear, whilst the Canadians took them on the flank, and I should wait for them in front with the regular troops.

This was the moment of treachery. The Iroquois, who were on the left, showed themselves before the time and did not fire. The Abenakis, who occupied the right, seeing themselves discovered, alone with a few Canadians attacked the enemy in front and put them to flight. I immediately prepared to join them, in order to accompany the fugitives into their camp, though still more than a league off.

Meanwhile, the Iroquois collected on a hill, unwilling to advance. Some of them even wanted to force the Abenakis to release three Mohawks whom they had captured at the first encounter. I am ignorant of the result of that quarrel; but the Abenakis, seeing the Iroquois immovable, halted also, and the Canadians, seeing the retreat of the one and the other, were thereby intimidated.

As I was near the enemy's camp, and in front of the cannon, I marched forward with 200 Regulars to capture it, [expecting] that the Canadians would not abandon me, and that the Indians would perhaps return; but in vain. The Regulars received the whole of the enemy's fire and perished there almost to a man. I was knocked down by three shots, none of which were mortal, but I received a 4th that passed from one hip to the other, perforating the bladder.

I know not at present what will be my fate ; from M<sup>r</sup> de Johnson, the General of the English army, I am receiving all the attention possible to be expected from a brave man, full of honor and feeling. Sieur de Bernier, my Aid de Camp, is a prisoner with me ; he has been fortunate enough to receive only a slight bruise from a splinter. I know not of any other officer taken.

Should the nature of my wounds destroy the hope of returning to Europe, and should Sieur Bernier go there, he will be able to give you, my Lord, the fullest details of this affair, and of everything that my situation prevents me explaining to you.

I beg of you, my Lord, to have regard for his zeal for the service, and for his attachment to me.

I have the honor to be respectfully, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Baron DE DIESKAU.

Baron de Dieskau to M. de Vaudreuil.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp of the English army at Lake St. Sacrament, 15th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1755.

Sir,

I am defeated ; my detachment is routed ; a number of men are killed and thirty or forty are prisoners, as I am told. I and M. Bernier, my Aid de Camp, are among the latter. I have received for my share, four gunshot wounds, one of which is mortal. I owe this misfortune to the treachery of the Iroquois. Our affair was well begun, but as soon as the Iroquois perceived some Mohawks, they came to a dead halt ; the Abenakis and other Indians continued some time, but disappeared also by degrees ; this disheartened the Canadians, so that I found myself with the French troops engaged almost alone. I bore the attack, believing that I might rally the Canadians and perhaps the Indians, in which I did not succeed. The Regulars received the whole of the enemy's fire, and were almost cut to pieces. I prophesied to you, Sir, that the Iroquois would play some scurvy trick ; it is unfortunate for me that I am such a good prophet. I cannot too much acknowledge M<sup>r</sup> de Johnson's kindness and attention to me. He is to send me to Orange to-morrow. I know not my fate, either as regards my health or the disposition of my person.

I have the honor to be

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 25th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1755.

My Lord,

Having had the honor to report to you in my letter of the 16th August, the departure of Baron de Dieskau to meet the English, who were preparing to seize on Fort St. Frederic, I doubt not but you will have been impatient to learn the result of that campaign. It has been so contrary to the hope that I was justified in entertaining of it, that this Colony is extremely deranged thereby. The interest you feel therein, requires that I have the honor to render you an exact and detailed account of Baron de Dieskau's manœuvre.

I commence by having the honor to transmit to you, hereunto annexed, copy of the Instruction I furnished him; of the order of march of his army in three columns, and the explanation of that order of march and attack which I agreed upon with him.

M. de Dieskau found at Fort St. Frederic a force of 3,573 men, to wit :

	Men.
The garrison of the fort, .....	150
At the camp of observation, .....	400
The battalions of La Reine and Languedoc, and detachments of marine, .....	1011
Canadians, .....	1412
Indians, .....	600
	<hr/> 3573 <hr/>

M. de Dieskau had, before his arrival, information on the first of September from scouting parties, that they had seen the English encamped in three divisions in front of Ledyus'; that the fort which was erecting there, was in an advanced state; that the English were busy cutting a road at Lake St. Sacrament carrying place, and another to that which leads to the Grand Marais,<sup>1</sup> and that the enemy was about 7 @ 8 thousand strong.

He marched on the next morning with his army to the Lake St. Sacrament fall,<sup>2</sup> whence he sent off a small scouting party. Up to that moment M. de Dieskau had adhered to our arrangements. He had distributed to the Commanders of each troop the same order of march and of attack that I had given him. But he had designed Chevalier Le Mercier to be his Quarter-Master General, though I had, for reasons I had communicated to him, arranged for that officer remaining at the fort.

On the 4th 7<sup>ber</sup> his scouts brought him a prisoner who was interrogated, and having answered according to the copy hereunto annexed, M. de Dieskau persuaded himself that the main body had retired; that Fort Lydius was not finished; that the camp between the fort and ditch was inconsiderable.

The officer whom M. Dieskau detached to bring that prisoner to Montreal, arrived on the 8th and informed me that M. Dieskau, in the hope of surprising Fort Lydius, had decided on marching the same day against that post, at the head of 1500 men; namely, 600 Indians, 600 Canadians and 300 Regulars, including the two companies of Grenadiers belonging to the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc, the artillery and bombardiers, and the 12 soldiers belonging to the detachment from the Marine; that he had left the remainder of his army, consisting of upwards of 1800 men, at Carillon, despite all the entreaties of the Commandant, the Regulars and Canadians to accompany him.

I cannot well express to you, my Lord, how great were my surprise and pain on learning M. Dieskau's arrangement so opposite to what I ought to expect from his prudence, and to the course I had expressly prescribed to him in Art. 3 of his Instructions.

I had this prisoner interrogated several times. To all the questions I put to him relative to what he had told M. Dieskau, he answered, that that General did not, seemingly, clearly understand him; that he had given him the same answer he had given me. He corrected all the Articles of his first answer and gave me every reason to apprehend that M. de Dieskau would make an unfortunate campaign.

Annexed, my Lord, are copies of this prisoner's answers.

I proceed to follow M. Dieskau's operations. On the same day, the 4th of 7<sup>ber</sup>, he sent off M. de St. Pierre with the Canadians and Indians. They were to sleep on this side of the Grand Marais.<sup>1</sup> The Indians, who were ignorant of M. Dieskau's plan, remarked to M. de St. Pierre that the General was imprudently leaving more than half his army at Carillon and at the Two Rocks;<sup>2</sup> that they knew nobody was to remain to guard the canoes, which however was essential, because the enemy, on discovering that they were not well guarded, would seize or burn them, which would be an insuperable impediment to the return of the army.

M. de St. Pierre, went to report the representations of the Indians to M. Dieskau, who answered: that he was taking with him sufficient people to beat the enemy, but that the Indians were making him think of guarding the canoes; he sent back 200 men from Carillon, for that purpose. He forgot to send off scouts in various directions.

The Indians were nowise satisfied with M. Dieskau's answer. He was so informed, and ordered the officers to pretend to them that the remainder of the army was going to join them.

On the 5th, the army reached the head of the Great Bay,<sup>3</sup> and prepared to march by land.

On the 6th, it continued its march, and about noon encamped beyond the mountains. It was then that M<sup>r</sup> Dieskau could be persuaded of the necessity of sending out scouts. He sent some to the fort at Lydius', and toward Lake St. Sacrament; each scouting party consisted of only two Indians, though pursuant to the first article of his instructions, he ought to have put an officer and some cadets at their head.

On the evening of the same day, one of the two scouts who had been towards Lake St. Sacrament, returned and told M. Dieskau that his comrade having seen some thick smokes, had gone to reconnoitre the English camp; that he would return on the morrow; that he could not follow him on account of several little marshes that were to be crossed.

7th. The army set out, preceded by scouts. About two o'clock, in the afternoon, it met those who had been sent the day before to Lydius', who reported to M. Dieskau that there were about 50 tents without the fort; he decided on attacking it.

He started, and after sunset, reached the banks of the Hudson river, where he encamped. He was only about one league from the fort he had designed to attack. At day break, next morning, he sent word to the Indians that the only need he had of them was to act as flankers, and to raise their warwhoop whilst he would be employed with his Regulars and the Canadians in the reduction of the fort.

At the instant, the Indians perceived a man on horseback, galloping rapidly towards the fort. They fired and killed him, and brought a letter to M. Dieskau which had been found on that courier, whereby he discovered that M<sup>r</sup> Johnson was writing to the Commandant of the fort to be on his guard; that he knew beyond a doubt, that a considerable party of troops, Frenchmen, Canadians and Indians, were going to attack him in the course of that night or on the next day; to be careful to secure his provisions and ammunition, &c.

Twelve wagons passed, shortly after; the scouts could take only two men, who were brought to M. Dieskau, who questioned them. They told him that there were at Lake St. Sacrament, 4000 English, whereof 3000 were Provincials and 400 Indians.

M. Dieskau ordered M. de St. Pierre to assemble all the chiefs of the different nations; to communicate to them what these prisoners had stated, and that he had concluded on proceeding to Lake St. Sacrament; that the more English there were, the more of them would he kill; and that after the expedition, he would go and summon the fort to surrender.

M. de St. Pierre obeyed M. de Dieskau's orders, and reported to him that the Indians had answered, that they would submit to his pleasure; and should he succeed at Lake St. Sacrament, they would accompany him to the fort.

8th M. de Dieskau set out at the break of day, with his army, to attack the enemy at the Lake St. Sacrament carrying place; who were at a distance of about 5 leagues from him. He caused his army to march in 5 columns; he marched in the centre, at the head of the troops; on his right and left, were a column of Canadians and another of Indians. Each column was about 30 paces apart, so that the Canadians and Indians were obliged to advance through the woods and on the mountains to preserve that order of march, which seriously fatigued them.

About 8 o'clock in the morning, the Indian, who had left on the 6th, arrived from his scout to the carrying place of Lake St. Sacrament. He reported to M. Dieskau that he had seen the enemy's camp; that it must consist of a considerable force; and that the English had intrenched themselves there. M. Dieskau continued his march.

When he was about a league from the enemy's camp, his scouts brought him in two Englishmen, who told him that a large body of English and Indians were following them, on their way to reinforce Fort Lidius. They confirmed the statements of the two prisoners of the day before and added, that the English were intrenched; that they had twelve cannon, from 30 pounders down; that, however, their intrenchment was exposed on one side, which they indicated to him.

The report of these two prisoners induced M. de Dieskau to call a halt; he changed his order of march; the Canadians and Indians laid down their kit so as to be lighter; he made them all pass to the left of the road, where they ambuscaded, in order not to be seen by the enemy, and to admit of the latter being engaged all at once. M. de Dieskau occupied the road with his troops. He had given orders that the Regulars should fire first, whereupon all the Canadians and Indians were to rush on the enemy. This arrangement gave dissatisfaction to the Indians, because they had requested of M. de Dieskau the favor to allow them to attack the enemy in the woods, and he had always promised to grant them that privilege.

The enemy appeared about ten o'clock in the forenoon, but before falling into the ambush, had been informed by some Indian scouts that some Regulars were on the road. Two of our Indians, who happened to be near the English, judged by their looks that they were warned, and fearing they would escape, both of them fired, and all our Indians and Canadians immediately rushed in without orders. The English stood their ground, their Indians being in front. The fight was very brisk; we put the English to flight, but lost M. de St. Pierre, who commanded the Indians and the Canadians. The loss affected the Indians so deeply that they became furious, and resolved to die rather than not to conquer. They seized the Englishman, who had slain this captain, and dispatched him with their hatchets. In fine, they acted so bravely that they pursued the enemy to within sight of their camp. Many of the English and of their Indians perished; we had many of our Indians and Canadians killed and wounded.

M. Dieskau advanced with his men directly against the enemy's intrenchment, without having made any reconnoissance of it, which, nevertheless, had been strictly enjoined on him by Article 8 of his instructions; nor did he give any notice to the Indians nor to the Canadians. The Indians begged him to allow them a moment to provide for their wounded, and to recover breath. He heeded them not, and continued to advance rapidly, so that the chiefs, who remained on the field of battle, cried out to the warriors not to accompany M. de Dieskau. Many did, in fact, return, but the greatest number followed him up to the intrenchment, in imitation of the Colonial officers and of the Rev. Father Andran, the Jesuit Missionary of the Abenakis.

Had M. Dieskau complied with the entreaties of the Indians, they would all have perished with him. It was natural that they should not abandon their wounded, the rather as they saw, within hail of them, several small bands of Indians mingled with the English, who were going to Fort Lydius. They killed several of them, took 8 Mohawks or Oneidas and as many Englishmen.

The Iroquois of the Sault were never willing to give them quarter, and knocked out their brains with their hatchets, although the greater portion of them were their brethren and cousins. It was only from these prisoners that we ascertained the precise number of the English whom we had repulsed. They were 800 and their Indians 200. The latter belonged to five different Nations; all the Mohawks were there, some Oneidas, some Tharhkarorin, some Mohegans and one Onondaga.

All the Canadians could not follow M. Dieskau. The major part of them were so fatigued, that they were hors de combat, and when M. de Dieskau reached the enemy's intrenchment, and within cannon shot, he had not the third of his army. These intrenchments were not considerable. They had been hastily constructed of wagons and bateaux. Had M. Dieskau had his forces with him, and attacked the enemy on the side where they were exposed, he might have hoped to have defeated them, because they were panic stricken by the first assault, and had not any Indians within the intrenchment nor without.

The Regulars, the Canadians and the Indians performed wonders. The Regulars always occupied the road, and fought in good order; the Canadians and Indians flanked them on some hills whence they saw the enemy, on whom they fired in the intrenchments. They silenced the fire of the artillery and of all who were working the guns, not a single man of whom escaped. The fire of the enemy's musketry was very brisk, but without any aim, whilst the Canadians and the Indians took aim and killed.

Whilst the battle was thus raging, M. de Dieskau retired on one side, about 50 paces from his troops. Scarcely had he approached a tree when he received a shot in his leg. Chevalier de Montreuil stanchd the wound, but, at the same instant, M<sup>r</sup> de Dieskau received a ball in the knee, which stretched him at the foot of the tree. M. de Montreuil proposed to remove him; he called two Canadians to his aid, one of whom was killed outright on M<sup>r</sup> de Dieskau. M. de Montreuil says that the General then ordered him, absolutely, to make his men charge, and that he was obliged to quit him, finding himself invested with the command of the army. One of M. Dieskau's servants has reported that he proposed to remove his master, but that the latter would never consent to it.

M. de Montreuil had no sooner joined his men than he retreated, without notifying a party of Canadians and Indians who were excited and continuing to fire on the enemy in the intrenchments. The retreat then was made without any order, and the army retired by small platoons. Fortunately, the enemy did not follow; for had they been able to take advantage of the superiority of their forces and of the rout, not a single man of our army could have escaped.

The most of our Canadians and Indians, having followed the high road, fell into an ambush laid by the English who had come from Fort Lydius. The Indians, who happened to be on the left of the road, received the fire from that ambuscade. Many of them were wounded. Baron de Longueuil, who led the Indians, wished to force the enemy. He received a wound in the arm, and having continued to advance the Indians saw him no more. 'Tis thought that he fell in that ambuscade. The Indians and Canadians were forced to retreat, having had a number of their men wounded. This little party joined 150 Canadians.

Towards evening several of these Canadians and Indians reached the place where they had left their knapsacks. An English detachment had taken them and lay also in ambush there; on the first fire of the enemy, the Indians and Canadians fled without the officers being able to stop them. This ambuscade continued, and all the French who went to the place in good faith, to take their baggage, were killed.

After sundown, the Canadians and Indians joined the Regulars in the mountains, and they set out all together and encamped half a league further on.

9th They marched at the first dawn of day, and at 10 o'clock overtook a party of the army which was conveying the wounded, among whom were Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Repentigny, de Montesson and du Sable. They reached the canoes at six o'clock in the evening.

10th Whatever remained of the army started and arrived, without any order, at the Grand Marais, where they passed the night.

11th They arrived at Carillon.

14th Arrived, a Canadian, who, not having been able to march had slept and passed the night on the field of battle; he returned across the forest by way of Lake St. Sacrament. He says he had not seen anything; that he had merely heard that they were very busily engaged cutting down trees at the enemy's camp. This confirmed us in the opinion that they were fortifying themselves at the Lake St. Sacrament carrying place.

My grief at the result of this campaign is inexpressible; also, my impatience to learn M. Dieskau's fate. I have sent out some parties, in vain, towards Lake St. Sacrament to take a prisoner. They have not succeeded. The English are more on their guard than ever. I had, in like manner, sent a party of Mississagués and Indians of La Présentation towards Chouaguen. They killed three Englishmen, and took two about a quarter of a league from the fort. These prisoners have reported that the English had admitted their loss at the battle of Lake St. Sacrament to have been about 500 English and 120 Indians; more than the half of these were Mohawks. I know, besides, that not a single one of their chiefs escaped, and that White Head, a great Mohawk chief,<sup>1</sup> who had made an attack on our settlements last war, had, also, fallen. The Indians rifled him and found on his person a commission from the King of England appointing him General Sachem, and giving him the command of a thousand men. These prisoners have, likewise, stated that a number of their officers had been killed. I have proof thereof in about twenty of their commissions that the Indians have brought me; and that there were many wounded, and that Colonel Johnson had a thigh broken. The English, they added, had circulated at Chouaguen that our loss was more considerable than theirs. We have had 100 men killed and 130 wounded, all included. Thereturn thereof is hereunto annexed.

Such, my Lord, is the most exact account of Baron Dieskau's Campaign. I have not been able to get at the truth until after considerable inquiry. Chevalier de Montreuil could not give me any positive information. I cannot forgive his having abandoned M. Dieskau. He ought to have employed every means to remove the Baron by force, if he would not voluntarily consent. I feel intense interest in his fate. If, as several of our Indians assert, he has been killed, he will not have been recognized. He had no mark of distinction nor papers on his person; but if taken prisoner, the enemy will cite the abandonment of this General as a proof of their triumph, though in truth, they have lost three times more men than we.

I do not care, my Lord, to censure M. Dieskau's conduct. None can feel, more than I, for his misfortune; but I cannot help having the honor to represent to you that had he followed and conformed to his instructions, and marched with his entire army, he might have been able not only to force the enemy's intrenchment at Lake St. Sacrament, but even to reduce Fort Lydius. In fact, his centre column should have consisted of 1000 regulars; he could have been seconded by the Commanders of the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc; he could have stationed 2000 Canadians and Indians on the heights, whence they might have fired with advantage on the enemy, and diminished the latter's fire on our regulars, who, during that time, might have charged with the bayonet and forced the intrenchments, over which the Canadians and Indians would have leapt with equal intrepidity, and massacred the English. This would have rendered the reduction of Fort Lydius certain, and obliged the enemy to abandon their design against Fort St. Frederic.

After that victory, M. Dieskau's army might have been able to return to Montreal and join that of Fort Frontenac. I could have relieved the Regulars, Canadians and Indians, who might have been fatigued. In a word, 'twould have been easy for me to furnish M. Dieskau with an army of 4000 men for the reduction of Chouaguen, which would, probably, have been greatly frightened on learning the success of the King's arms at Lake St. Sacrament and Fort Lydius.

I would have greatly desired, my Lord, that it had been in my power to undertake the reduction of that place, but various reasons oppose my good disposition.

1st. The Canadian troops and the Indians have worn themselves out in M. Dieskau's campaign; though it lasted only 7 days from the time they marched by land, they had not a moment's repose; and from the 7th to the 11th of 7<sup>ber</sup> they had not a morsel to eat; they suffered hunger and thirst, and endured all the severities of the weather; their only clothing, a shirt and breech-cloth. The Regulars, too, were very lightly clad, having, in like manner, lost their kit, so that the return of the army to Fort St. Frederic supplied me with more sick, than fighting, men.

2nd The relief I had provided for the Chouaguen campaign I require for Fort St. Frederic.

3<sup>d</sup> All the Indians returned and complained to me, that M. Dieskau had sacrificed them; that his rashness alone was the cause of the loss of their men and of their ill success.

4th The Indians, the Canadians and even the Regulars, were equally panic-stricken, and made similar remarks.

5th Small-pox prevails in the cities and in the rural districts; few houses are exempt from it. It exists, also, in the Indian villages, but that disease would not have been an obstacle to the execution of my design against Chouaguen, had M. de Dieskau returned victorious. The joy would have been universal, and his army would have marched with a right good will.

I must, therefore, my Lord, turn my attention to the security of the Colony, and postpone the Chouaguen expedition. I have been obliged, at the same time, to anticipate the enemy's progress in the direction of Fort St. Frederick and Niagara.

I have dispatched M. de Lotbinière, the Engineer, to Fort St. Frederic, and, agreeably to my orders, he has been to the outlet of Lake St. Sacrament. He has reported to me that the situation of Carillon is one of the best adapted for the construction of works capable of checking the enemy; that the suitable place for a fortification is a rock which crowns all the environs, whence guns could command both the river which runs from Lake St. Sacrament, and that leading to the Grand Marais<sup>1</sup> and Wood creek.

I see no work more pressing and more useful than this fortification, because it will enable me to maintain a garrison to stop the enemy in their march from Lake St. Sacrament, the immediate outlet of which is no more than a league and a quarter from that post; and I will be able to harass and fire on them pretty often, within pistol range, for more than  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a league in a river, both on this, and on the other, side of the Carrying Place. I add, that 'tis of infinite consequence to hasten this work, as 'tis to be feared that the enemy will seize upon Carillon, of which 'tis certain that he would employ every means to keep possession. I have given orders that men should set to work there without a moment's delay. It would be highly necessary that this fortification should be finished this fall, and that it were possible to place a good battery there.

I have, likewise, issued my orders that there be sent to Fort St. Frederic 8 twelve-pounders, 4 sixes, with the necessary powder and ball, so that nothing may retard the construction of that battery.

According to my orders, M. de Roquemaur has stationed a camp of observation on a point, half a league beyond the Little Rapid, whence the enemy can be easily seen 3 leagues up the Lake.

I have sent off a number of our domiciliated Indians to constantly harass the enemy and to make prisoners. These Indians will be relieved from time to time, and by this arrangement I shall always have parties in the field, and be informed, by prisoners they will take, of the enemy's situation and views.

I shall leave a detachment of Canadians and some Indians the whole winter at Carillon, in order to avoid all surprisals, and to be better able to inconvenience the enemy, and shall not neglect anything to oblige the latter to abandon their works at the Lake St. Sacrament Carrying Place, but I do not flatter myself that I shall succeed.

In regard to Niagara, I had provided for its security, and for that purpose had given orders to the Commandants of Detroit and Missilimakinak to send down some Indians there, but they were so fatigued after their campaign at Fort Duquesne, that they were unable to go and join M. de Villiers; as soon as I had been informed of that circumstance, I hastened to order M. de Foubonne, Commander of the battalion of Guienne, to repair with his men to that post and take the chief command of it. I have transmitted him instructions for all eventualities. I have issued orders to M. de l'Hôpital, Commander of the Bearn battalion, to detach Captain Pouchau to accompany M. de Foubonne to Niagara. As M. Pouchau is in possession of engineering talents, M. de Foubonne will direct him to have such intrenchments as Niagara admits of, constructed in great haste, so as to put that place in a condition to resist the enemy, who, according to the report of several of the prisoners, are making arrangements at Chouaguen to attack it. I had ordered M. de Villiers to retain M. de Lery, junior, on his return from Fort Duquesne, for the purpose of constructing some intrenchments, which he has done proportionate to his force. M. Pouchau will turn all his works to the best advantage possible.

I have, likewise, ordered M. de Foubonne to direct M. Poucheau to draw the plan and sketch of the other works necessary to place Niagara in the best posture of defence; to have the timber cut down, and the other material prepared whilst waiting until I shall have transmitted to him all that he will require to complete his works, according to the Memoir he is to send me.

My orders have reached M. de Foubonne, who has taken his departure. At Niagara he will find M. de Villiers with about 500 men, including detached marines, Canadians and Indians, and will be able to offer the greatest resistance to the enemy. The artillery taken from the English at Fort Duquesne will remain at Niagara. It will arrive there without any delay, as M. de Contrecoeur is bringing it along with him. I instruct M. de Foubonne to arrange it to the greatest advantage possible.

As the English may imagine, after the departure of the battalion of Guyenne, that there are no more troops remaining at Fort Frontenac, and decide on attacking that place in preference to Niagara, I have given orders to M. de l'Hôpital to remain there with his battalion, and have also sent him Instructions on all the cases that will possibly arise. Fort Frontenac is the nearest to Montreal; it is the first dépôt of all the Upper Country posts, and consequently deserves much attention. I had therefore issued my orders for the troops to construct intrenchments, which has been done.

When I shall have nothing more to fear for these two forts, I will recall the two battalions. I shall, nevertheless, winter some pickets of them at Niagara and Fort Frontenac, and also leave some Canadians in these places, at each of which I shall station an old captain of marines as commandant. I cannot avoid this arrangement in regard to the Indians of the Five Nations, who will not fail to show some activity at the present conjuncture. It is indispensable that the commandants be conversant with, and experienced in, the government of Indians.

I applied myself particularly to acquire a knowledge of the sentiments of the Indians of the Five Nations. I sent my orders to M. Joncaire, the elder, to remain constantly with them. He has run from village to village, and met Colonel Johnson's and M. Shirley's emissaries in each. He has sent me a collection of rumors that the English have spread among the Indians. These reports are in part true; but the English have superadded a number of events in their favor, capable of destroying the confidence the Indian Nations have always reposed in the French, and they have even wished to persuade them that I had been taken by their fleet. But Mr. Joncaire has announced my arrival to them, which has induced three villages up the Cascon-Chagon<sup>1</sup> to reject the hatchet of the English, notwithstanding all their efforts. The Cayugas have warned him not to pass by the River Casconchagon, as the English had set a watch for him there. He is to go across the woods to Niagara, and thence to La présentation, where the Cayugas have told him to wait for them, as they wished to assure me of their fidelity. M. Joncaire writes me that he has no doubt but the rest of the Five Nations have gone over to the English, and are at Chouaguen with them. His spies have reported to him that the last sloop was finished, and that the English were waiting only for the warriors of Casconchagon to lay siege to Niagara; that the English were to construct a fort on the hill that commanded Chouaguen; that their fort on the opposite side of the river is nearly completed.

Had M. Dieskau carried out my views, the English would be much humbled, and the Five Nations would have abandoned them; for, this happy event succeeding that of Fort Duquesne, would have facilitated M. Joncaire's execution of my orders to the same degree that our ill success now enables the English to complete the seduction of these Indians.

There remains no doubt, my Lord, of my being obliged in the spring to provide for the defence of Forts St. Frederic and Duquesne.

I shall send to the former a party of our domiciliated Indians, with a detachment of the troops of the marine and some Canadians.

I shall cause to be sent to Fort Duquesne, at the very opening of the spring, half the militia of Detroit, with a number of Indians, according to the advices I shall receive of the enemy's movements.

I shall give myself less trouble about the defence of Niagara than about Chouaguen; I will do my best to cut off the communication of the forces that might be sent thither from Orange, and on the intelligence I shall receive of the enemy's situation, will dispatch an army of Regulars, Canadians and Upper country Indians to reduce it. I shall then arm one or even two large sloops to chase those of the English that will make their appearance on Lake Ontario.

If no obstacles should interpose to my project, the Chouaguen campaign will be concluded before the end of May, and I will be able to increase the force of Fort St. Frederic and Fort Duquesne, if necessary.

I shall always have parties of Indians throughout the winter at Chouaguen, to harass the enemy, and will even try to burn their sloops and bateaux.

Be persuaded, my Lord, that I shall employ every means to defend this Colony, and to oblige the English to renounce their project; yet, will I act with all the prudence possible, in order not to compromise the King's arms.

I am with the most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Memoir, to serve as an Instruction to Baron de Dieskau, Major-General of the King's Army.

[Annexed to M. de Vaudreuil's Letter of 25 7<sup>bre</sup>, 1755.]

Baron de Dieskau is as perfectly informed, as we are, through the memoirs and instructions taken from the English, which we have communicated to him, that the latter have made their arrangements to invade this Colony on all sides; that the attack deserving our greatest attention, is the one they are ready to make against Fort Saint Frederic; inasmuch as we are assured, by the most authentic document, that their army consists of 4,400 Provincial levies, under the command of General Johnson, well supplied with artillery, and, generally, with whatever is proper to besiege a place.

We, consequently, must employ every means to repel the English, and to make them abandon this enterprise, as the security of Fort Saint Frederic partly decides that of this Colony.

To accomplish so essential a mission, we have intrusted to Baron de Dieskau an army of 3,000 men, or thereabouts, composed of the battalions of La Reine and of Languedoc, detachments of the troops of the Marine, artillerymen, bombardiers, Colonial militia and Indians of different nations.

M. le Gardeur de Saint Pierre will act as interpreter to the Nepissings, Algonquins and the few Upper country Indians; Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Montesson and de Niverville to the Abenakis; Sieur de Cavalier to the Iroquois, and Sieur La Rose to the English.

We have also handed to M. de Dieskau a plan which we have drawn up, arranging his order of battle in three columns; and have explained this by the general order, also prepared by us, for the march and attack. We have concerted with M. de Dieskau respecting the one and the other of these orders, therefore, we doubt not but he will be pleased to conform thereunto; he will be at liberty, however, to make such changes as he shall consider convenient and necessary, and we cannot but rely on his judgment.

As this army is to attack the English, it is for the good of the service that we explain our intentions to M. de Dieskau.

Article First.

As soon as Baron de Dieskau shall arrive at Fort Saint Frederic, and have taken information respecting the march of the English, he will send scouts in such numbers and by such routes as he will judge necessary. He shall employ good Canadians and Indians on such parties, and place an officer and some cadets at their head. He will refer to M. de Saint Pierre for the selection of these scouts.

Article Second.

He will be at liberty to increase the garrison of Fort Saint Frederic.

Article Third.

Baron de Dieskau will not lose an instant in making his arrangements and taking his precautions, so as to be always ready to proceed against the enemy, with his army (without excepting any part of it, whatever report may be made of the situation and weakness of the English), and attacking them at the greatest advantage possible. With this view, he will be able to confer with Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Saint Pierre, Repentigny and all others he shall judge necessary, and be guided by what they will tell him in this regard, on the intelligence they possess of the route the English are obliged to take. Should the scouts have reported to him that the English are marching by two roads, he will have that reconnoitered which they keep with their artillery and field train, and, after being assured thereof, will march against them with the entire of his army, without ever dividing his forces; because, it is manifest that on effecting the capture of their artillery, Baron de Dieskau will no longer have anything to fear, and will be able to turn it against the enemy by falling back on the other division of their army. He knows how well adapted Militia and Indians are to attack the enemy, regard being had, especially, to the advantage they will derive from the situation of the road the latter will be obliged to follow. Therefore, M. de Dieskau will give his orders to M. de Saint Pierre to cause (faire donner) the Militia and Indians to coöperate in part or in whole with the troops, or to attack, separately, according to circumstances, for the most prompt defeat of the English.

The Militia is composed of the best Canadians, and the Indians are of the bravest. The one and the other deserve to be treated with much kindness, and we are sure they will improve when Baron de Dieskau will take them on the point of honor, and appeal to their feelings. But he will observe that 'twould not be too dangerous to leave them to their lively zeal, and that they can always rally to the regulars in case of need.

Article Fourth.

Supposing that some deputies from the Five Nations should present a Belt to Baron de Dieskau to engage him not to proceed, he will answer them by a Belt, which we have given him, that their Father Onontio has not sought a quarrel with the English, that, on the contrary, it is they who have attacked the Colony on all sides, and that the army is marching to repel them.

Article Fifth.

If the English should repulse the Militia and the Indians, Baron de Dieskau will, the very first moment he perceives it, employ his entire force to decide the victory and render himself master of the field of battle. But he will pay attention to provide for all events so as not to compromise the King's arms.

Article Sixth.

It is of the greatest consequence to put an immediate termination to this expedition, so that the English may not protract it in order to afford time for reinforcements to join them.

Article Seventh.

Should Baron de Dieskau become master, as we dare hope he will, of the field of battle, he will issue his orders that all the English papers be given up to him.

He will, also, give direction for the preservation and prompt transportation to Fort Saint Frederic, of the artillery, arms, ammunition and provisions. He will put the artillery, &c., under the charge of Chevalier Le Mercier, and the provisions under the care of the storekeeper.

He will be careful to leave said Sieur Le Mercier at Fort Saint Frederic.

Article Eighth.

Should the English be intrenched, M. de Dieskau will have their intrenchments reconnoitred; should he be certain of the possibility of attacking them at any exposed point, and without artillery, he will undertake that expedition with his usual prudence, and if he succeed in carrying those intrenchments he will not leave any of the entrepôts or other English preparations, standing.

Supposing that they should ask to capitulate, he will consent thereto, according to circumstances, and on conditions the most honorable to us.

Article Ninth.

If, by any event that we must not apprehend, the English should absolutely force M. de Dieskau's army, and oblige him to retreat, he will retire to Carillon, where he will be in a sufficiently favorable position to stop the enemy's progress, and he shall detach, at the very same instant, a messenger to us, in order that we may provide all the assistance that he will require.

Article Tenth.

We shall repeat to Baron de Dieskau that it is of the utmost consequence that he accelerate his mission, inasmuch as on his return from his campaign we shall dispatch his army to Choueguen to execute our original project, on the success of which depends the safety of Niagara, and of all our Upper Country posts.

Article Eleventh.

When Baron de Dieskau shall have returned from his campaign, to Fort Saint Frederic, he will leave a garrison there suitable to circumstances; he will, also, leave a flying camp at Carillon of 400 men, whereof one hundred are to be Indians.

Article Twelfth.

Baron de Dieskau will not send us a messenger, until after the battle, so as not to diminish his forces. Should the case, however, require it, he will dispatch one whenever he will think it necessary.

Article Thirteenth.

In all other cases, that we cannot foresee, we rely entirely on the Baron de Dieskau's knowledge, prudence and experience.

General order for the March and Attack.

[Annexed to M. de Vaudreuil's letter of 25th September, 1755.]

M<sup>r</sup> de Saint Pierre having all the Indians and M<sup>r</sup> de Repentigny's corps under his orders, will march at the head of the army in such disposition as he will judge necessary, and will throw out scouts in front, on the rear and on the flanks, in such number as he will please.

When the army will march in three columns, the order of battle that has been laid down will be followed, and one column will be kept at least one hundred paces distant from the other, in order that the French battalions have room to form themselves into line of battle, when so directed.

When the army will march in two columns, the battalions of La Reine and the Languedoc will receive orders directing whether they shall march in the rear, on the right, or on the left of the column.

When the army will march in one column, that of the right, commanded by M<sup>r</sup> de Raymond, will lead the van; the left column, commanded by M<sup>r</sup> de Vassant, will follow that of the right, and the centre column, commanded by M<sup>r</sup> de Roquemaure, will follow the last, and be succeeded by the company of artillery, which will bring up the rear.

Should the army march in three columns, and it be necessary to fight the enemy in that order, in the forest, then M<sup>r</sup> de Saint Pierre will make a most vigorous attack with the Indians and M<sup>r</sup> de Repentigny's corps. The gaining the battle will depend, without doubt, on this assault; he will be sustained by the three columns; that of the right, marching Canadian fashion (à la Canadienne), will go beyond the enemy, in order to attack his flank.

The left column will do the same on its side, and the column consisting of the battalions of France, will march directly against the enemy and attack in column, unless it be ordered to form a line (en bataille), which will not fail to happen, if the ground allow it; these battalions will make their attack, as regular troops ought to do, without breaking and scattering.

Should the army be obliged to fight while marching in two columns, it will make the same manœuvre as above described, and the battalions of France will march directly against the enemy, to attack him either in column or in line, according as they will receive orders.

Should the army be obliged to fight marching in one column, M<sup>r</sup> de Raymond's two brigades will make the same manœuvre as above explained; also M<sup>r</sup> Le Vassant's two brigades, which will approach the enemy slowly, and the battalions of France, followed by the company of artillery, will march directly to attack the enemy according to the orders they will receive.

On the march, the right and left columns will advance 10, 11 or 12 front, leaving a small distance between each company, in order that they do not get mixed up, whereunto the officers commanding the companies are to pay great attention.

The gentlemen commanding the right and left columns will pay strict attention that their columns be always in order whilst on the march; but as soon as there will be question of attacking the enemy, the approach is to be slow, and the attack made Canadian fashion.

The column composed of the battalions of France, will march eight platoons per battalion, which will make sixteen for the whole column, and nearly twelve front per platoon.<sup>1</sup> These battalions will remain always in order, without ever scattering, both during the march and in the attack; and should the ground permit, they will form in line (en bataille) as soon as the Canadians and Indians will make their attack, in order that the assailants may rally behind them, in case of being repulsed.

All the troops in general, Indians and others, are warned not to amuse themselves pillaging during the battle, and to follow the enemy as far as possible, and the camp will be pillaged as soon as the fight will be entirely concluded. M<sup>r</sup> de Saint Pierre will have the goodness to make the Indians understand reason on that point, especially not to amuse themselves scalping until the enemy be entirely defeated, inasmuch as ten men can be killed whilst one is being scalped. I expect this obedience from my children.

At Fort Saint Frederic, this 24th of August, 1755.

Answers given by a Prisoner on his examination before M. de Vaudreuil.

[Annexed to M. de Vaudreuil's letter of 25th of 7ber, 1755.]

The army left on Friday last; it was to consist of six hundred men; it went by land.

There are about 400 bateaux along the river near the fort.

M<sup>r</sup> Johnson is Commander-in-Chief; he was still at the fort; M<sup>r</sup> Lemau, his Lieutenant, is to command in his absence.

<sup>1</sup> A battalion was formerly divided into sixteen platoons, exclusive of the grenadiers. At present 'tis divided into wings, grand divisions, divisions or companies, &c.; and the word platoon is seldom used, except to denote a number of ten to twenty recruits, assembled for instruction. James' Military Dictionary, verbo "Platoon."—Ed.

They have four hundred Indians of the six Nations under the command of Mr Johnson, who also has a Lieutenant to command them, whose name he (the prisoner) does not know.

The gun has been fired for three hundred and forty Indians who had arrived from Orange ; there had been sixty already at the fort.

What they are building at Lydius' are called storehouses; an entrepôt, and not a fort. This depôt is in this form :

This house has an inclosure formed by a ditch fourteen feet wide and eight deep. The earth from the ditch is thrown up towards the fort, and on this embankment pickets 12 feet high are set up, inclining outwards, that is to say, fraised.

The ditch does not continue on the river ; there are only pickets on that side ; and men were working at it when he was taken.

There are two gates on the river side, and one small one at the north. These gates were not yet made, or at least hung, but the gate-posts were set up.

The house is at the extremity of the inclosure in the angle formed by the river and another small stream ;<sup>1</sup> it is constructed of square timber, one piece on the other.

The English had no news of the French ; he does not know whether they had sent out scouts, but he does know that they were to the Wood creek, to reconnoitre whether they could pass that way ; having found it too difficult, they took the Lake Saint Sacrament route.

It was doubtful whether the troops were, before their return, to come to the Point this year or the next.

All the troops that were to camp at the fort consisted of six thousand men.

The troops sent back were militia. They have been discharged ; but he does not know whether 2400 men, who are yet to come, would have been countermanded or discharged.

Eight cannon are in the field, at the fort, within seven or eight paces of the inclosure ; but one is mounted within the inclosure, at the little gate leading towards the north, in which vicinity they are excavating a passage which will open in the rear.

They were shortly expecting twenty-five additional cannon or swivels.

Within the inclosure are 24 or 25 mortars, placed in regular order (rangés). They have been brought from Orange, mounted on their carriages.

The shot and shell are between the house and the pickets on the river side. The powder is on the opposite side in a store (hangard).

The 500 men who remained at the fort, are all around outside the inclosure, in tents. Within, there is only one sentinel, in a sentry box, opposite the little gate.

There is plenty of biscuit, pork, rum ; but only a few beeves for the officers alone.

A day or two after he was taken, 2400 men were expected, whom Mr Johnson was to command and take to Lake St. Sacrament, to commence a fort there immediately.

The troops in camp have been sent back, because they had been a long time there ; because sickness was prevailing among them ; provisions failing for so many men, and because they were fatigued by the roads they had to cut from Orange to the Lydius' house, and thence to Lake Saint Sacrament.

They were drilling the men to fight since two months.

There are no Dutch among the troops; there are about 20 wagoners and 200 two horse teams and some of ten, for the transportation of the artillery, which was brought by land.

He has added, that he thinks the fort cannot be taken without cannon, because the men would throw themselves within the inclosure unless prevented by surprise.

Their mode of fighting is to place themselves three deep; after the first rank fires it falls in the rear, and so with the others.

The five hundred men remaining at the fort are mostly workmen, half of whom are to join Mr Johnson for the purpose of building the fort at Lake Saint Sacrament. The Indians had promised to accompany Mr Johnson thither.

Answers of the English prisoner taken by some Abenakis between the 29th and 30th of August, a short league from Fort Lydius, to the Interrogatories put to him.

[ Annexed to Mr. de Vaudreuil's letter of 25th September, 1755. ]

Answers, that he had told Mr de Dieskau that 600 men had left for different parts of New England some days before he had been taken; in a word, that they were absolutely sent home and were to be replaced by a greater number from a reserved corps both in Conectigus and other of the New England Provinces.

That there were about four hundred bateaux along the river at Lydius', some fit to carry four or five men; others, fifteen to twenty; that Colonel Johnson, who had marched with two thousand five hundred English and four hundred Indians, for Lake Saint Sacrament only a few days before the prisoner was taken, had been accompanied by only two bateaux, one for himself and the other for one of his Captains.

Thinks that the English will build a fort at Lake St. Sacrament, at the head of the carrying place between Lydius' house and that lake, but he is not certain.

Says, he did not answer at Mr de Dieskau's camp that Mr Johnson was still at the fort; that he had really said, that this Colonel had left for Lake Saint Sacrament with whatever of his army had arrived and four hundred Indians; that he contented himself with leaving 5 @ six hundred men at the fort for the purpose of both finishing and guarding and defending it, in case of need; that Mr Laiman<sup>1</sup> was to follow him to Lake Saint Sacrament with the 2400 men <sup>1</sup> Major-General PHINEAS LYMAN was born at Durham, Connecticut, about 1716; was graduated in 1738 at Yale College, in which he was afterwards a tutor three years; and settled as a lawyer in Suffield. He sustained various public offices. In 1755, he was appointed Major-General and Commander-in-Chief of the Connecticut forces, and built Fort Lyman, now called Fort Edward, New-York. In 1758, he served under Abercrombie, and was with Lord Howe when he was killed. He was at the capture of Crown Point by Amherst, and at the surrender of Montreal. In 1762, he commanded the Provincial troops in the expedition against Havana. In 1763, he went to England, as the Agent of his brother officers, to receive their prize money; also, as Agent of a company called the "Military Adventurers," to solicit a grant of land on the Mississippi, and wasted eleven years of his life. Being deluded for years by idle promises, his mind sunk down to imbecility. At last his wife, who was a sister of Dr. Dwight's father, sent his second son to England to solicit his return in 1774. About this time a tract was granted to the petitioners. After his return he embarked, with his eldest son, for the Mississippi, and both died, soon after their arrival at West Florida, in 1775. Dwight's Travels, I, 305; III, 361. — Ed.

which were wanting to make up the six thousand men that the army was to consist of when complete; that the 2400 men were expected at the fort the day after that on which he was taken; that that force was not to be accompanied by any Indians; that none of these remained at the Fort when he was made prisoner; that Colonel Johnson had carried them all with him to Lake Saint Sacrament; that there were some scouts at Fort Lydius, but few in number; that Mr Laiman, who was to conduct to Lake Saint Sacrament the 2400 men that were expected, was also to pick up the 250 workmen at Fort Lydius, whom he was to replace by an equal number of soldiers; that he does not think Mr de Dieskau's detachment of fifteen hundred men could take the fort, it being too considerable. From the plan he draws of it, 'tis an intrenchment flanked à redent,<sup>1</sup> about six hundred feet long by three hundred in width, having ten to twelve redents in its contour, all of different dimensions, some only 80 to 90 feet from one point to the other, others a hundred, a hundred and twenty and a hundred and fifty feet. The rampart may be seventeen feet high on the ditch side, it follows the natural slope of the ground and may be 10 @ 12 feet thick at the top. The foot of this rampart is fraised by pickets of about ten feet above the ground, and so inclined as to form an angle of about sixty degrees with the bottom of the ditch. (This I have ascertained because he drew it for me.) The ditch may be ten to twelve feet wide at bottom, the counterscarp eight feet high, the earthen rampart with the ditch only on the land and creek side; on that of the river there are only large pickets about fifteen feet in height; these are not yet completed, though the army worked at them more than a month.

That the five or six hundred men destined as its garrison were still encamped outside; they were not to enter until the place would be finished; at present they had finished only a store-house, guard-house, powder magazine, hospital and wash-house; that several huts (barraques) were to be put up there; that as yet none of the cannon were in battery except one gun to defend the gate; that the others were outside on their carriages, and were not to be taken into the fort until it should be finished; that the eight guns they had at present were brass pieces and eight and ten-pounders; that the twenty-five they were expecting were iron thirty-two's or forty-two's, he does not remember which; that he thought he saw about twenty mortars and a great many shells, some of which were of twelve inch diameter, the smallest of six. He says that the English have orders to summon Fort Saint Frederic to surrender, and should it not comply, they would build one quite close; that they had heard that the 2400 men they were expecting had arrived at Sarastau, which is only 15 @ 18 miles from Fort Lydius; there is neither fort nor intrenchment at Sarastau. He thinks that the army collecting at Lake Saint Sacrament is about to build a fort there, and if it do not see their way clear this year to Fort Saint Frederic, will go back, except the guard of the two forts.

Provisions are pretty abundant, and some arrive daily. They rarely slaughter, but when any cattle are killed, the soldier gets a share of it as well as the officer.

He says that Colonel Johnson is accompanied by artillery, but does not know what it consists of.

Battle of Lake George, 8th September, 1755.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Particulars of the march of Baron de Dieskau, encamped under Fort St. Frederic with 3000 men, and of the attack by 1500 French on the camp of the English, near Lake St. Sacrament. By M. de Montreuil.

31st of August. Baron de Dieskau was informed that 4000 English were encamped under Fort Lydius, which has been built this year near the River of Orange, seven leagues from Lake St. Sacrament.

September 2nd He went to camp at the falls of Lake St. Sacrament. A prisoner was brought to him, who stated that the enemy had retired towards Orange; that about 500 men remained at Fort Lydius, and that 2400 were to return, to relieve those who had left, and to build a fort near Lake St. Sacrament.

September 4th 1500 men marched to take Fort Lidius; the remainder were left at the falls of Lake St. Sacrament, and he encamped three leagues from there—his detachment carrying ten days' provisions along. It was composed of 600 Indians, 680 Canadians and 220 soldiers belonging to the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc, all amounting to 1500 men.

5th Encamped near the head of the bay,<sup>1</sup> which is at the end of the Great Marsh, where he left all his bateaux under a guard of 120 men.

6th Marched three leagues through the woods—his detachment carrying eight days' provisions on their backs.

7th Marched six leagues through the woods; a man whom he sent to reconnoitre Fort Lidius, came to tell him that he saw a camp of about 500 men near the fort. In the evening, Baron de Dieskau determined to attack the camp and fort both together; the Indians refused to coöperate, considering the undertaking too desperate. At night the Indians killed a messenger that was carrying a letter from Colonel Jonson to the Commandant of Fort Dedius,<sup>2</sup> informing him that we were about to attack him. This Colonel was in command of a camp of 3000 men near Lake St. Sacrament, according to the statement of two prisoners taken at the same time. M. de Dieskau formed the plan of going to attack their camp near Lake St. Sacrament.

8th He marched the 8th and reached it at noon; at this side of the camp, met 400 English and several Indians, who were driven back to their camp, and mostly defeated. This detachment was going to reinforce Fort Dedius,<sup>2</sup> which the English supposed attacked. M. de Dieskau, seeing the camp quite close, ordered 220 men belonging to La Reine and Languedoc regiments, to charge with fixed bayonets. All the Canadians passed to the left, scattered and made their attack after their own fashion, which is not a good mode of forcing a camp intrenched with wagons, like that of the English. A very active fire was kept up on both sides for the space of two hours. The enemy's musketry produced considerable effect, which threw the detachment into confusion. Baron de Dieskau and I posted ourselves at the commencement of the affair between the Canadians and the Regulars. We were within 70 paces of the camp. On arriving, I received a ball in the arm. M. de Dieskau received one in the leg. He insisted on staying on the same spot, though the place was not tenable. I had no sooner washed his wound with brandy, than he received another ball in the right knee and left hip. He sat down at the foot of a tree and showed me where the musket ball passed; that wound appeared to me very serious; I lost no time in calling two Canadians who were each behind a tree, to have him conveyed away; one of the two was killed on arriving and fell upon us. M. de Dieskau would not permit the remaining Canadian and me to remove him. He was greatly displeased with the Canadians and Indians. Speaking of them, he said: "These, then, are the troops that have been so much crowed up to me." He told me to go and find the detachment of La Reine and Languedoc, and to persuade them to make an assault on the camp. On my representing to him that I did not wish to leave him, and that it was time to decide on having him removed, he repeated the order to go to the detachment. Some English and Indians came out of their camp and fired quite close at us. I received a ball in my cartouch box, which flattened two of my bullets; otherwise, I would have been cut in two. Finally, I quitted M. de Dieskau, in order to go and find the detachment. I sent him his servants, whom I met within fifty paces of the place where he was lying. He caused his overcoat and his laced vest to be laid beside him, and sent his servants back without being himself willing to be removed out of the way of the firing. I did not know that until long afterwards.

As I was approaching the troop, it had just wheeled right about, in order to retire. Seeing neither Indians nor Canadians, a great many of whom had already left, I was obliged to take the command, and to stop the disorder as well as I was able. All the troops fell back for half a quarter of an hour, in spite of all I could do. I then saw M. Dieskau's servants, who told me that he had sent them away, and had his overcoat and vest laid beside him. This precaution, and his persistence in sending back all who would remove him, prove manifestly that he did not wish to show his face after having failed in such an expedition, or possibly that, with two such serious wounds, he dreaded a retreat of ten or twelve leagues in the woods, devoid of all assistance. Had I been aware of his thoughts, I would have had him removed by force. There was no longer time to do it when I learned the fact; the enemy were masters of the field of battle. I am, in truth, inconsolable for this loss. I am exhausted by the fatigue I have undergone with this detachment; it had scarcely any officers. M. de Dieskau did not employ any of the Captains belonging to the troops from France, except one Second Captain (Captain en Second). M. de Dieskau's Aid de Camp had been killed at the outset of the affair.

I have brought back three hundred wounded; 132 have been killed. The enemy lost nearly 400 men.

I made my retreat in good order, without any interruption. I have just reported myself to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who appears satisfied with my conduct. He, as well as I, would have much desired to have brought the General back, dead or alive, had it been possible. My glory was concerned in it, and I was greatly attached to him. I have nothing to reproach myself with, having sacrificed my life and that of many Canadians, one of whom has been killed on his account. This is nearly the history of the late butchery, which the enemy cannot be prevented appropriating. We are waiting impatiently for the Indians to make a prisoner, so as to learn whether M. de Dieskau be living or not.

We are going to work the whole of the month of October at a fort near the falls of Lake St. Sacrament, for the purpose of stopping the enemy, who is preparing to come to Fort St. Frederic next spring.

M. de Vaudreuil is ordering the Béarn battalion down from Fort Frontenac to work, and to reinforce our army at Fort St. Frederic, which is diminished one-half by the Canadians who are sent home.

Please have these particulars copied, to be transmitted to my Father. I hope everybody is in good health.

M. de Roquemaure, commanding La Reine, is the superior officer.

Journal of the Operations of the Army from 22d July to 30th September, 1755.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris. ]

July 16th We received our orders to march from Quebec to Montreal. The scarcity of bateaux has been the cause of our having proceeded by land. We kept along the bank of the river, which is pretty thickly inhabited; arrived on the 22nd at Three Rivers, a small town with an état-major, and on the 27th at Montreal.

The regiments, told off by divisions of four or five companies, had marched and partially gone to Fort Frontenac, where we were to form a camp, and to proceed thence to lay siege to Choyen. That project could not be put into execution, having been obliged to make them march to prevent the enemy besieging Fort St. Frederic, and it became necessary to recall the regiment of La Reyne and our first division, which was already far advanced. The enemy had three armies; one destined for the Beautiful river, where they were defeated. The corps was three thousand strong, under the command of General Brandolk, whose intention was to besiege Fort Duquesne; they had considerable artillery, much more than was necessary to besiege forts in this country, most of which are good for nothing, though they have cost the King considerable. M. de Beaujeu, who was in command of that fort, notified of their march, and much embarrassed to prevent the siege with his handful of men, determined to go and meet the enemy. He proposed it to the Indians who were with him, who at first rejected his advice and said to him: No, Father, you want to die and to sacrifice yourself; the English are more than four thousand, and we—we are only eight hundred, and you want to go and attack them. You see clearly that you have no sense. We ask until to-morrow to make up our minds. They consulted together; they never march without doing so. Next morning M. de Beaujeu left his fort with the few troops he had, and asked the Indians the result of their deliberations. They answered him: They could not march. M. de Beaujeu, who was kind and affable, and possessed sense, said to them: I am determined to go and meet the enemy. What! will you allow us to go alone? I am sure of conquering them. The Indians, thereupon, decided to follow him. This detachment was composed of 72 Regulars, 146 Canadians and 637 Indians. The engagement took place within four leagues of the fort, on the 9th day of July, at one o'clock in the afternoon, and continued until five. M. de Beaujeu was killed at the first fire. The Indians, who greatly loved him, avenged his death with all the bravery imaginable. They forced the enemy to fly with a considerable loss, which is not at all extraordinary. The Indian mode of fighting is entirely different from that of us Europeans, which is good for nothing in this country. The enemy formed themselves into battle array, presented a front to men concealed behind trees, who at each shot brought down one or two, and thus defeated almost the whole of the English, who were for the most part veteran troops that had come over the last winter. The loss of the enemy is computed at 1500 men. M. de Brandolk, their General, and a number of officers have been killed. 13 pieces of artillery, a great quantity of balls and shells, cartridge boxes, powder and flour have been taken; 100 beeves, 400 horses, killed or captured, all their wagons taken or broken. Had not our Indians amused themselves plundering, not a man would have escaped. It is very probable that the English will not make any further attempt in that direction, inasmuch as, in retiring, they have burnt a fort they had erected for their retreat. We have lost three officers, whereof M. de Beaujeu is one, 25 soldiers, Canadians or Indians; about as many wounded. We have not been so fortunate on this side. Let us return to our own operations.

Instead of going up the River St Lawrence we have ascended the River St John, on the north bank of which stands Fort St Frederic, about 45 leagues from Montreal. All had reached there on the first of 7<sup>ber</sup>. Our army was composed of the Regiments of La Reine and Languedoc, amounting to about 720 men, 1500 Canadians and 760 Indians, Iroquois, Hurons, Abenakis and Nipissings. Never was there seen so considerable an army in this Colony. They numbered, in all, three thousand and some odd men, all in the best dispositions to treat the English as well as they had been treated at Fort du Quesne; which would have been the case had not our General been deceived.

As it is very difficult to obtain any news of the enemy, owing to the difficulty of the country, we were ignorant of his strength; for all those who had been sent to scout did not report themselves. We were impatiently expecting a trustworthy man, who finally returned and reported that he had seen a somewhat considerable force building a fort, which, in fact, was true. It was resolved, in consequence, that we should go and occupy the carrying place and passes; that, in fine, we should remain on the defensive; we set out with that view on the 3<sup>d</sup> to go to a place called Carillon, on the shore of Lake Champlain, quite near the carrying place which is between Lake St Sacrament and that lake. Whilst proceeding thither, and within six leagues of the fort, there arrived a canoe of our Indians which had been, likewise, sent on the scout, with orders to take a prisoner; this was accordingly done, bringing, also, back the scalp of another man that had been killed. This prisoner was examined and threatened to be handed over to the Indians to be put to the most cruel death, should he conceal the truth. He may be said to have sacrificed his life for his country. He has deceived M. de Dieskau and assured him that there remained but 500 men at the fort, and that the remainder had returned to Orange. He stated that the camp was left standing to deceive us; that the fort was not finished; in fine, that all the artillery for the siege of St Frederic, as well as everything that was necessary, had arrived. On the deposition of this prisoner, our General changed the defensive into offensive. It was resolved that the camp of the enemy could be easily overwhelmed and their fort taken with a detachment of 1500 men. There was ordered out, in consequence, from the regiment of Languedoc, which had been augmented to the number of 35 men, two pickets of an equal number, and a like quantity from the regiment of La Reyne, making 216 for the two battalions, 600 Canadians and all the Indians. They left on the 5th. The Indians told M. de Diescant that it was better to go up Lake Champlain to turn the enemy; that it would be easier to conceal our march from them thus than by going by Lake St. Sacrament by which they were to come, as they had erected their establishment at the head of the latter, and had cut roads for the passage of their artillery. That route was, therefore, decided on, and the men landed after having proceeded about ten leagues on Lake Champlain; left one hundred men of our infantry to guard the bateaux; this was ordered after the departure of the detachment, on reflection that these bateaux might be necessary; they marched during the night to reach them.

The detachment landed on the 6th within 8 leagues of the enemy; each man, officers and others, then shouldered his knapsack. On the 7th marched nine leagues, always through woods and over mountains. On the 8th made six leagues and arrived quite near the enemy. Our Indians began by killing an officer belonging to the enemy who was going in full speed, on horseback, to notify, of his own accord, the Commandant of our arrival, and that we were to attack him. His despatches were opened and it was then discovered that the prisoner had deceived us; that, exclusive of the 500 men of the fort, the camp was well guarded and intrenched. But instead of following the original plan, which was so much the more natural, since the fort had not been alarmed, it was determined to attack the camp, with the remark, that the more there were of them the more will we kill, and the men set out.

The 2nd adventure was one of the most damaging for a detachment of 400 of the enemy, which was on its way from the camp to reinforce the fort; it was hacked and cut to pieces; scarcely one-third of the party escaped. We continued our route, and met the enemy drawn up in order of battle, outside their fort; marched within musket shot of them without their fire. A sharp volley made them reënter their camp in double quick time. The firing thus continued from noon until three o'clock. They discharged their cannon frequently, but without any effect. The report astonished our Indians, to whom it was unexpected; and, as they do not like it, they retired. A portion of the Canadians, though good soldiers behind trees, followed their example. We were thus left alone with the other portion of the Canadians. M. de Dieskau, who had always continued at the head of the Canadians, came shortly before, to us. He calculated and presumed on the good disposition of his remaining two hundred men, to enable him to force the intrenchment and the two thousand men behind it. He drew his sword and cried, "March! Let us force the place." We had marched as well as possible, and it may be said that our detachments have done wonders. M. Dieskau retired to the left to allow us full scope, and was wounded an instant after by two musket balls. Our right, it was discovered, was exposed, and the enemy were sending people past that point. M. Maron, Second Captain, commanding the grenadiers of La Reine, took upon himself to march against those who would cut him off. They fired a long time whilst retreating; our Indians came, very luckily, to their relief, and forced the enemy to retire; otherwise, they would have been all killed. The remainder of the retreat was accomplished without any interruption; some in one, others in another direction, and so they gained their bateaux. M. de Dieskau remained on the field of battle. Chevalier de Montreuil, who found himself in command, repaired to him before the retreat, with some grenadiers and his servants, for the purpose of removing him, but he would never consent, and said that he was unable to return, and therefore that the bed on which he then lay, was as good a death-bed as the one they would procure for him; that it was useless. The loss of two grenadiers, who were killed at his side, made him repeat that they may go; that he should not alter his resolution, and he forced M. de Montreuil to retire and abandon him on the field of battle.

Of our Regulars, we have lost Chevalier de la Furjonière, who was in command of a picket of the regiment of Languedoc; he has been killed on the field of battle; M. de Parfoura, who commanded the 2nd picket of that regiment, has been wounded; also an officer of the regiment of La Reine; 26 grenadiers or soldiers killed; 43 wounded. We have lost 120 men, Canadians or Indians, and at least as many wounded. M. Bernier, M. de Dieskau's Aid de Camp, and two Captains of the Colony and one Ensign killed and five wounded.

After this unfortunate adventure, our troops returned, worn out and dying of hunger. We had then got back within five leagues of Carillon. On the twelfth we started to come down to Fort St. Frederic, where we have left four hundred Canadians. We fortified ourselves strongly at both places. The two battalions of Béarn and Guienne are quiet in the camp at Frontenac.

Dialogue between Marshal Saxe and Baron de Dieskau in the Elysian Fields.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Baron de Dieskau was a Saxon, and served at first in France, under the orders of Marshal Saxe, and in Saxe's regiment of Cavalry, of which he was Lieutenant-Colonel. He was sent on the 20th of February, 1755, to Canada, to command there with the rank of Major-General (M<sup>aj</sup> de Camp). He was wounded, and taken prisoner in the defence of Fort Frederick Edward, and was not exchanged until the peace of 1763.

MARSHAL SAXE.

Whom do I see? M. de Dieskau, is that you? By what chance have you reached these sombre shores, all covered with wounds; you, whom I always considered invulnerable, notwithstanding so many engagements in which you had a share? Satisfy my curiosity by informing me of what happened to you.

BARON DE DIESKAU.

Marshal, my story will not be long. Here it is:—

The English, jealous of the increase of our Navy and Trade sought a quarrel for the purpose of declaring war against us, and having pretexted that we had encroached on the territory of their Colonies in North America, sent 3000 men thither, under the orders of General Braddock. The Court of France, being advised thereof, dispatched me, in its turn, to Canada at the head of six battalions. On arriving there, I learned that they had commenced hostilities by the capture of two of our forts in Acadia, and that General Johnson was building on our territory; whereupon, having marched against, and attacked him in his intrenchment, I was abandoned and betrayed by the Indians, which caused the affair to abort; for my own part, I received four musket balls, and here I am.

MARSHAL SAXE.

You relate your affair to me rather too laconically. I require from you a certain detail, in order that I may be able to judge whether you were to blame or not; I have given you examples of vigor and prudence. Let us see if you have profited by them.

BARON DIESKAU.

You shall be satisfied, and I submit to your judgment. Here is how the thing occurred.

The English having commenced hostilities, both by sea and land, it was concluded, in a council of war, holden at Quebec, that I should go and lay siege to Chouaguen. My little army was to be 4000 men, consisting of Frenchmen, Canadians, Indians and 12 pieces of artillery. In about four weeks all was ready; 2000 men had already embarked on the River St. Lawrence and departed for Fort Frontenac, the place of rendezvous. General, I was to march two days after, with the remainder of the troops, and the thing was inevitable, when, for my misfortune, the Governor-General of Canada, under whose orders I was, received an express from Fort St. John, by one Varin, a Commissary of Marine, who falsely informed him that General Johnson was within two days' march of Fort Frederic, with 3000 men, to seize that post, whereupon this Governor having communicated the letter to me and expressed his embarrassment, I represented to him that this news, whether true or false, ought not to disquiet him, nor prevent my expedition against Chouaguen, inasmuch as Fort Frederic being more than 60 leagues from Montreal, the roads impracticable for cannon, several portages to be made in proceeding by Lake Champlain, and Forts Frederic, St. John and Chambly to be taken besides, I should have full time to complete my siege, and afterwards march against the English General to fight him before he could reach Montreal; that, moreover, I saw no certainty in this news, as the Commandant of Fort Frederic had mentioned nothing of it, whereupon he assured me, that the news was but too certain; that Varin had assured him of the thing so positively that it was impossible to doubt it; that he was a man of such prudence and intelligence that he would not have sent such news were he not sure of his fact; that the expedition against Chouagen must absolutely be postponed, and the only question remaining was to ascertain who should be commissioned to march against General Johnson. Finding, then, that his determination was fixed, and that the fear of seeing the English at Montreal had outweighed my representations, I offered to accept the commission, which was resolved upon, and marched some days after at the head of 3000 men, including Indians, Canadians and Regulars. On arriving at Fort Frederic, I learned from spies, whom the Commandant of that Fort had sent out, that Varin's news was utterly false; that General Johnson had within ten days marched from Fort Edouart with 3000 Militia; that he had not a single Regular soldier or Indian, and that he had gone to Lake St. Sacrament, where he was constructing a fort to secure his retreat, and to proceed afterwards against Fort Frederic; moreover, that he had but very few provisions in his camp, as he drew all his supplies from Fort Edouart, at a distance of six leagues from him; that the latter post was not entirely surrounded by palisades, and that it could be seized by a coup de main; that it had several cannon, but no carriages, which they were only preparing; besides, that 900 men were encamped outside of the fort, all militia, who, by way of parenthesis, are such miserable soldiers that a single Indian would put ten of them to flight. Having, thus, received all this information, I determined to march against Fort Edouart, attack, at break of day, the 900 men encamped outside; to make myself master, if possible, of said fort, and consequently to cut off the English General's supplies. This being combined and resolved upon, I marched from Fort Frederic, and encamped, the first day, at Carillon, whence I set out, two days afterwards, with 1500 picked men, whereof 600 were Indians, 600 Canadians and 300 Regulars, leaving a part of the other 1500 men at Carillon and the remainder at the post called the Two Rocks, in order to secure my retreat in case of need. I took eight days' provisions, having calculated that as my expedition was but a mere coup de main, it ought to be completed in that time.

Having arrived, then, on the fourth day within a league of Fort Edouart, I bivouacked in the woods, with the intention of marching next day so as to be able to attack the 900 men and the fort at day-break. Thereupon, I caused the chiefs of the Indians to be called together to communicate my plan to them; they asked me a delay of an hour to consult together. I granted the request, and, more than two hours afterwards, the chiefs of the Algonkins, Nipissinges and Abanakis came to tell me that, for their part, they did not ask anything better than to do whatever I pleased, but that the Iroquois of the Saut, to the number of 300, had absolutely refused, and as these were considered by the other Indians as the oldest and first, they would be obliged to follow their example. Hereupon, I repaired to the chiefs of those Iroquois, and assured them that I would not expose them to the fire of the fort, that I asked them only to make a false attack on the left of said fort, beyond range of musket shot, to draw the garrison towards that point, when I should attack the 900 men and the fort, with the French and Canadians. They, then, told me plainly that they were resolved not to act against the English on territory rightfully belonging to them, and that I had only to lead them (the Iroquois) against the English whenever they would invade our territory. Hereupon, I would make them comprehend that Fort Edouart being built on our territory, I was to drive them from it. But they would never listen to reason on the point.

Seeing, then, that I could make no impression on them, I inquired what they thought I ought to do, and whether it was not disgraceful to come up to the enemy's beard and to return without accomplishing anything? They answered, that as the camp of the English was on our territory I had but to attack it and they would follow me there, and that I could rely on them. I again demanded if such was their final resolution, and if they would not change their minds the moment of attack. Having then assured me that they would follow me and fight, I made up my mind to go thither, which I did the next morning at day-break, marching in three columns, Canadians on the right, Indians on the left and the French in the centre, on a fine road which the English had opened to communicate between Fort Edouart and their camp.

After a march of some hours a prisoner was brought in to me, from whom I learned that General Johnson, having been advised of my march against Fort Edouart, had detached 1000 men from his camp to reinforce that place; that he, the prisoner, not supposing us so near, had started ahead, and that the detachment might be about half a league off.

On this information I ordered the Indians and Canadians to march about three hundred paces in advance; then, to lie flat on the ground so as not to be discovered, and not to make the slightest noise nor discharge a single gun until the French column had first fired; then to rise suddenly so as to take the enemy in flank. On my side, I ordered the centre column to halt, so that my programme had the appearance of a Indians. Canadians. French. cul de sac (bottom of English, and there is man of them would Indians, more curious English had a party whereupon all the Iroquois ambuscade. Seeing that my to attack the enemy; the Indians did likewise, except the Iroquois, who did not budge.

The English were doubled up like a pack of cards and fled, pell-mell, to their intrenchment, which then was only a short league, or thereabouts, off. I pursued them closely with the French and Canadians, not supposing that the Indians would desert me there. I deceived myself, however. They followed only at a distance, and when they heard the roar of the cannon of the intrenchment, stopped short, whereupon I sent to tell them that I should order the French to attack the only battery there was, and consequently draw all the fire on them, and that whilst so doing they had only to rush into the intrenchment, which was nothing but a sort of barricade of very trifling height.

Continuing, then, my march against the battery, in the confidence that the Indians would not dare abandon me, seeing me so far advanced, I perceived that the Canadians, instead of marching on their side against the intrenchment, were scattering right and left, firing Indian fashion, and that the Indians were not advancing; I thereupon inclined towards the left, in order to make signs to them to advance. I approached unconsciously so close to the intrenchment, that I received, in a moment, three balls in the legs and one across my right knee, which precipitated me near a tree, behind which I crawled, with the assistance of Chevalier de Montreuil, who had followed me. As this gentleman was the next to me in rank, and was unwilling to leave me, I ordered him in the King's name to go and assume the command, and should he see its necessity, to make the best retreat he could, but to send me some men to remove me. Shortly afterwards came two Canadians from him, one of whom was killed outright and fell on my legs, to my great embarrassment, and as the other could not remove me by himself, I told him to bring me some more men, but soon after, I heard the retreat beaten without seeing anything, being seated on ground somewhat low, with my back leaning against a tree; having remained in that situation about half an hour, I saw one of the enemy's soldiers within ten or twelve paces of me, taking aim at me behind a tree. I made signs to him with my hand not to fire, but he did not fail to do so; the shot traversed both my hips; leaping on me at the same time, he said (in very good French) "Surrender!" I said to him, "You rascal, why did you fire at me? you see a man lying on the ground bathed in his blood, and you fire, eh?" He answered: "How did I know but you had a pistol? I prefer to kill the Devil than that the Devil kill me." "You are a Frenchman, then?" I asked. "Yes," he replied. "It is more than ten years since I left Canada." Whereupon divers others fell on me and stripped me. I told them to carry me to their General, which they did. On learning who I was, he had me laid on his bed and sent for surgeons to dress my wounds, and, though wounded himself, he refused all attendance until mine were dressed.

Several Indians entered his tent soon after, who regarded me with a furious look, and spoke to him a long time, and with much vehemence. When they had departed, I observed: "Those fellows have been regarding me with a look not indicative of much compassion." "Anything else but that," he answered; "for they wished to oblige me to deliver you into their hands, in order to burn you in revenge for the death of their comrades, and of the three Chiefs who have been slain in the battle, and threaten to abandon me if I do not give you up. Feel no uneasiness. You are safe with me."

The same Indians returned some time after to the tent. The conversation appeared to me animated at first, and became more moderate at the close, when, smiling, they took my hand in token of friendship and retired. General Johnson afterwards told me that he had made my peace with them, and that they had abandoned all their pretensions. I observed, that as he was wounded himself, I was afraid I incommoded him, and requested him to have me removed elsewhere. "I dare not," he answered, "for were I to do so, the Indians would massacre you. They must have time to sleep." Towards eleven o'clock at night, I was removed under an escort of a captain and fifty men, to the tent of a Colonel, where I passed the night. The guard had orders not to suffer any Indian to approach me. Nevertheless, one of them came next morning near the tent, and the sentinel, seeing that he was not armed, allowed him to enter, but the moment he was in, he drew a naked sword from under a sort of cloak he wore, and approached to stab me, whereupon the Colonel, in whose tent I was, threw himself between us, disarmed the Indian and put him out.

I remained nine days in the English camp, and General Johnson having caused a litter to be made, had me removed to his house at Orange, and at the end of four weeks to New-York, where I fell into the hands of very bad surgeons. This is all I can tell you about my unfortunate expedition, which has been unlucky not for me alone, the English having lost a much greater number of men than I, without gaining an inch of territory.

M<sup>r</sup> SAXE.

I have listened to you with all the attention possible, and I perceive that there has been much bad luck in your case; I have, however, two objections to offer to which you will do me the favor to reply.

1st Objection. Having 3000 men at your disposal, why did you not take at least 2000 for your expedition, leaving merely 1000 at the posts of Carillon and the Two Rocks,<sup>1</sup> as 500 Regulars would probably counterbalance the desertion of the Indians.

Baron DIESKAW.

Answer to the first Objection. I can easily answer this objection. As my expedition was a coup de main, it was necessary to proceed with celerity, which it is not easy to do with a large force, especially having forests to penetrate and rivers to cross on bridges constructed of a single tree that cannot be passed except by one at a time. Besides I knew that the English General had only Militia, that is to say, the worst troops on the face of the earth; moreover, I had not enough of provisions for eight days' supply to all, whilst I had plenty for 1500, which was a sufficient number for a surprise, especially having to do with men so little disciplined as the English Militia in America are, and I had, at that time, no reason to suspect the fidelity of the Indians.

M<sup>r</sup> SAXE.

2nd Objection. When the moment arrived for attacking Fort Edouart with your 1500, and you saw the indisposition of the Indians to proceed, why did you not, with your 600 Canadians and 300 Frenchmen, attack the 900 wretched Militia encamped at the head of the fort, especially as you were aware that the cannon of that fort had no carriages? you might possibly have carried it on entering pell-mell with the enemy.

Baron DIESKAW.

Answer to the second Objection. Being informed that the Canadians were showing the white feather (battent de l'aile) and becoming discouraged when they saw themselves abandoned by the Indians, I dared not undertake it with the 300 Regulars alone, more especially as the garrison of the fort, exclusive of the 900 men encamped outside, was pretty considerable; I had also something to apprehend from the Indians, whom I began to suspect of being unfaithful, and that they might play me some treacherous trick on perceiving that the attack would be made without them.

I regret your misfortunes, my dear Dieskaw, but I perceive by your wounds, which still bleed, that you are not yet entirely a Shade. Return to earth, and get cured if possible. Serve your King with the same fidelity you have hitherto displayed, and when the fatal Sisters will have cut the thread of your life, come and see me that we may chat together. Adieu!

Conference between M. de Vaudreuil and the Senecas.

On the first of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, at eight of the clock in the forenoon, before us Pierre Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor, Lieutenant-General for the King throughout the whole of New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, appeared in our Castle of Montreal, twenty Indians, assisted by M. de Joncaire, Captain of the troops of the detachment of the Marine, Interpreter of the Iroquois tongue, who told us that the Indians whom he leads are Senecas by Nation, and that they came as a deputation from their Tribe, whereupon, we having notified M<sup>r</sup> Bigot, Councillor of the King in his Councils, Intendant of Justice, Police, Finance and Marine throughout the entire of New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, and having invited M<sup>r</sup> de Noyan, Knight of the Military Order of Saint Louis, Major of the Troops and of the Town of Montreal, Messieurs Duplessis Fabert, de la Valetterie and de la Corne, likewise Knights of Saint Louis, Captains of said Troops of the detachment of Marine; Messieurs Luc de la Corne and Charles de Repentigny, Lieutenants of said Troops, and Sieur Toussaint le Cavalier, also Interpreters of the Iroquois language, who being immediately come into our said Castle after having explained to them the reason for which we had invited them, and after they had taken their seats in the Council Chamber according to their ranks; Gaichoton, chief and orator of said Nation of Senecas, spoke, according to what said Sieur Joncaire, the Interpreter, explained to us, as follows:

By three Strings of Wampum.

Father. You know that we have not had the pleasure of seeing you on your arrival. We were prevented by the small-pox. Now, that we are somewhat better, we are come to express to you our pleasure at seeing you in perfect health; we thank the Master of Life for having preserved you, and because no accident occurred to you in crossing the ocean.

The loss you daily experience of your warriors and children, causes you to shed tears; wherefore, we dry them by these Strings, so that you may regard us with a quiet aspect. We cleanse your throat, in order that your speech may come forth without difficulty when you will address us.

We likewise remove the blood spilt over your body by the loss of your warriors, and clean up your mat, so that nothing may sadden you.

By a Belt.

Father. The subject of our voyage has been a precaution we considered it our duty to take. Knowing that the English were absolutely wishing to take our son, we did [not] like to witness it; we are now pleased that we have brought him to a safe place and see him in peace on your mat.

By a Belt.

Father. This Belt is to express to you the pleasure we feel at seeing you; your predecessors did not appear to wish the same friendship for us that your late Father did. Now, that we find him again in you, we hope to recover, at the same time, that same friendship. We are highly gratified at having a Canadian for a Father. This is what we have to say to you.

If we were in better health we would go into winter quarters, the season being too far advanced to permit our return home. We have been told that our son would leave at the breaking up of the ice, for the purpose of going in our direction. We are glad of it. We shall come to see you, Father, this winter, in season; we beg of you to furnish us a canoe to take us to our winter quarters, as we are not able at present to wade across the river.

We also request you to assist us with provisions.

And said Sieur de Joncaire, Interpreter, hath signed with us. Done the day and year above. Thus signed in the original.

And, on the third day of October, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, at three o'clock in the afternoon, We, the Governor aforesaid, accompanied as above set forth, and the said twenty Senecas, in company with said Captain de Joncaire, their Interpreter, being in the said Council Chamber, have caused said Sieur de Joncaire, Interpreter to the said Indians, to explain our answers to their speeches, as follows:

By three Strings of Wampum.

Children. You must be convinced that I would have felt a real pleasure in seeing you on my arrival. I am very sorry that the small-pox prevented your coming here, and am very glad that you are better. Be assured that the pleasure I feel at seeing you, equals at least that you express towards me. I did not meet with any accident in crossing the sea, but the vessel in which my brother de Rigaud was, has been captured by a most shameless piece of treachery on the part of the English. I am fully satisfied that he will not continue long in their power, and that he will come and join me early in the spring of next year.

Children. I in like manner dry your tears by these Strings, and cleanse your throat, so that you may be able to speak freely.

I also clean your mats, and wish that nothing bad may occur thereon.

By a Belt.

I am obliged to you and by this Belt thank you for your attention in accompanying your son, M<sup>r</sup> de Joncaire. The English, you say, wished to carry him off; they are too timid to have attempted it.

By a Belt.

My predecessors had, doubtless, their reasons for not treating you as favorably as I do. Demean yourselves better, and you may be sure that you will, on all occasions, experience how much I love my children, who apply themselves solely to obeying my will.

I am very glad that you will winter near me, as the season is too far advanced to allow you to return to your villages. I shall dispatch you early in the spring with M. de Joncaire, [your] son.

And the said Sieur de Joncaire hath signed with us. Done the day and year as above. Thus signed in the original.

We, Pierre Rigaud, M<sup>re</sup> de Vaudreuil, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of Saint Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King in all New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, do Certify that the present copy is conformable to the original remaining in our Secretary's office. In testimony whereof, We have signed these presents; have caused the seal of our arms to be affixed thereto, and them to be countersigned by our Secretary.

Done at Montreal, the 15th of February, 1758.

By my Lord: (Signed), VAUDREUIL.

Adjutant Malartic to Count d'Argenson.

Camp at Cataracoui, 6th 8<sup>ber</sup>, 1755.

My Lord,

I dare hope you will be pleased to allow me to have the honor of rendering you an account of the movements of the Regiment of Béarn since its arrival in this Colony, and of those I have witnessed of the other troops.

The ship l'Opiniatre, whereon were embarked the first nine companies of the Regiment of Béarn, after having been separated from the fleet by the wind on the Great Bank, arrived at the port of Quebec before any other of the vessels.

19th of June. The companies disembarked and at ten o'clock entered the town of Quebec, where they were well received and quartered. The soldiers and sergeants received their rations at the rate of two pounds of bread and a quarter of a pound of pork a man, a day.

L'Algonkin, which was bringing the first nine companies of La Reine, anchored before Quebec on the 22<sup>d</sup> at four o'clock in the afternoon. M. de Vaudreuil, who passed at Isle aux Coudres, from l'Entreprenant, on board of the frigate La Sivette, arrived and landed, incognito, at seven o'clock in the morning.

The ship l'Illustre (on board which M. Diescau had passed from l'Entreprenant), le Leopard and l'Appolon, anchored in port on the same day at noon. M. Diescau, with his staff, disembarked at four o'clock, and ordered the immediate landing of the nine companies of the Regiments of La Reine and Guyenne; the grenadier company and the three last of the Regiment of Béarn, disembarked on the morning of the 24th.

All the troops were under arms on the 25th to receive M. de Vaudreuil, to whom they paid the same honors as to a Marshal of France, the Regiments being drawn up in battalions on the right and left of the church door, where he was received.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and Diescau notified the Regiment of Béarn, on the same day, to hold themselves in readiness to march for Montreal.

27th At two o'clock in the afternoon arrived in port the ship L'Actif, respecting which considerable anxiety was felt; she had on board the nine first companies of Languedoc, which landed at three o'clock in the afternoon, with a great many sick.

28th M. de Vaudreuil ordered the troops under arms to show respect to M. du Quenne, to whom they paid the same honors as to M. de Vaudreuil, the Regiments being drawn up in battalions on the right and left of the door of his quarters.

29th Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and Diescau issued orders to the Regiment of Béarn to march in two divisions from Quebec for Montreal; the first on the 30th, to be composed of the seven first companies liable to duty (factionnaires); the second, consisting of the grenadiers and the five last companies, on the first of July.

Pursuant to this order, the first division, after having received provisions for five days, at the rate of a pound and a half of biscuit, half a pound of pork, eight ounces of peas, and half a pint of brandy per man a day, embarked in 28 bateaux, on board each of which were placed eleven or twelve soldiers, with an officer or sergeant, and four Canadians as a crew, and set sail at eight o'clock in the morning to ascend the river as far as Montreal, with orders to take four days' provisions at Three Rivers for the remainder of the voyage.

First of July the second division departed, in like order. The bateaux landed every night. The officers and soldiers were quartered in the settlements as far as was possible. The officers received ten écus in paper money in lieu of rations for the route.

The first division arrived on the 7th and the second on the 9th at Montreal, where the Regiment was received and quartered as at Quebec.

M. Diescau arrived at Montreal on the 12th with M. de Montreuil, and ordered the Regiment of Béarn to prepare to march. M. de Vaudreuil arrived on the 16th. On the 17th the troops were put under arms to receive him as at Quebec.

Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and Diescau ordered the Regiment of Béarn to march in three divisions from Montreal for Cataracoui, and to encamp, until further orders, under Fort Frontenac, which is situated there. The first, composed of the grenadiers and the four first service companies (factionnaires) on the 18th; the second, of the four following, on the 19th, and the third, of the four last, on the 20th.

In consequence of that order, the first division marched from Montreal on the morning of the 18th by land to Lachine, a distance of three leagues. Having received fifteen days' provisions, at the rate of one pound and a half of biscuit, half pound of pork, eight ounces of peas per day, and two quarts (pots) of wine per man for the entire march; the officers the same ration with a bottle of wine per day, and some comforts, it embarked in twenty-five bateaux, each having on board one officer or sergeant and seven soldiers, or four Canadians, and the said bateaux were, moreover, freighted with three thousand weight of provisions and ammunition to be landed at Fort Frontenac. This little fleet weighed anchor at noon and went to camp at Lachine point, half a league off.

19th Quitted that point and left to the North, Point Claire, Isle Perrau, Fort Rollant, which is a house surrounded by stockades; unloaded the bateaux in the cove of the Cascades, in order to ascend the Cascades le Trou, les Rigolets des buissons, and to arrive at Les buissons, where the division encamped at 6 o'clock.

21st Doubled two points where it became necessary to tow with a rope past la Pointe au Diable,<sup>1</sup> which is very rapid; unloaded the bateaux at Coteau du Lac, made the portage, crossed from North to South in order to encamp in an open wood near Bateau cove (l'anse aux bateaux) five leagues off, at the outlet of Lake St. Francis.

22nd Passed Bateau cove, half the lake, and encamped four leagues above, on Point au banc, and in a very fine prairie.

23rd Crossed the remainder of the Lake to encamp five leagues up, at the Chenaux,<sup>2</sup> in a heavy wood.

24th Left the Thousand Islands and those of the Savattes to the South, surmounted five rapids where it was necessary to pass the bateaux by towing and polling, and encamped at the foot of the Long Sault, in an open wood, having made five leagues.

25th Ascended the Long Saut, which is one of the most dangerous rapids, dragging the bateaux by main force, and encamped in the woods, half a league up, at the head of the Long Saut.

26th Surmounted divers rapids, passed several islands and went to camp at six o'clock at Point aux chênes,<sup>3</sup> in an open wood.

27th Passed numerous rapids, the Flat, whose current is dangerous, where several bateaux sheered; and camped on Point aux Iroquois,<sup>4</sup> six leagues up.

28th Ascended the two Galos rapids, which are dangerous; doubled Point à l'Iroigne, crossed from North to South for the purpose of camping under the Fort Présentation,<sup>5</sup> which is the end of the rapids, and six leagues up. This fort consists of four buildings, in the form of a bastion, the curtains whereof are palisades. It is good against Indians, but would be quite untenable against Regulars that might wish to attack it, as it is commanded on all sides.

29th Doubled two points against a strong head wind, and went to camp on Point aux Barils,<sup>6</sup> three leagues.

30th Passed the Thousand Islands, the River Tonniata and encamped in an island<sup>7</sup> opposite the Little Detroit, very ill adapted for a camp, 7 leagues.

31st Crossed two large coves; met, in the first, two canoes coming from Detroit, the crew of which said that the English had been defeated at the Beautiful river;<sup>8</sup> left several islands on the South; halted at the Island aux Citrons, where seven Indians came in their canoes to communicate their exploits in routing the English, and went to camp in a little prairie on Isle Cacheiro, eight leagues.

August 1st Left Deer Island, Hog Island and Cedar Island to the South. Doubled Montreal Point, in order to arrive at Cataracoui, five leagues; went to camp at noon, the left resting on Fort Frontenac, which is esteemed the strongest in the country, and consists only of four small stone bastions, the faces of which are no more than six toises, the flanks two, and the curtains twelve. The walls are only two feet, unterraced. The terreplain of the rampart is built of plank and masonry; when one of the guns on it is discharged the whole fort shakes. Generally speaking, its situation is very bad, as well as its construction, and it is of no use except for stores, which it would be desirable to protect against a sudden attack.

The second division arrived on the 2, the last on the 3. The regiment of Béarn, encamped altogether, the left resting on the fort, the right on the ground designed for the regiment of Guyenne, with the bay in front and the woods about three hundred paces in the rear of the camp. A strong guard was posted in the wood and a small one at the Great Cove, as a look out towards the outlet of Lake Ontario, six leagues off, by which the English may come to Cataracoui.

2nd A cadet, dispatched from the Beautiful river, arrived in the evening with news of the victory gained over the English, and the particulars of the affair.

The officers, sergeants and soldiers received the rations at the fort, at the rate of two pounds of bread, half pound of pork and four ounces of peas per ration, during the entire campaign.

9th The two first divisions of the regiment of Guyenne, which left Montreal on the twenty-fifth and 26th of July, arrived and encamped on the right of the regiment of Béarn.

10th The guards fired in the night on some bateaux coming from Niagara, which did not answer when challenged.

11th The last division of the regiment of Guyenne arrived.

12th Both regiments furnished the guards in common, which were posted in the wood ; one was stationed at the Great Cove, and a sergeant and eight grenadiers at Little Cataracoui, two leagues off, to guard the bay, and to be as close as possible to the mouth of the lake.

14th At two o'clock in the morning, the regiments that were waiting for the other troops to proceed to besiege Fort Chouaguen, on the south side of the lake, 25 leagues from Cataracoui, received orders to hold themselves on the defensive and to intrench their camp, and learned that M. Diescau had countermanded the regiments that were on their march, and was going against the English, who were threatening Fort St. Frederic.

15th After having reconnoitred the face of the country for the intrenchments, traced out the new camp.

16th The regiments decamped ; that of Guyenne had its right on the fort, and that of Béarn, its left on the River St. Lawrence, with the bay in its rear and the wood in front.

15th Changed posts ; pushed the Captain's main guard to a quarter of a league off, whence his Lieutenant was detached to another point, two hundred paces from his post.

19th A ship builder arrived from Montreal to work at a schooner for the navigation of the lake, in addition to the two already in the bay, and for the protection of our bateaux against the English sloops that are cruising in the lake.

20th Traced out a grand redoubt at the head of the camp of the regiment of Guyenne, two at that of Béarn, joined to the one of Guyenne by a curtain and an epaulement on the bank of the river, which the two regiments commenced and completed on the eighth of September. During that time, and through the whole month of September, the regiments practiced the new exercise which had been furnished them by M. Diescau.

12th September. Abbé Picquet arrived at the camp at noon with thirty-eight Indians, whom he wished to send to Chouagen to make some prisoners. He dispatched them on the 16th, and accompanied them as far as the Island of Tonti.<sup>1</sup>

25th A courier, who had left Montreal on the 16th, brought, at one o'clock in the morning, news of the affair in which M. Diescau had been left on the field of battle, and orders to the regiment of Guyenne to start forthwith to reinforce the troops at Fort St. Frederic. At two o'clock, another arrived, bringing counter orders to the said regiment, because M. de Vaudreuil had fears for Niagara, to which he wished to be convenient, so as to assist, and retake it, should the English desire to seize it.

At three o'clock in the afternoon Abbé Picquet's Indians returned with two prisoners, and said that they had killed three men who had made resistance, whose scalps they brought. The prisoners were interrogated respecting Choagens, who answered that there were two regiments of one thousand men each there, which were reduced, by sickness and loss, to fourteen hundred. They added, that the English had intrenched their camp, and possessed three sloops armed with cannon, and were giving out that they wished to come and attack Cataracoui. We have not any news of, and are still waiting for, them.

26th Abbé Picquet departed, for the purpose of carrying his Indians and prisoners to M. de Vaudreuil, at Montreal.

27th The regiment of Béarn commenced to fraize their works. A cadet, who had been sent to Niagara, returned at two o'clock in the afternoon, and reports that he had discovered some English guards at the Coui Island, eighteen leagues from here. At eleven o'clock, at night, detached twenty soldiers, belonging to the two regiments, 60 Canadians and 14 Indians, under the command of two partisan officers, in seven bateaux, to capture them. They came up with the supposed Englishmen, who turned out to be Canadians on their way from Niagara to Tonty Island, and arrived with them in camp on the morning of the 29th.

October 1st At seven o'clock in the evening a courier arrived from Montreal with orders to the regiment of Guyenne to proceed forthwith to Niagara, to prepare the materials for the construction of a good fort there next year, and to build barracks for 400 men during the winter; to that of Béarn to reduce the extent of the intrenchments and to construct barracks for 300 men.

2<sup>d</sup> Prepared the bateaux necessary to transport the provisions and ammunition that were to be carried along.

5th The Guyenne regiment embarked in forty-eight armed bateaux; one Captain, one Lieutenant and 60 men were detailed as an escort.

6th Loaded the schooners with provisions destined for the Upper country.

7th The schooners weighed anchor at twelve o'clock in the morning; they saluted the fort and cleared the bay, on their voyage.

This is the condition to which M. Dieskau has reduced us. Had he been less rash, he would have thrashed the English and forced their intrenchments; we could have carried out the original plan of the campaign, of going to lay siege to Chogens, which, from appearances, we might have captured and made a fine campaign; we might have undertaken and driven out the English, who designed to conquer all Canada; whereas we are, instead, obliged to keep on the defensive, and have, at present, considerable works to construct at a season which is not favorable for undertaking them. They might have been thought of earlier, because the regiment of Guyenne might have been sent, since the 14th of August, to Niagara, which would have already completed there what it is about to commence now, and that post, now falling in pieces and crumbling, would be at least tenable; whereas, on the other hand, it appears difficult to throw supplies into it between this and the month of December. The regiment of Béarn might have done as much to this fort instead of fortifying a camp that will be of no service except there be troops to defend it. All the faults are not chargeable to our Generals, because they are not yet aware how much this country has been neglected, for some time, by the Governors, and did suppose all the forts were in proper condition. All require repairs, and the majority must be rebuilt. When we arrived at this post, for which much apprehension was felt, there was not a single piece of artillery in position (en etat); not any of the furniture necessary for moving and loading them. We are lucky that the English had not been prepared to come. Our only resource would have been our muskets and bayonets. Niagara, which is the most essential post, and the key of the entire Upper country, is wholly unable to sustain a defence. It is built of stockades (patinades), which had to be supported by stancheons in the spring.

Such is the condition in which M. de Vaudreuil and we have found this Colony. Were I to enumerate all the other abuses we have discovered, you would consider me a person who seeks only to misrepresent (denigrer) what he sees. I expect, nevertheless, that all the details which will be sent from this country, will be conformable to what I have the honor to state to you.

M. de Vaudreuil appears desirous of remedying these abuses, and directing all his attention thereto. He has his hands full. He requires help and assistance; he will experience aid from us, though we have been on the march or in camp since the 1st of March. The regiment of Guyenne felt a pleasure in marching, and ours no less in remaining, seeing the necessity there is of working and suffering somewhat to recruit this country. The soldier possesses the same disposition he did at Brest. There is no appearance of our breaking up camp before the month of December, though the season is already cold. We shall leave two or three hundred men here for the protection of this post during winter; therefore but few will go down to rest themselves.

The regiments of La Reine and Languedoc are at Fort St. Frederic, with the Canadians, where they are throwing up intrenchments.

I annex hereunto the detail of the affair on the Beautiful river, which I received from an officer who was an eye witness of it; also, an account of the attack at Lake St. Sacrament, such as it has been transmitted to us from Montreal.

This, my Lord, is a very long letter. I presumed that you would have been very glad to be informed of what we have done since our arrival in this Colony, and that you would be pleased to permit me to have the honor to communicate it to you. I should esteem myself too happy were it in my power to prove to you how much I desire to deserve your favor.

I have the honor to be, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MALARTIC.

Statement of two Canadians taken on the Ohio and carried to London.

The men named Jean Baptiste Berger and Joachim Parent, natives and inhabitants of Montreal, in Canada, were taken prisoners by the Indian allies of the English, on the 28th of the month of May, 1754, on the River Oyo, in the affair of Sieur de Jumainville, and carried to Virginia, where they were stripped of everything and imprisoned; fed on Indian corn with two pounds of meat, which were given them for 21 men of their party.

They remained thus, in Virginia, until the 31st of March, 1755, when they were put on ship-board with a single blanket; they do not recollect the name of the vessel. The voyage continued 40 days, during which time they each received one biscuit and a herring a day.

On their arrival in London they were detained on board the same vessel in which they arrived, and at the end of six weeks were removed to another ship, on board which they have remained two months.

On board these two vessels they received the same rations as the crew.

During their sojourn they were told that they must wait the return of the King of England, who would decide their fate, and in fact, a few days after the King's return, they were told that they should be sent to France. They were furnished with a sailor's jacket, vest and blue shirt, and embarked on the 27th of 7<sup>ber</sup>, on board the Calais packet.

They confirmed all the circumstances of Sieur de Jumainville's assassination by the English.

Say, that when the news of General Braddock's defeat reached London, their rations were stopped for 4 days, but that a French Catholic brought them food at night.

They are ignorant of what has become of their comrades.

Chevalier de Montreuil to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp at Fort St. Frederic, 10th October, 1755.

My Lord,

Permit me, if you please, to have the honor to inform you that we have had the misfortune to lose the Baron de Dieskau, on the 8th of September, in an attack on a fortified camp of three thousand English, near Lake St. Sacrament. He was at the head of six hundred Indians, seven hundred Canadians and two hundred Regulars belonging to the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc. He had marched with the intention of fighting five hundred men encamped under a fort constructed this year at the house desdiz,<sup>1</sup> near the River of Orange, and of carrying that fort at once by assault.

M. de Dieskau being a league from fort desdiz,<sup>1</sup> learned that the enemy had a camp of three thousand men near Lake St. Sacrament, six leagues off; he prepared to march thither, and half an hour before arriving there, received intelligence that four hundred English were on his road, going to fort desdiz in quest of provisions for their army. He detached the Indians and Canadians, who briskly drove them back to their camp, which he caused to be at once attacked. Half the Indians and Canadians were satisfied with their first victory. The firing was well maintained, on both sides, from noon until two o'clock.

We were forced to abandon the field of battle. M. de Dieskau remained on the ground dangerously wounded, in consequence of having advanced too far during the fight, in spite of my representations. I was alone with him near the intrenchments, in the centre of the attack, with none of our men in front of us and scarcely any in the rear. The Regulars were on the right; the Canadians and Indians on the left. M. de Dieskau received two shots, one in the bone of the leg and the other in both hips. I received one in the arm. He would never consent to be removed by a number of men whom I caused to be brought on the field. One Canadian was killed, who fell on him whilst I was in the act of begging M. de Dieskau to allow himself to be removed beyond range of shot. When he perceived that I persisted in wishing to have him carried away, and in not abandoning him, he ordered me twice to go to the right, to reanimate the attack, which was becoming weak. On my way thither I sent him his servants, who were not far from their master. When I reached the right, the Canadians and Indians were falling back; the Regulars wished to do likewise; I threw myself in their midst to stop them, and in a moment they lost four or five hundred paces of ground. Very few officers aided me in rallying the men, as most of those of the Colony had been killed or wounded, and M. de Dieskau did not bring any captains of the French troops with the detachment. I expected that he would have himself carried to the rear, on witnessing an unexpected movement, and knowing that 'tis impossible to stop, all at once, a troop that is falling back of its own accord. I left with him several Canadians and his servants, from whom I learned that he had sent them away, and had his overcoat, vest and telescope laid alongside him. It was a very critical moment for me to see a General to whom I was strongly attached, in the hands of the enemy who rarely gives any quarter.

I was forced to fight whilst retreating; I caused the French troops to form the rear guard; they comported themselves very well. We have had one hundred and twenty men killed; I have brought back one hundred and three wounded. The enemy, according to the report of two prisoners, have lost about six hundred men. General Johnson has had his thigh broken. M. de Bernier, Aid de Camp of M. de Dieskau, has been killed. We are going to build a fort at the Falls of Lake St. Sacrament, five leagues from Fort St' Frederic. The Guyenne battalion is at Niagara, and that of Béarn at Fort Cataracoui. Each of these battalions consists of five hundred and fifteen men, and those of La Reine and Langnedoc, three hundred and thirty per battalion, exclusive of the eight companies that have been taken in the ship le Lys. The two battalions at Louisbourg are five hundred and twenty men, according to the last return the Adjutants have sent me. I beg of you, my Lord, to be pleased to send some muskets for these battalions; they have been furnished with very bad ones on leaving France. The Colony is also in very great want of some. Permit me, if you please, to say to you that I am very anxious about your health. I dare flatter myself that you will condescend to do me the favor to attach credit to the detail I have the honor to submit to you. I justify myself, my Lord, only to you. Please have the goodness to honor me with your orders and protection.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,

*Baron de Dieskau to M. de Vaudreuil.*Orange, 12th October, 1755.

I have had the honor to write you on the 15th of September from the English camp, on the evening before my departure for Orange. Since my arrival here I have been very ill, and rarely free from suffering very acute pain; so that it appears that I am floating between life and death. All my wounds are healing, with the exception of those traversing both hips and passing through the bladder. The urine which constantly drips from one of these holes and sometimes from both at once, prevents their healing, and renders my condition very uncertain; it thus appears that I have survived up to this time, only by the strength of my constitution and the great attention which has been paid me. It is but rendering justice to M. de Johnson and the Governor of New-York, to say that, through the obliging care of the one and the other, I have wanted for no assistance in the power of man to procure me.

To-morrow I am to be moved to New-York. It is a favor which I requested as soon as my strength could admit of it.

I am, &c.,

My Lord,

I have the honor to inform you that we have had the misfortune to lose the Baron de Dieskau on the 8th of September, in the attack on a fortified camp of three thousand English near Lake St. Sacrament. He was at the head of 600 Indians, 700 Canadians and 200 Regulars of the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc. He had left the camp, with this detachment of 1500 men, with the intention of going to attack 500, who were encamped under Fort Lydius, which the English have built this year on the River of Orange, and he proposed to carry by assault. When he was within a league of it, he learned that the enemy had a camp of three thousand men near Lake St. Sacrament, six leagues off; he marched thither in preference. M. de Dieskau received intelligence, half an hour before reaching there, that 400 English were on his road going to Fort Lydius in search of provisions for their army. He detached the Indians and Canadians who drove them back to their camp, which he immediately caused to be attacked. Half the Indians and Canadians were satisfied with their first victory; the fire was well maintained, on both sides, from noon to two o'clock. We were constrained by the fire of the enemy, which was greatly superior to ours, to abandon the field of battle, whereof they soon remained masters. We fought on the retreat during two days, in the woods without provisions. The whole of the detachment was worn out by fatigue before the battle, having carried on their backs, during a march of three days, eight days' provisions, which they were ordered to lay aside before commencing the fight, and had not time to recover, in consequence of an English detachment we saw coming in our rear from fort desdiz,<sup>1</sup> and which would have placed us between two fires. I caused the French troops to form the rear guard; they behaved very well.

We had a lieutenant, belonging to the regiment of Languedoc, killed; one of La Reine wounded; 62 soldiers and 160 Canadians or Indians, killed or wounded. M. de Dieskau did not bring any captains with the French troops; seven officers of the Colony were either killed or wounded. M. de Bernier, Aid-de-Camp to M. de Dieskau, has been killed. I received a ball in the arm. I brought back 103 wounded.

According to the report of several prisoners, the enemy have lost 600 men, and General Johnson, their Commander, had a thigh broken. The two battalions of the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc are here; that of Guyenne is at Fort Niagara, and that of Béarn at Fort Cataracoui. These four battalions amount to about seven hundred men, exclusive of the two companies of grenadiers and the six service companies (factionnaires) who have been made prisoners of war in the ship le Lys. The two battalions at Louisbourg have lost few soldiers. M. de Roquemaure, Commandant of the battalion of La Reine, is in command of the four battalions here. M. de St. Julien, Commander of the Artois battalion, who is his senior, is at Louisbourg.

We are building a fort here to prevent the enemy coming to establish himself at this side of Lake St. Sacrament. This campaign, it appears to me, will terminate without striking a blow. The enemy are, also, building a fort near Lake St. Sacrament. We have small scouting parties out every day; trifling skirmishes frequently occur. I believe we shall not return to quarters before the end of November.

M. de Vaudreuil proposes to have us lay siege to Chouaguen next spring. I hope we shall be more fortunate in our operations. The Colony is threatened on all sides. We cannot succeed in this country in consequence of the number of English we have to contend against, except by endeavoring to fight them in detail. M. de Dieskau's loss and the check we have experienced near Lake St. Sacrament, proceed from not being satisfied with having defeated 400 men, whom we had met within half a league of their camp, and from the desire to make an immediate attack on 3000 men in an intrenchment, with 1500, worn out by fatigue, who were no longer presenting any order of battle, and who were throwing away their fire. He was in hopes that the 400 men, who had been driven back to their camp, would have thrown it into confusion; there was every reason to suppose so. M. de Dieskau was a very good General and a very brave grenadier; I shall regret him all my life. I beg you, my Lord, to be pleased to honor me with your recommendation to him who is to replace the Baron. Be pleased to permit me, to assure you that I shall have the honor to afford you proofs, on all occasions, of my zeal for the King's service, and that I shall deserve, in time, the favors that have been heaped on me when leaving France.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant.

*M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.*Montreal, 18th 5<sup>ber</sup>, 1755.

My Lord,

I had the honor to inform you, by my despatches of the 20th and 24th of July, that the English had become masters of Fort Beauséjour, and that M<sup>r</sup> de Boishebert, commanding at the River St. John, had burnt his fort, as he was not able to prevent the enemy landing; that I had given him orders to arrange with the Reverend Father Germain, the Missionary, about wintering on the River St. John or returning to Quebec, according to the good or bad dispositions of the Acadians and Indians.

M. de Boishebert and the Reverend Father Germain have rendered me a favorable report of the conduct and zeal of the Acadians and Indians. M<sup>r</sup> de Boishebert has also given me an account of his movements in opposition to the designs of the English.

The latter have not confined themselves to the capture of Beauséjour; they wished to oblige all the Acadians to swear fidelity to the King of Great Britain and to take up arms against us, but not succeeding, forced them to give up their fire-arms, after which they assembled the people again at Fort Beauséjour (which they have named Fort Cumberland), on pretence of communicating to them the arrangement of the Governor of Halifax for the preservation of their lands, and retain them prisoners to the number of 400 heads of families. Two of these Acadians were sent by the Commandant to tell their wives to hold themselves in readiness to embark, and that their houses will be burnt, should they refuse.

Far from obeying this order, the Acadian families fled to the woods. Their refusal led the English to burn entirely the village of the River Chipoudy, without excepting even the church. M. de Boishebert, at the head of 125 Acadians or Indians, overtook them at the River of Pelkoudiak;<sup>1</sup> attacked and fought them for three hours, and drove them vigorously back to their vessels. The English had 42 men killed and 45 wounded. M<sup>r</sup> Gorham,<sup>2</sup> a very active English officer, was among the number of the wounded. We lost one Indian and had 3 others wounded. Had the Indians been less alert, not a single Englishman would have escaped. M<sup>r</sup> de Boishebert passed the night on the field of battle. He helped the Acadians to save a portion of their grain, and to retire into the woods with their wives and children. He has sent them a large lighter (gabarre) to accelerate their return to the River St. John.

The Indians cannot fail to be excited against the English, who have cut into pieces 14 Indians belonging to the Mission of the River St. John, whom they surprised along some English settlements.

The English have taken, contrary to the law of nations, the man named Grandcours, a sergeant of M<sup>r</sup> Boishebert's detachment, long before they had taken Beauséjour. That sergeant had gone by M<sup>r</sup> de Boishebert's order, in a boat in search of nine soldiers who had lost themselves on Partridge Island; he had an order of his Commandant, whereby he was even to apply for the assistance of the English, should he require it.

<sup>1</sup> The River Petecodiac rises in the mountains on the east bounds of King's county, New Brunswick, under the name of the Araganee; thence runs eastwardly until it reaches the parish of Dorchester, Westmoreland county, where it makes a turn or elbow to the south, and falls into Shepody bay. 'Twas called Petit Coude (Little elbow) by the French, whence Petecodiac is said to be derived, and is frequently called Pettycoatjack by the inhabitants. Gesner's New Brunswick, 187; Bouchette's Map. — En.

I have neglected no means to acquire a knowledge of the situation of the English at Beauséjour. They number about 900 men; had begun refitting the interior of the fort, but have ceased doing so, since they detain the settlers.

I have given orders to M<sup>r</sup> de Boishébert to continue on the River St. John. The Intendant has caused the supplies necessary for his wintering there, to be forwarded. The Reverend Father Germain is at Quebec, and I hope will not delay going to join his Indians.

Divers reasons, my Lord, oblige me to make M<sup>r</sup> de Boishebert remain at the River Saint John.

1st So long as I shall occupy that river, and a detachment will be there, I shall preserve the possession of Acadia for the King, and the English will not be able to say that they have forced the French to abandon it.

2<sup>d</sup> I shall secure the fidelity of the Acadians and Indians, who otherwise would consider themselves abandoned, and perhaps surrender to the English.

3<sup>d</sup> M. de Boishebert will draw over to him all the Acadians; those at his post, as well as those at a distance; will endeavor to reunite them with their families and to form them into one corps. The Acadians, thus reunited, will be obliged, for their own safety, to repel the enemy with vigor, should he make his appearance.

4th He will occupy himself in like manner to reunite the Indians, and will form an equally considerable corps of them; he will correspond with M. Manache, Missionary of Miramichi, and, according to the exigency of the case, will join the Indians of that Mission to his own, to oppose the progress of the enemy.

5th He will be in a position to have spies constantly at Beauséjour and Halifax, and to make some prisoners, who will inform him of the situation and strength of the English.

6th He will be able to organize parties of Acadians and Indians, to continually harass the enemy at Beauséjour, and to prevent them cutting firewood.

7th By holding the River St. John I shall be able to obtain news, at all times, from Louisbourg; and it will be necessary only to cross from the Island of St. John to Chedaik, or, after having crossed the Gut of Canso, to keep along the coast to Chedaik or Cocagne.<sup>1</sup>

I have given orders to M. de Boishebert, in consequence, and have particularly recommended him to act, on all occasions, with much prudence, and to concert matters with the Reverend Father Germain.

I hope, my Lord, to adhere to this arrangement until I shall have received your orders next year; and should you decide on the impossibility of obliging the English to withdraw from Acadia, or of maintaining ourselves there in sufficient force to keep them in check, I shall be able to withdraw the Acadians and Indians into the heart of the Colony. The Acadians, in the whole, may consist of about 2000 souls, whereof 700 are men under arms. It would be unfortunate were they to belong to the English.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 20th Sep<sup>r</sup>, 1755.

My Lord,

I have this instant learned from M. de Vaudreuil that he is sending a courier to-night to Quebec, to dispatch the frigate La fidelle, which he, at first, told me he should not send off until about the first of next month. I am working, night and day, at the accounts I have to render you, my Lord, and more than half my copies are made out. I shall not lose a moment with the rest; but I cannot profit by this opportunity, the rather as I am waiting returns and explanations from M. de Montreuil, the Adjutant-General, and from the Adjutants of La Reine and Languedoc regiments.

I am, therefore, obliged, my Lord, to confine myself to announcing to you the loss of the Baron de Dieskau, who received two gun shot wounds on the 6th 7th last in the attack on an intrenched camp of about 3000 English near Lake St. Sacrament, and which was not carried. There was, at this attack, only a detachment of 222 men, drawn from the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc, exclusive of 12 soldiers belonging to the Colonial troops. The remainder of the party, the total whereof amounted to 1500 men, was composed of Colonial Militia and Indians. Chevalier de Montreuil, who found himself in command, conducted the retreat. Our troops performed, on this occasion, incredible prodigies of valor; alone they attacked the front of the intrenchment, and withstood, during three hours, a very brisk fire of musketry and grape; but were finally obliged to yield to force. The enemy was so astonished at the attack that they dared not leave their camp to pursue us. The English lost at least 500 men, and we are assured that Colonel Johnson, who was in command, has received a musket ball in the thigh.

The following, my Lord, is our loss in this action :

Baron de Dieskau, Major-General,	{	Remained on the field of battle. 'Tis not yet known whether he be dead or a prisoner.
M. Bernier, his Aid-de-Camp,	{	His fate is not yet precisely known; he has not yet made his appearance, but is believed to be killed.
M. de la Gurjonniere, Lieutenant in the Languedoc, acting Adjutant, wherein he acquitted himself very well,	{	Killed.
Of La Reine, 3 Sergeants, .. 21	{	26 killed.
18 Soldiers, ....	{
Of Languedoc, 5 Soldiers, .... 5	{	Wounded.
M. de Biville, Lieutenant of La Reine,	{
Of La Reine, 2 Sergeants, .. 30	{	50 wounded; of whom only two have since died of their wounds.
28 Soldiers, ...	{
Of Languedoc, 20 Soldiers, ... 20	{

There have been killed, in addition, 7 soldiers of the Colony; 25 Canadians and 33 Indians. And, 35 Canadians and 40 Indians wounded.

Of the officers of the Colonial troops and Canadian Militia, 5 have been killed and 4 wounded, one of whom has since died of his wounds.

The enemy has not made any movement since. M. de Roquemaure, Commander of the battalion of La Reine, on whom, of right, the command of the four battalions devolved, is encamped at Fort St. Frederic, and is having, by order of M. de Vaudreuil, an intrenchment erected at Carillon at the Fall of Lake St. Sacrament, for the purpose of protecting that fort, which is 4 leagues from it.

The Guienne and Béarn battalions were encamped and intrenched, since the first of August, at Fort Frontenac, situate on Lake Ontario. They have held in check a body of about 2000 men, who are intrenched under the English fort at Chouaguen, on the same lake. Guienne left on the 5th of this month for Niagara; that battalion will also work there at intrenchments, and at repairs to the fort, which is in a miserable condition; 4 pickets will winter there, 3 of Béarn at Frontenac, and one of each of the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc at Fort St. Frederic, on Lake Champlain.

The main body will be here and in the neighborhood, within a circumference of 5 leagues, in order to be more convenient for marching next spring. These are M. de Vaudreuil's arrangements at present, who has done me the favor to consult me on the subject.

The departure of his courier prevents me entering into fuller details. I am even obliged to write this letter in very great haste.

I must not terminate, however, without taking the liberty to remind you, my Lord, of Brigadier Gantes, commanding the volunteers of Dauphiné. He is an officer whom you have honored with your protection and kindness, and on whom you could bestow a new mark thereof by honoring him with M. de Dieskau's place. It does not become me, my Lord, to speak to you of his merit and talents; he is my brother-in-law. On this account you will not take it ill that I presume to propose him to you, assuring you, my Lord, that it would be very agreeable to M. de Vaudreuil, whom I have sounded. I might, equally, guarantee the votes of our battalions, who have seen him manœuvre during the last war. They entertain for him the highest esteem, and know, by experience, that he unites to great valor the prudence and intelligence that are so necessary. I flatter myself, my Lord, that you will pardon me the liberty I take out of consideration for the motive.

I am, with most profound respect, My Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

Answer of M. de Vaudreuil to the Five Nations.

Answers of the Marquis de Vaudreuil to the message which the Five Nations sent him by Deputies from the Mission of La Présentation, 22<sup>d</sup> October, 1755.

Children of the Five Nations.

I have listened attentively to the word you have addressed me by my children of La Présentation. You cannot have better speakers than those of that village, who, aware of my sentiments towards you, have been so good as to take charge of conveying your Belts to me, and of letting me know all you have said to them. I answer, then, your three Words.

First Belt.

Children. You assure me, by your first Belt, not only of your neutrality but even of your having embraced prudent counsels, and that nothing can separate you therefrom. You answer for your young men, but you request me not to stain the lands you inhabit with blood.

By a Belt.

Children. It seems you know the whole extent of my goodness for you, and that you persuade yourselves that you can easily influence me. You're right. Were I to treat you as you deserve, I would reject your Belt, and, instead of having the complacency to reply, would make you experience all the resentment I ought to feel at your infidelity. But I am very willing to convince you that my goodness surpasses all that you could expect from it.

If your sentiments towards me were as sincere as mine for you, you would blush at merely having had the thought of announcing your neutrality to me. Ought children be neutral in what affects their father? In truth, you do not speak from the bottom of your heart, and I must be persuaded that you inwardly belie yourselves. No matter; you wish to be neutral. Be so.

I cannot believe that you have embraced prudent counsels; ought you ever have abandoned them? Have not the French, on the contrary, given you every reason to occupy yourselves wholly therewith? Have they ever induced you to commit the least act against any one? Have I not always assisted you in your necessities, and by my good counsels in all your affairs? Why have you not profited by them? You are intractable children, and with difficulty will I be able to restore your senses to you, so far have they gone astray; I can even say that you no longer possess any. Your most cruel enemy has stolen them from you.

You beg of me not to stain the lands you inhabit with blood. Why do you present me such a request? Have I occupied myself with any other thought than with that of preserving them to you; and if, through kindness to you, I had not removed your enemies from them, would they not have expelled you therefrom? Had you not lost your senses you would thank me for all I have done for you.

In fine, I retain your Belt, not to recall the subject which led you to send it to me, but because it comes from you and you still hold a place in my heart. I give you a Belt, which you will carry to your villages to let all my children know that I cease not to be their father, and that I rely on their not delaying to afford me proofs of their continuing to be my children.

Second Word.

Children. You admit that you have accepted the hatchet of the English, but that on considering the alliance made with the French from time immemorial, you have rejected it to attach yourselves, for the future, only to prudent counsels; you request me not to reproach you with any of the present affairs, and that nothing can cause you to conceal the Belt you have resumed.

By a Belt.

From all time have you received proofs of my goodness. I wish to give you, to-day, the greatest you can desire, by accepting your Belt, in the sole view of reminding you, on all occasions, that you are unnatural children; that you have accepted the hatchet against your father; and that, out of pity to you, I do not subject you to the punishment your base treachery calls for.

Vain would it be for you to call to mind your alliance with the French, were I not still for you a father full of indulgence. You would have lost all the advantage that alliance has, on all occasions, procured for you the moment you renounced it by the most criminal treason; and scarcely had you taken up the hatchet against me but my children would have devoured you, and gnawed with their teeth even unto the marrow of your bones, had I not held them back, without it being of any use to you to tell them that you had cast away that hatchet to occupy yourself no longer with any but prudent affairs.

Can you ask me not to impute to you any of the present matters? Do you forget all you have done, and do you think that I am ignorant of it? No, in truth you are well persuaded that I have watched your behavior, and followed you in all your trials. I have seen; I have heard you! Do you doubt my having in my hands the papers of General Braddock? I have the identical Messages you have sent him; I have, likewise, your solemn conference with Colonel Johanson. My children of the Upper country have always reported to me the Messages and Belts that you had constantly carried to them from your enemy and mine. Dispense with my saying any more to you on this point.

You say, that nothing can make you conceal the Belt you have resumed. How can I believe you? How often have you not deceived me? How often have I not pardoned you? The Belt you have resumed is your usual expedient to excite my indulgence. It is not sufficient for you to keep that Belt; you have too often tarnished it by your reiterated treasons. I wish to strengthen it by that which I give you. Join them together. Send them from village to village, from cabin to cabin, and daily repeat: We have been too unfortunate to betray the best of all fathers; we deserved death; he has granted us pardon.

Third Word.

You cover the death of the officers who have been killed at the Beautiful river, and at the portage of Lake St. Sacrament, particularly M<sup>r</sup> de Longueuil, until, as you say, you are able to come down to cover it yourselves.

By a Belt.

How am I to receive your Belt? Will it not be, with reason, as an avowal, on your part, that it is you, the Five Nations, who have killed these officers? Will I not be justified in sending this Belt from Nation to Nation in order to excite the vengeance of all my children? Can you reasonably suppose that I have not seen you against me with arms in your hands? Have I not been a witness of all your actions, and would any of you be actually alive, had I not made use of all my authority to restrain my children, who, in their fury, would have slaughtered you and your wives and children, and laid waste all your lands? Ought you not be confused at my exceeding great goodness? I receive your Belt, but 'tis to let you see, on all occasions, that the French blood which you have unjustly shed, cries aloud for vengeance on you; that on the first fault you will commit, you will suffer the fate you have so long deserved. I present you this Belt in order that my words may never be effaced from your memories. Repeat them every day to your old men and warriors, your wives and little ones; let them never forget them, and let the one and the other mourn their fault and hasten, in like manner, to repair it.

In regard to the Baron de Longueuil, is it yet time to cover his death? Had your grief and regrets been sincere, would you have delayed, until now, coming to afford me proofs thereof? How often have you not heralded the announcement that you were setting out to come and bewail the Governor? Wherefore do you defer it? If you will acknowledge the truth, 'tis the Evil Spirit that hath prevented you doing so.

You could not come to see me too soon; you are, yourselves, ashamed of delaying so long. You dare not make your appearance because you admit your guilt. No matter. I will receive you, and if you give me convincing proofs that you repent of your crimes, and will avenge them on those who are, at bottom, the real authors of them, your brethren, both the domiciliated and the Upper Nations, will continue to be your brothers and friends.

But, as a good father, I must warn you, that if you should, unfortunately for yourselves, resume your infamous conduct, you will receive no more mercy, and the arms of all my children will weigh so heavy on you that they will crush you to earth without a single one of you escaping; M. de Callières' tree and treaty oblige them thereto; and, moreover, their inclination and attachment to me incline them but too strongly to do so. Reflect, seriously, on what I tell you, and employ every means to avoid experiencing the fatal effects thereof.

Remember your ancestors who had sense, and who, on all occasions, gave proofs of their good conduct; recollect, old men, the beautiful sky under which you lived in the time of my father, who loved you, as I do; listen to my voice as they listened to his, and you will enjoy the most perfect peace and tranquillity.

We, Pierre Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of Saint Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout the entire of New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana,

Do certify that the present copy is conformable to the original in our Secretary's office. In testimony whereof we have signed this present, and thereunto have caused the seal of our Arms to be affixed, and the same to be countersigned by our Secretary.

Done at Montreal the 13th February, 1758.

By my Lord :	(Signed),	VAUDREUIL.

M. Bigot to M. de Machault.

Quebec, 23<sup>d</sup> October, 1755.

My Lord,

A farmer placed in my hands, a few days ago, a stitched book or register, written in English, which he had found on the field of battle, after the action at Fort Duquesne. It contained nothing of interest except two Minutes of Instructions which General Braddock had given to Colonel Johnson and Colonel Shirley. I have had them translated by M. Perthuis, of the Superior Council, and have the honor to address you copies thereof hereunto annexed.

Colonel Shirley's instructions fully confirm the design of the English to seize Niagara and the entire district bordering on the South of Lake Ontario, on pretext of protecting the Five Nations and putting them again into possession of their ancient territory, of which, the English pretend, that we have stripped them. You will remark therein, my Lord, that this Colonel is authorized to draw on the treasury of the King of England for the sums necessary for these operations, which proves that that Prince incurs the greatest portion of the expenses for the execution of the plans he has formed against Canada.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble, etc.,

BIGOR.

M. de Lotbiniere to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp at Carillon, 24th 8<sup>ber</sup>, 1755.

My Lord,

I announced to you, last year, a continuation of the Memoir that I sent you, and at the moment I was preparing to perform my promise I have been detached to the place I am at present stationed at, and so occupied that I employ the night to detail to you whatever of the greatest interest has occurred in this country since the spring.

Last fall, as I had the honor to observe to you, the English began a fort at the foot of the Aliganai mountains, which they called Fort Cumberland. It is 110 miles from ours on the Beautiful river, according to their calculation. They have dispatched, from Europe, in the winter, two regiments of Regulars, of 500 men each, under the command of M<sup>r</sup> Braddock, who arrived at Alexandria, in Virginia, on the 24th of February. The King had conferred on him the commission of General of all the forces of North America, and he was to superintend the operations prepared at the Court of London whilst it was amusing the Court of France with a thousand proposals of peace, so as to be in a condition the more securely to invade the country. General Braddock, on his arrival at Virginia, prepared to take the field early in April. He reserved unto himself the capture of the fort on the Ohio, and seemed to have adopted all his precautions to secure success. Notwithstanding, as he has not been seconded by the Provinces of New England, agreeably to his wishes, and had been obliged to wait an exceeding long time for wagons and other necessities which the Provinces were to supply, he could not leave Fort Cumberland before the first days of June. Our Indians had reported to us, in the winter, that the English were making great preparations; but Mons<sup>r</sup> Duquesne, to whom that intelligence was repeatedly brought, treated it as an empty boast, and said it was only a fire of straw. He, consequently, did not adopt any precautions necessary against so general a movement. In the month of June M. de Vaudreuil arrived, who was told that the government was in a marvellous condition. In the latter part of June, arrived M. Duquesne, who repeated to his successor what he had already written, and, two days after, news was received of the capture of Beausejour. M. Duquesne, who knew that his fort was menaced, had sent a reinforcement thither, totally neglecting the other quarters. The reinforcement arrived at the aforesaid point, and, on the 9th of July, knowing that the enemy was no more than three leagues from Fort Duquesne, 891 men were dispatched, 250 of whom were French and the remainder Indians, under the command of M. de Beaujeu,<sup>1</sup> Captain of our troops, who found himself in front of the enemy at 11 o'clock of the forenoon. He attacked them with great vigor, and after a contest of 5 hours, our detachment succeeded in totally routing a van-guard of 13 hundred and some men, exclusive of wagoners, under General Braddock, whose rear-guard of 700 men was about eight leagues distant, and not attacked. That van guard included Halket's<sup>2</sup> regiment, raised to 700 men since its arrival in Virginia; 3 independent companies of 100 men each; the rest, Provincials. 600 remained dead on the field; a very great number wounded — since dead, by the returns. The General himself was wounded on the occasion, and died some leagues from the field of battle.

In a word, of these 1300 men, only about 300 returned; of these, 11 were officers, out of more than 150, their original number. We lost only the Commandant and two other Officers, 30 and some Canadians and Indians, and nearly about the same number of wounded. The entire of the enemy's artillery, his carriages and all his equipments remained on the field of battle, and caused such a considerable booty, that it stopped our troops. General Braddock's papers were found, containing the King's Instructions to him, written with reserve, and which were more amplified by a despatch of Colonel Napier,<sup>3</sup> Adjutant-General, written by order of the Duke of Cumberland, to serve as a guide in all his operations, whereby it appeared that General Braddock had orders from the Court of London to prepare, 1st, material for the reduction of the fort on the Ohio; 2nd, for the reduction of Niagara, under the command of Colonel Shirley, Governor of Boston; 3<sup>d</sup>, of Fort St. Frederic, under Colonel Johnson's orders; 4th, for the capture of Beausejour, which was proposed by Colonel L'auarence, Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia. It was ascertained by General Braddock's letters to the Minister, that he was marching at the head of 2000 men for the Ohio; that he had designed Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments, of 1000 men each, for Niagara, and that 4400 Provincials were to attack Fort St. Frederic; that when the fort on the Ohio would be taken, General Braddock was to unite his forces with those of Choûaguén, where we were to be attacked by a body of 4 thousand 3 or 4 hundred men.

The battalions of Guienne and Béarn accordingly defiled complete for Fort Frontenac, our general rendezvous; those of La Reine and Languedoc, each of which lacked 4 companies that were captured by the English on board le Lys at the entrance of the Gulf, marched also for the place of rendezvous; but as we learned, at the same time, by some of our scouts, that the English were cutting roads to attack Fort St. Frederic, the two latter regiments were countermanded before they reached La Présentation and were ordered to Fort St. Frederic. 200 of our troops, 1700 to 1800 Canadians, and 6 to 700 Indians were adjoined to them, carrying that army up to about 3 thousand 3 hundred men, under the command of M. de Dieskau, Brigadier-General, who had come to command the troops which had been sent out to us this year.

The General dispatched divers scouts, the 1st of which did not succeed. Finally, one of them informed him that the English had attempted two roads, one by Wood creek, the other by Lake St. Sacrament. These two routes terminate, by water, at Carillon, where I am at present, and which is 5 leagues south of Fort St. Frederic. He notified M. de Vaudreuil of the circumstance, and informed him that he designed dividing his army in 2, in order to attack by both routes. M. de Vaudreuil wrote him that it would be much better to unite all his forces and thereby profit by the advantage the enemy were giving us by dividing their troops, whom we could, thereby, hope to defeat in detail, as we should be more numerous at either of the two places they might present themselves. This did not prevent him marching a few days after to attack a fort only 6 leagues from Lake St. Sacrament, on the ground that the defence of that fort was weakened by sending back 600 men in consequence of sickness, and the fatigue they endured in cutting roads from their new fort to Lake St. Sacrament. He thought, or appeared to be under the impression, that all the English army had been dismissed, leaving only the guard of Fort Lydius. He formed a detachment of 1500; 200 Regulars and the remainder Canadians and Indians, and took the route by land to attack them. Within 1 league of the fort he captured a courier whom Johnson had detached with word to the Commander of the fort that he was about to be attacked; to be careful to bury his guns which were without the inclosure, and prepare, with his men, for a brave defence. He learned from others that Johnson was at Lake St. Sacrament with about 3000 men, including 400 Indians of the 5 Nations, and proceeded to attack that body of troops. The Indians, 'tis true, preferred this attack to that of the fort. He pushed his men briskly forward, who began already to be much fatigued, and at  $\frac{2}{3}$  of a league from the English camp encountered a sortie of 4 or 500 men, who were overthrown in an instant, with considerable loss.

M. de Dieskau, thinking that he could enter, pell-mell, with the fugitives, followed close on their heels, and found himself under the fire of the intrenchment before he was aware of it. He was treated to so continuous a volley of musketry that his troops could not proceed any farther. He threw himself on the left, where the Canadians were stationed, to make an attack on that side; but being quite close to the enemy, was struck by a ball in the bone of the leg, which prevented him going any farther, and as he persisted in remaining on the same spot, he received a 2nd ball in the knees which broke them both; an attempt was made to remove him, but he opposed it; two Canadians were brought to him, one of whom was killed outright; the other, who wanted to carry him on his back, was not accepted; several others were sent to him for the same purpose, but they succeeded no better in persuading him; our detachment remained sometime longer, and seeing that it was idle to think of carrying that post, retired after having lost more than 130 men, and a greater number of wounded.

The intrenchment consisted of bateaux turned upside down and of wagons; in a word, it announced men who had been advised, but a short time previously, of our march.

That defeat somewhat discouraged our Canadians and Indians, who seldom approve being thus exposed without any hope of success, whilst, had he taken all his men with him; had he, even with the force he had, contented himself with occupying the road communicating between Lydius and Lake St. Sacrament, the distance between them being 6 leagues, he would have certainly obliged the enemy, who were as yet without provisions at their new camp, to come out, when he might have attacked them more advantageously; but it must be acknowledged that he felt very jealous of the action on the Beautiful river, and was anxious to efface it by something more brilliant.

M. de Vaudreuil, who saw this frontier more exposed than ever, detached me to erect a fort beyond that of St. Frederic, whereby the enemy might be stopped in the next campaign. For that purpose I have selected the site of Carillon, which is at the junction of the waters of the Two Rocks<sup>1</sup> with the outlet of Lake St. Sacrament. The 2 Rocks is a very advantageous outpost to this one, as I am informed. It receives the waters of the Wood creek of the South Bay and of the Drowned Lands, whereby the enemy could approach with more difficulty than by Lake St. Sacrament.

The battalions of Guienne and of Béarn have remained at Fort Frontenac to keep the English of Chouaguen in check, and M. de Vaudreuil has sent [that of] Guienne to Niagara, with orders, I believe, to fortify that place.

If I can succeed in erecting at Carillon the fort I have projected, we shall be able to stop the enemy in the next campaign. I commenced it too late to expect to finish it this year. I shall continue to prepare everything, so as to place myself in a position to finish it next spring; we are within  $\frac{1}{2}$  a league of the little portage of Lake St. Sacrament, and if men are kept here, advantage can be taken of a league of a defile, where we should have greatly the advantage of the enemy.

We are under tents (la toile), which is rather severe for the season in this country. I alone am replacing the three Engineers sent us this year. They were infinitely better paid than I am, and I hope, my Lord, that you will be pleased to feel for my interests. I flatter myself that the Court will grant me my promotion and a better salary than the one I have. My pay is 600*l.* and no more. I'm urged to conclude, and the opportunity leaves this instant. Had I had a little time, I might have endeavored to connect better the facts I have detailed, and would not be obliged to send you a letter so full of erasures and so illegible. I am persuaded that the interest you take in the country would induce you to overlook all these things, provided you were informed of all that occurs.

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Camp at Carillon, 24th 8<sup>ber</sup>, 1755.

LOBINIERE.

Should the enemy attack us by sea, and on all the sides he has began to do this year, I do not well know how we shall be able to extricate ourselves, which circumstance demands considerable attention on the part of the Court. He is strengthening Chouaguen.

The battle of Lake St. Sacrament was fought on the 8th of 7<sup>ber</sup>.

Commissary Doreil to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 25th October, 1755.

My Lord,

After having rendered you separately as detailed an account as my limited time permitted me, of the department of the service you have confided to me, I proceed to have the honor of informing you in cipher, of some particular matters you have referred to me. I am obliged to do so succinctly and briefly, as I am unable to embrace so many objects at once. I shall speak to you, my Lord, with the most exact truth; my zeal and duty oblige me thereto. I proceed, and particularly with what concerns M. de Dieskaw.

He is charged, my Lord, with being too ardent, and even too rash. Yet, 'tis admitted that it is difficult to excuse those who did not have him removed when they were retiring. These object that he would not consent [to be removed] in such a case a General should have been removed, even though he were dying [in preference to leaving him] to perish absolutely, because he witnessed the failure of his enterprise, and he ought to have been taken off dead or alive, so as not to leave so glorious a trophy in the hands of the enemy. I pity him with all my heart, because I am persuaded that his intentions were good, and am certain he has been deceived. But I avow that I had a secret presentment that misfortune would overtake him, because I knew him to be too great a stickler for the dangerous principle that intrepidity alone can accomplish the most difficult things. M. de Vaudreuil says, publicly, that he had expressly forbidden him in the orders and instructions with which he was furnished, to run any risk, and particularly not to divide his forces.

He had taken 3500 men with him; of these, 1000 were Regulars, the remainder Canadians. The Indians have reported that, on being told by an English prisoner that the enemy, who was said at first to be marching against Fort St. Frederic, had divided their forces, he marched with 1500 men, 200 of whom only were detachments from the battalions of La Reine and that of Languedoc, and 1200 Provincials; and, after four days' march, he was much surprised to find a corps of about 3000 men encamped and intrenched near Lake St. Sacrament, which he determined on the spot to attack, without even giving time to all the Indians and Canadians to arrive, who, on the way, had just destroyed or dispersed about 400 men that were going, on learning our march, to reinforce Fort Lydius, on the River of Orange, against which they supposed M. de Dieskaw had a design.

Such, my Lord, in general, is what is imputed to him. I think that a good deal would have to be deducted were he to reappear. For his justification it is, however, added, that, had he not placed all his confidence in a Colonial officer of artillery named M. le Mercier, whose advice alone he received, he would not have divided his forces, and the affair would not have turned out so bad. I lament all I hear because I was necessarily so much attached to M. de Dieskaw. As he was not accompanied by either the Commandant of the battalion of La Reine, or the Commander of that of Languedoc, having left these corps behind, Chevalier de Montreuil, Adjutant-General, assumed the command when M. de Dieskaw was put hors de combat, and conducted the retreat. It has, as yet, been impossible to ascertain, precisely, whether M. de Dieskaw has been massacred by the hostile Indians, which is greatly to be feared, or whether he is a prisoner among the English. Both are reported, but it would not be prudent to decide in this regard. I have considered it my duty, my Lord, to inform you of these details. I beg you to keep my letter secret.

Since the occurrence of the 8th of September, the four battalions are under the orders of M. de Roquemaure, commanding the battalion of Guyenne. M. de St. Julien, Commandant of the battalion of Artois and of the two battalions which are serving at Isle Royale, is his senior.

It is very essential, my Lord, that, to replace M. de Dieskaw, you should have a chief selected whose prudence is as unquestionable as the other qualities necessary to a General. M. de Vaudreuil doubtless applies to M. Machault for one; but though he should omit doing so, it would not be less an absolute necessity; the situation of this Colony is critical in all respects; it requires prompt and powerful assistance. I dare even assert that if some one be not sent, it runs the greatest risks next year, for there is no doubt the English will make the greatest efforts to invade the country, and that we shall be attacked next spring. The troops are in the best disposition; they sustain, with unlimited constancy and zeal, the fatigues and difficulties to which they have been incessantly exposed since their arrival; but their number is so small, and the extent of country to be guarded so great, that they cannot suffice. I regard, then, as certain, my Lord, that the King will send some reinforcements next year. In that case permit me one observation, whereupon I have conferred with M. de Vaudreuil who agrees with me in opinion. Among the number of battalions that you will order over, I think it would be well to send one Irish battalion, the rather as it would possess all the necessary resources to recruit itself. I must remark here, my Lord, that, counting from next spring, you may calculate on the diminution of the amount of one battalion out of the four here, regard being had to the loss of the eight companies captured on board le Lys.

It will be, likewise, necessary, my Lord, to order out the same number of Engineers that you had sent, and were taken on board l'Alcide. They are urgently required. In this Colony there are only some Naval Engineers, who are unable to attack or defend places, and their Chief is so old that he can no longer march; but when sending those Engineers, the Bureau of the Marine must not again commit the mistake of putting them all on board the same ship.

There are three officers here called officers of artillery, of whom M. le Mercier is chief. I have already spoken to you of him; the other two are Mess<sup>rs</sup> Jacob and de Lusignan; and one company of gunners and bombardiers, but according to the advice I have received from the officers of our battalions, all this is merely in name, and it appears to me of vast importance that some officers of artillery should be sent out; for where would we be, for example, should the English make sufficiently great efforts to realize their projects of attacking Quebec by sea, whilst penetrating overland to Montreal and throughout the interior of the Colony, which might be the case next year. The fortifications of both these places excite pity. The forts of the Colony—beginning with Fort Duquesne, so vaunted that it has given rise to the present war—are miserable bicoques,<sup>1</sup> fit only to bring dishonor down on all who will command them. A house surrounded by a little ditch, with stockades or palisades 7 or 8 feet over the ground but in such a bad state that most of them fall through rottenness, composes what is styled Fort Niagara. The same is the case with almost all the rest. This excites grief in the minds of the honest servants of the King, who are aware what extravagant sums it has cost him. I have no fear, my Lord, of pushing observations too far with so respectable a Minister, my attachment to whom I shall ever esteem as my greatest glory. Although I have naught in view save the good of the King's service and the honor of his arms, I shall carefully refrain from making any similar observations to M. de Machault.

Permit me, my Lord, to remind you, in this secret despatch, of the account I render you exclusively of the battalions of Artois and Burgundy, which are, in truth, to be pitied in every point of view, and would be more so did I not effect impossibilities to relieve them, by incessantly befriending them with the Intendant. M. Prévost, Commissary of Marine, <sup>1</sup> A term signifying an ill fortified place. It is derived from a locality between Lodi and Milan, which was originally a gentleman's country house surrounded by ditches. In the year 1522, a body of imperial troops were stationed in it and stood the attack of the whole French army. This engagement was called the battle of Bicoque. James' Military Dictionary. — Ed.

Superintendent of Finance in Ile Royale, quite disdains the commission of Commissary of the war department which you have had sent him. He has explained himself on the subject in his letters to M. Bigot, who spoke to me on the matter whilst blaming him. He has pretended that a clerk in the Marine ought to perform all the duties thereof, and would insist that the troops should pass in review before such clerk, to whom it was also required that the Parole should be communicated by a Sergeant of the circle.<sup>1</sup> Though all these pretensions have been provided for by the Intendant, who, at my request, has sent him orders to terminate them, I am warranted in believing that he will persist, for you perceive, my Lord, by a letter from M. St. Julien to M. de Dieskaw and to myself, that notwithstanding precise orders issued by M. Bigot, he has continued, among other matters, to refuse the troops things the most just, affirming that he should await the orders of the Court. My despatches on the special letter respecting Ile Royale contain the fullest details, to which I beg you, my Lord, for the good of the troops, to be pleased to pay attention. This M. Prevost, whom I do not know, has the reputation of being a stingy, difficult and self-sufficient man. He it was who lived on such bad terms with Major-General de Raymond, formerly Governor of Ile Royale, and who, it is said, has been the cause of the latter's recall.<sup>2</sup> However that be, my Lord, I, individually, request you to consider how indecent it would be, and how mortifying for the troops and Commissaries of war, that a clerk of the Marine should perform our duties. Moreover, I am acquainted with the person in question. He is of Toulon. I infer, from the manner M. de Prévost speaks in public and has written to me of this man, that he will apply to M. de Machault to be sent as Commissary of War next spring. 'Tis very necessary, my Lord, for the good of the troops and the service, that you give them satisfaction, and that the Commissary whom you will send out, have orders to correspond with me.

I have had the honor to inform you in my letter of the 20th instant, by the frigate la Fidèle, that M. de Vaudreuil intended stationing 200 men near the Guyenne battalion this winter at Niagara, 150 of the Béarn battalion at Frontenac, 50 of La Reine and 50 of the Languedoc battalion at St. Frederic. In communicating his plan to me, he told me that he wished to have some companies remain; I submitted to him the inconvenience of it, requesting him to make these detachments up by pickets, as was the custom in France. He granted my request. That brought forth an explanation respecting the Commandants of the forts, from which I discovered that, by the arrangements of the Marine and his own, officers belonging to our troops are not to pretend to such appointments, at least for this year; it is a great hardship for them, my Lord, the rather as, were it not for me, there would have been in the detachments seniors to those of the Marine, to whose orders they are to be subject. To spare them such mortification, I have proposed to M. de Vaudreuil to have the officers of the pickets who remain detached, taken from the juniors (par la queue). He consented, and I shall see it executed. I am aware, my Lord, that this is contrary to the usual rule of the infantry service but you see my motive. I am already certain that it will be agreeable to the officers of our battalions, whom I save from the disagreeableness of being perhaps under the orders of juniors. Another advantage also results herefrom, which is, that the younger officers are better able to bear the hardships of the forts during the winter than those of a certain age, and before the return of the latter comes, I hope, my Lord, either that you will have issued contrary orders, or that we shall have returned to France. There is so little accommodation in the forts, that half the officers and all the soldiers are in huts. This is sorry repose for troops who have not enjoyed a single moment's rest since January. They bear their hardships and fatigues without a murmur, but they have great need of my watching over them. I shall not neglect to do so. Fortunately, I can flatter myself with being agreeable to M. de Vaudreuil and on the best terms with him. I have been careful to cultivate his good opinion, and have endeavored to gain his confidence during our voyage. I shall pay attention to keeping near him principally until the arrival of the Commandant, who will be destined for us. I shall, consequently, pass the winter here.

<sup>2</sup> M. Pichon, Secretary to Count Raymond, has given the following sketch of Commissary Prévost: "The Ordonnateur who remains in the Colony has, so to speak, grown grey in the harness. He has come quite young to the country. He even has reared the Creole whom he has married. Many say, that he understands, perfectly, the advantages and interests of this Colony; some, and especially his adversaries, have pretended that he understands, still more thoroughly, his own; that he favors only his relations and friends; that, through unjust preferences, he discourages settlers and thereby prevents the progress of the place. This Commandant reproached him, moreover, with his low origin, his first employment as clerk of the Marine, and the mediocrity of his talents for whatever does not regard himself personally. But he who was casting these reproaches is not, himself, entirely exempt from them." Lettres, &c., pour servir à l'histoire du Cap Breton, p. 149. — Ed.

M. de Dieskaw has doubtless demanded some favors from you for the battalions, which, I dare assure you, deserve that you should deviate somewhat in their favor from the general rule, as regards the Crosses especially. I am persuaded that M. de Vaudreuil will write to you on the subject. I do so in virtue of my office, and consider it a duty. Among the Adjutants, M. de la Pause, of the Guyenne battalion, and M. de Malartis, of Béarn, deserve the highest eulogiums. There is no vacancy except that of M. de la Fursoniere, Lieutenant in the Languedoc battalion, who has been killed in the affair of the 5th of 7<sup>ber</sup>. As I have not seen that battalion since, I am ignorant who will be proposed to succeed him. There is in that battalion a young gentleman named M. de Courcy d'Herculles, well known to Marshal de Maillebois,<sup>1</sup> whom I have placed there as a volunteer on his recommendation, since our arrival in the Colony. I had requested M. de Dieskaw to propose him for the first vacancy. In my last letter, concerning the battalions of Artois and the Burgundy, I had the honor to mention to you M. de la Tour, first Service-Captain (factionnaire)<sup>2</sup> of the Artois battalion, who proceeds to France; Sub-lieutenant Delpreil, of the grenadiers of the Burgundy battalion, who died of small-pox on the 5th of August, and Captain d'Aligny, of the battalion of Artois, whose resignation I transmit.

Captain de St. Vincent, of the battalion of Guyenne, has just written to M. de Vaudreuil, to explain to him that delicacy of feeling alone determined him to embark; and, having long suffered from very bad health, it has become so much worse, that he can remain in Canada only until the fall of next year. M. de Vaudreuil having given me communication of this letter, I told him, as I assure you, my Lord, that this officer is, in fact, in a dangerous condition.

<sup>1</sup> JEAN BAPTISTE FRANÇOIS DESMARETS, Marquis de Maillebois, son of Nicolas Desmarets, Comptroller-General of France, and grandson of the great Colbert, was born in Paris in 1682; became Colonel of the regiment of Touraine in 1702; was afterwards employed in Flanders, and, having distinguished himself at the siege of Lille, in 1708, was promoted to the rank of Major-General. He was created Lieutenant-General in 1731; commanded a division of the army in Italy in 1733, and at the peace, was appointed Governor of Dauphiné; in 1739 was sent to Corsica, which he subdued in three weeks; was created Marshal in 1741; next served in Germany; thence went to Italy, where he defeated the Austrians and Piedmontese on the banks of the Po, in October, 1745, but was afterwards forced to retreat, with serious loss. In 1748 he was named Governor of Alsace, and died in Paris, 7th February, 1762. A history of his campaigns has been published, Paris, 1775, 3 vols. 4to, with Atlas. Biographie Universelle. — Eo.

<sup>2</sup> Premier Capitaine factionnaire implied that the officer so called was the fourth Captain of a battalion; as the Colonel, Lieutenant-Colonel, Major and the Captain of grenadiers did not mount the ordinary guards. James.

I had him under my eye one year continuously, in 1750, when his regiment was in garrison in Toulon. He had then a pulmonary attack, and was reduced to a milk diet.

I know that Captain d'Aubrespy, of the Béarn battalion, is to submit to you the reasons for his returning to France, which he left purely from motives of delicacy. M. de Cremille was struck by, and admired his conduct on that occasion. You are in a position, my Lord, to call on him for a report on the subject. Both these officers are exposed to passing a sorry winter at Niagara and Frontenac. It were desirable that they and the others had been longer in ignorance of the danger to be encountered in returning to France, even by permission; some persons have been so indiscreet as to inform them of it on arriving in the Colony.

M. de Dieskaw proposed to lay before you some difficulties in regard to the military honors usually rendered in this Colony, without being authorized by any ordinance, viz: For the Governor-General, the honors of a Marshal of France; for the Intendant, those of a Lieutenant-General; for a Commodore, the same; a Captain of a ship requires guards to turn out (se mettre en haie). Our troops are obliged to comply, notwithstanding the provisions of the ordinance of 7th of June, 1750; they have expressed their objections to me against it, but must obey. Something worse even than that happened. On the first day of our landing, there died a Lieutenant of a ship, who ranks only with a Captain of Infantry. As such, M. de Dieskaw commanded that an escort of 50 men should accompany the corpse. The gentlemen of the Navy would insist on 80 men, under pretext that they are in the habit of furnishing them in their ports, which is true, and they refused the 50 men who were sent back, and the burial took place without any honors. M. de Vaudreuil did not wish on this occasion to offer the remotest slight to the Navy. The service has been very badly performed; everything was confounded and in confusion; very little experience therein; it goes somewhat better. I flatter myself that I have contributed somewhat thereto. I have succeeded as regards the department of Hospitals, which specially concerns me, in establishing the military and police discipline, to which I pay exact attention.

I would treat here of other matters very essential to the King's interests, but, independent of being foreign to my duties and the details of war, they are so monstrous that they would appear incredible, unless in a volume. I confine myself to carefully seeing that our troops be furnished with what they are entitled to, and to conciliating all, so as to maintain that complete harmony which ought to prevail, and you have so strictly enjoined, though it is no easy matter, and much of my own must be put into it. I can assure you, my Lord, that I have succeeded so far, that everything goes on with regularity. Nothing is issued except on my written orders or requisition, and as I take care not to give any lightly, there is no more difficulty. This adds to my labors; but it is cheerfully done for the maintenance of order and good understanding. The same rule is observed in regard to the public chest. I write a note containing the reason therefor (motivé), wherein I request M. Bigot to pay such an amount for such an article; he annexes his check at foot, and the treasurer pays the amount, so that the staff officers apply to me for whatever they want. M. Bigot does not meddle in any manner with military matters; to these as well as to what appertains to hospitals, I attend en chef. I have no reason to complain of him, and hope he has no cause to complain of me. I give him whatever is his due, and he reciprocates by acts of politeness and attention.

Permit me, on this occasion, to represent to you, my Lord, that he and the entire corps of Marine and Regulars believe, that I hold a commission of ordonnateur, and so style me, persuaded that such favor has been the fruit of all the sacrifices I, in expatriating myself, have submitted to in common with all who compose our staff. I acknowledge to you, my Lord, that this is an impression, the correction of which would be too painful to my self-esteem; I dare even say that by making it, I would have lessened the opinion entertained of the prerogatives of my position, and injuriously affected the advantages the troops derive from that favorable opinion, which I endeavor to confirm by decency of demeanor. You are too just, my Lord, to disapprove of my conduct and to refuse me any longer a favor which will flatter me the more, as I shall be indebted for it to your goodness. I dare not say that it is merited; yet, I am at the end of the sixth year of a laborious and unceasing service. I have abandoned my affairs, children in the cradle, compromised my health, exposed my life, and am overwhelmed by the burden of work and the duties imposed upon me by the office you have confided to me and the importance of which I appreciate, so far as to flatter myself with filling it well or dying under the load. I am about giving you, my Lord, a new proof of zeal and of my attachment to the King's interests, in order to have the more merit in your estimation. You did intend to give me a deputy for Canada. I have been deprived of that assistance hitherto, and in the most critical time. I have, notwithstanding, met all engagements, and my health is no worse. I feel disposed to dispense with a deputy for another year, and to save the King that expense. You can therefore forego sending me one here, my Lord, even though additional troops come out. It is absolutely necessary that you be so good as to send one to Ile Royale.

There remains one matter deserving particular mention. That is, the loss I suffered on board l'Alcide of my best and most valuable effects, in consequence of my not being allowed to put them on board l'Entrepreneur, in which I came. I have had the honor, my Lord, to submit the details of my misfortune to you in my letter of the 29th of July last. I am fully persuaded that you will be pleased to procure for me an indemnity proportionate to the value of that loss which has crushed me.

I forgot, my Lord, to bear witness that none of our soldiers has as yet exposed himself to be tried by Court Martial.

I ought to have corrected certain things which slipped into my other despatches, but I was prevented by want of time. I am even obliged to omit much that remains yet to be mentioned.

I am with the most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

DORIEL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 30th October, 1755.

My Lord,

I have the honor to send you hereunto annexed;

1st The return of the officers and soldiers of the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc, who have been killed or wounded in the Baron de Dieskau's campaign at the Lake St. Sacrament Carrying place.

2<sup>d</sup> The return of the number of officers and soldiers in this Colony belonging to the battalions of La Reine, Languedoc, Guyenne and Béarn.

You are aware, my Lord, that ten officers and 155 soldiers belonging to the battalion of La Reine were taken on board the King's ships l'Alcide and le Lys, with a like number of officers and soldiers of the Languedoc battalion, which reduces these two, 330 men.

The battalions at Louisburg appear complete, according to the return sent me of them; that of Artois is 31 officers and 489 soldiers, and that of Burgundy 31 officers and 491 soldiers.

3<sup>d</sup> 4 statements of services which have been sent to me by M. de Rocquemaur, commanding the battalion of La Reine, in order to procure the Cross of St. Louis for Captains d'Hebecourt, d'Hert, Germain and Delmas.

4th Three other statements of services addressed to me by M. Prival, Commandant of the Lauguedoc battalion, to procure the Cross of St. Louis for Captains Chevalier de Marillac, de Basserode, Chevalier Renepont, and a fourth statement of the services of Lieutenant Palfouren, commanding the new company of grenadiers, with a view to procure for him a Captain's commission.

5th Statements of service sent me by M. Hurault de L'hopital, Commandant of the Béarn battalion, to procure Crosses of St. Louis for Captain de Trepezee, and M. de Rosmordue, a seconded Captain.

I could not do otherwise, my Lord, than let the commanders of these three battalions be the judges of the favors they demand for their officers, with whom I am not particularly acquainted. Therefore, I cannot have the honor of mentioning anything to you from myself respecting them. Yet, I must bear the fullest testimony as to the zeal of the commandants, officers and soldiers of those four battalions; they have given me proofs thereof in the different movements I have been obliged to order them to make, to keep the enemy in check.

I must, my Lord, have the honor to represent to you that it is not necessary to have a general officer at the head of these four battalions; they can be disciplined and exercised without that. War in this country is very different from the wars in Europe. We are obliged to act with great circumspection, so as not to leave anything to chance; we have few men, and however small the number we may lose, we feel its effects. However brave the commander of those troops may be, he could not be acquainted with the country; nor, perhaps, be willing to receive the advice subalterns may offer; would rely on himself or on ill enlightened counsels, and would not succeed, though he should sacrifice himself. I found my representations on the result of M. de Dieskau's campaign. Besides, I must not conceal from you, my Lord, that the Canadians and Indians would not march with the same confidence under the orders of a commander of the troops from France that they would under the officers of this Colony. I flatter myself that you will approve my representations, the object of which is the good of the service and of this country.

Captain de St. Vincent, of the Guyenne regiment, has applied to me for permission to go to France next year, in consequence of ill health. I shall conform to the King's order in this regard.

I inform Count d'Argenson of Chevalier de Montreuil's reception into the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, and in consequence of the letter with which he had honored me, address him my certificate thereof. Permit, my Lord, that I inclose here under a flying seal, the letter I have written, and which I request you to have the goodness to have forwarded to him, if you approve of it.

I am, with the most profound respect, My Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 30th of October, 1755.

My Lord,

Though I have been much occupied in making suitable arrangements to oppose the progress of the English, I have, nevertheless, given my attention to everything that regards the Nations of the Upper country. I have seriously examined the reports rendered by the Commandants of the respective posts, and have, moreover, taken every possible information so as not to be ignorant of anything. 'Tis certain, my Lord, that the Upper countries, generally, have been much neglected in every respect; the Indian Nations are mostly at war among themselves. I have even discovered that several of those Nations had received Belts and Messages on the behalf of the English. I have sent suitable orders to each post for the establishment of good order and good police therein. I have provided, also, for everything that could secure us the fidelity of the Nations without occasioning any expense to the King. I have been informed that they were impatiently expecting my arrival. The chiefs of the Outaouas, Wild Rice, Sacs and Foxes have expressed to me the pleasure they felt at seeing me; they have informed me that the most distant Nations would feel equal pleasure to theirs, and wished to take the trouble of going to tell them that they had seen me, in order to convince them that the English boasted prematurely that they would capture me at sea and that I should never reach this Colony. I flatter myself that I shall see, next year, some chiefs from all the Nations, and that I shall succeed in rendering their attachment towards the French inviolable.

I doubt not, my Lord, but you have been informed of the excellence of the Detroit lands. That post is considerable, well peopled, but three times more families than it possesses at present could be easily located there. The misfortune is that we have not enough of people in the Colony. I shall make arrangements to favor the settlement of two Sisters of the Congregation at that post to educate the children without costing the King a penny.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 31st Sber, 1755.

My Lord,

I can, with all safety, have the honor of reporting to you that I have, fortunately, succeeded in arresting the progress of the English in all their projects.

M<sup>r</sup> de Dieskau's campaign, though not as successful as I ought to expect, has, nevertheless, intimidated the English who were advancing, in considerable force, to attack Fort S<sup>t</sup> Frederic, which could not resist them; they would not have experienced any difficulties afterwards in proceeding farther, and it would have required great efforts on our part to stop them.

The English have had, constantly, at Chouaguin, an army of 3000 men under the command of Governor Shirley, well provided with artillery, for the expedition against Niagara and Fort Frontenac, but the camps of observation that I have maintained at each of the forts have kept them in check and obliged them to be on their guard through fear, lest, whilst they would be on their way to attack one of these forts, the Regulars, Canadians and Indians on the other side, would immediately pounce on Chouaguin. I just learn that their army was retiring, and that they were leaving only a strong garrison at that place.

We could not hope for anything more fortunate, my Lord; I have stopped the enemy, who, had it not been for the prudent measures I have adopted, would be at present in the possession of Niagara, and consequently of all our posts in the Upper country.

I am, with most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 31st 8<sup>bre</sup>, 1755.

My Lord,

The attention I have paid to discover the sentiments of the Five Nations has been crowned with all the success I could possibly expect from it.

Deputies from the Five Nations came to La Présentation, but as they dared not appear before me, they empowered some chiefs of that Nation to bring their Message to me, whereby they announce that, with a view to occupy themselves for the future only with good business, they have rejected the hatchet which they had accepted from the English, and that they will remain neutral in our war with the English. I had no doubt of their being spies; I have, nevertheless, answered their Message; I reproached them for their treason and warned them that, should they continue to mix themselves up with the English, I shall abandon them to the vengeance of the Upper Nations and of those domiciliated among us who have taken up the hatchet against them.

M. Joncaire arrived yesterday with a Seneca chief and ten influential Indians belonging to that Nation.

He at once reported to me that the Indians of the Five Nations had, in general, assured him of their neutrality, and that I could reckon, with certainty, on that of the Cayugas, of the Senecas of the River Cascachagon,<sup>1</sup> the Oneidas and Theskaroriens, the news of my arrival having made them really forget their engagements to the English; but as regards the Nontagués, we could not confide in their promises, as they are intimately connected with the English.

The Cayugas had given two Belts to Sieur Joncaire, as well on the part of themselves as on that of the Oneidas and Theskaroriens, to persuade me of the perfect sincerity of their sentiments; and as I had given orders to M. Chabert de Joncaire to leave Niagara on the arrival of his brother, so as to proceed to the Five Nations to prosecute what he had commenced, M. de Joncaire handed over to him those two Belts to enable him to urge the Nontagués to follow the example of the Cayugas, Senecas, Oneidas and Theskarorins, I am fully persuaded that Sieur Chabert will leave nothing undone for the success of his Mission, but I am always in doubt whether he can change the Nontagués.

The Seneca chief and the ten principal Indians, who came down with Sieur de Joncaire, have expressed to me their joy at seeing me again; they have informed me of everything the English had reported respecting my detention in England and that I should never make my appearance in the Colony, adding, that the Englishman was an impostor; and the chief, who was decorated with a medal of the King of England, said to me :

"Father. I am a wretch; I had forgotten you and allowed myself to be seduced by the English; be persuaded that your absence has been the sole occasion of the inconstancy of the Five Nations, and since the Master of Life grants to our prayers a Father whom we cherish, and who restores Grand brûlé, a village which can never be blotted from our memories, I forget that there are any English on the earth, and to give you proof that I despise them and look on them as dogs, see, I tear off the medal of the King of England which hangs from my neck, and trample it under foot. I ask of you no marks of distinction from the great Onontio Goa; I have rendered myself unworthy of them by my misconduct, which I cannot repair save by sacrificing myself as a proof to you of my loyalty."

I answered this speech in suitable terms, and seized the opportunity to complain of the ingratitude and treason of the Five Nations.

I sent back this chief to express my resentment throughout all the villages of the Five Nations, and to warn them that, unless they altered their conduct, my Upper country and domiciliated children will wage a never ending war against them.

I shall send up Sieur de Joncaire on the ice to the Five Nations, not only to maintain them in their neutrality but even to get them to declare against the English, if possible.

Actual circumstances oppose the desire I might feel to punish the Five Nations for their treason.

The English afford me sufficient occupation to drive from my mind every other subject of war.

But should any of the Five Nations be found next spring among the English, I will let loose all our Upper and domiciliated Nations on them; cause their villages to be laid waste and never pardon them. 'Tis to be wished that I may not be driven to this necessity.

I am, with most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Louis XV. to George II.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

The King is able to demonstrate to the whole universe by authentic proofs, that it is not owing to his Majesty that the differences relating to America have not been amicably accommodated.

The King, being most sincerely desirous to maintain the public peace and a good understanding with his Britannic Majesty, carried on the negotiation relative to that subject, with the most unreserved confidence and good faith.

The assurances of the King of Great Britain's disposition to peace, which his Britannic Majesty and his ministers were constantly repeating both by word of mouth and in writing, were so formal and precise, that the King could not, without reproaching himself, entertain the least suspicion of the sincerity of the Court of London's intentions.

It is scarce possible to conceive how these assurances can be reconciled with the orders for hostilities given in November, 1754, to General Braddock, and in April, 1755, to Admiral Boscawen.

The attack and capture in July last, of two of the King's ships in the open sea, and without a declaration of war, was a public insult to his Majesty's flag; and his Majesty would have immediately manifested his just resentment of such an irregular and violent proceeding, if he could have imagined that Admiral Boscawen acted by the order of his Court.

For the same reason the King suspended, at first, his judgment of the piracies that have been committed for several months by the English men of war, on the navigation and commerce of his Majesty's subjects, in contempt of the law of nations, the faith of treaties, the usages established among civilized nations and the regard they reciprocally owe one another.

The sentiments of his Britannic Majesty gave the King room to expect that, at his return to London, he would disavow the conduct of his Admirals and Naval officers, and give his Majesty a satisfaction proportionate to the injury and the damage.

But, seeing that the King of England, instead of punishing the robberies committed by the English navy, on the contrary, encourages them by demanding from his subjects fresh supplies against France, his Majesty would fall far short in what he owes to his own glory, the dignity of his crown and the defence of his people, if he deferred any longer demanding from the King of Great Britain a signal reparation for the outrage done to the French flag and the damage inflicted on the King's subjects.

His Majesty considers it his duty to apply directly to his Britannic Majesty and demand from him immediate and full restitution for the French ships, as well men of war as merchantmen, which, contrary to all law and decorum, have been taken by the English navy; and of all the officers, mariners, guns, stores, merchandise and generally of everything belonging to those vessels.

The King will always prefer to owe to the King of England's equity, rather than to anything else, that satisfaction which he hath a right to demand; and all the Powers will doubtless see in this step which he hath determined to take, a new and striking proof of that invariable love of peace, which directs his counsels and resolutions.

[If his Britannic Majesty order restitution of the vessels in question,<sup>1</sup>] the King will be disposed to enter into a negotiation for that further satisfaction which is legally due to him, and will continue desirous, as he hath always been, to have the discussions relating to America determined by an equitable and solid accommodation.

But if, contrary to all hopes, the King of England shall refuse what the King demands, his Majesty will regard this denial of justice as the most authentic declaration of war, and as a formed design in the Court of London to disturb the peace of Europe.

Abstract of M. de Vaudreuil's Despatches.

The frigate Sirenne, which arrived at Brest on the 10th of this month, set sail from Quebec on the 8th of November, but her day of sailing is not to be reckoned until the 12th, because contrary winds up to that date prevented her making any headway, except such as the tide enabled her to make.

The letters brought by la Sirenne from M. de Vaudreuil, the Governor-General, bear date from the 17th of September to the 2<sup>d</sup> of November, and are all written from Montreal, where that Governor still was. The details they contain of all that occurred up to that time, relate to,

1st The affair of M. de Dieskau. M. de Vaudreuil transmits a detailed account thereof. According to the list annexed, we have had only 95 or 96 men killed and 130 wounded in that affair. And the English have lost in it, by their own acknowledgment, more than 500 men. Our troops retired after the action towards Fort St. Frederic, without having been pursued. And M. de Vaudreuil has had a sort of intrenched camp constructed some leagues in advance of that fort.

The English, on their side, have remained in their posts, but they did not attempt to execute the project of attacking Fort St. Frederic.

2<sup>d</sup> What occurred in the direction of Acadia. Since the capture of Forts Beausejour and Gaspereau, the English, being desirous of forcing the Acadians to take up arms against France, have had recourse to all sorts of violence and cruelty against those people, a large number of whom have retired to various places in the interior of the Continent, whither relief has been sent to them from Canada. Although the Commandant of the River St. John had concluded on burning the fort, in order to prevent its falling into the hands of the English, he, however, maintained his ground on that river, and M. de Vaudreuil has adopted measures to secure its possession.

3<sup>d</sup> What occurred in the direction of the Lakes. In consequence of the troops which M. de Vaudreuil had concentrated at Fort Frontenac with a view to lay siege to Chouaguen, Governor Schirley, who had repaired to the latter post with a considerable body of troops to attack all our forts on the lakes, has not dared to attack any of them. And M. de Vaudreuil was informed that he had returned with his entire army, except the garrison he had left at Chouaguen. But M. de Dieskau's ill success has prevented M. de Vaudreuil attacking the last mentioned post. He proposes to make that attack at the opening of the next spring, unless insurmountable obstacles arise.

4th What occurred in the direction of the Beautiful river. Since General Braddock's defeat, divers parties of Indians have penetrated the English settlements and taken several scalps. But notwithstanding the consternation created by that circumstance throughout the English Colonies, the news M. de Vaudreuil has received from that quarter announce that preparations are making there for a new expedition next year against Fort Duquesne; and he is adopting measures, on his side, to defend that fort. He transmits 3 very authentic copies of General Braddock's papers, amongst which are the King of England's Instructions to that General; a private Instruction which had also been given him by the Duke of Cumberland;<sup>1</sup> several letters written by that General to the English Ministers, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Newcastle, Robinson, Fox and Halifax, and many other documents, proving, very manifestly, the projects of the British Government.

5th The dispositions of the Indians. In general M. de Vaudreuil appears much satisfied with them. He does not despair of even prevailing on the 5 Iroquois Nations to remain neutral.

But despite the little success the English have had this year in the direction of Fort St. Frederic, the lakes and the Beautiful river, he expects new efforts on their part next year, and demands considerable assistance in troops, artillery, arms, ammunition and provisions.

An Account of what has occurred this year in Canada.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

The King's frigate, la Syrenne, which left Quebec on the 8th of November and arrived at Brest on the 10th of December, has brought letters containing the details of what occurred this year in Canada relative to the operations of the English against that Colony.

Independent of the Naval forces which the English have sent at the opening of the spring into the seas of North America to intercept the French ships destined for Canada and Isle Royale, they had collected together in their Colonies divers corps of troops to attack Canada simultaneously by the frontiers of Acadia, Lake Champlain, Lake Ontario, and towards the Beautiful river.

The troops destined to operate against the frontiers towards Acadia and consisting of about eighteen hundred men, repaired, in the beginning of June, with a considerable train of artillery of every description, to the head of the Bay of Fundy, and immediately attacked Fort Beausejour, which, in the course of a few days, was rendered incapable of any defence by the effects of the shot and the shell. The garrison, amounting to only two companies of fifty men each, was obliged to capitulate on condition that it should march out with arms and baggage, and with drums beating; that it should be transported to Louisbourg, and that it should not serve in America for the term of six months. The English immediately summoned the French officer in command at Gaspereau,<sup>1</sup> a post situated a few leagues from Beausejour, in which there was only a detachment of twenty men, who surrendered on the same terms as those contained in the capitulation of Beausejour. The English, after that expedition, marched towards the River Saint John, where there was only a very old fort. The officer in command there, and who had but a few soldiers, concluded on burning it and retiring to some settlers who live in that district, where he maintained his ground; only a few skirmishes have occurred in that quarter, in which the English have always been defeated by the French and Indians, who have joined that officer.

The army which had been raised to operate in the direction of the Beautiful river was composed of some regiments of Regulars sent from England to Virginia, and some regiments of Provincials, raised in that and the adjoining Colonies. It amounted to three thousand men at the time General Braddock assumed its command, to march against Fort Duquesne.

Sieur de Contrecoeur,<sup>1</sup> Captain in the Canadian troops, who was in command of that fort, had been informed that preparations were making in Virginia, but did not expect that he was to be attacked by such a considerable force. Having sent different scouting parties on the route of the English, he learned on the 8th of July that they were only six leagues from the fort, and were advancing in three columns. He immediately formed all he could spare from the fort into a party, to go forward and meet them, which was composed of two hundred and fifty French and of six hundred and fifty Indians. Sieur de Beaujeu, who was in command of it, had with him Captains Dumas and Ligneris, and some subaltern officers. He set out at eight o'clock in the morning, and at half an hour after noon found himself in front of the enemy, about three leagues from the fort. He forthwith attacked them very vigorously. His little troop were somewhat staggered by the first rounds from the enemy's artillery, but on the third, when M. de Beaujeu had the misfortune to be killed, Sieur Dumas, who assumed the command, Sieur de Ligneris and the other officers, followed by the French and Indians, fell so impetuously on the English, as to force them to retire in turn. The latter continued defending themselves sometime longer, showing a very bold front, but at length, after four hours' sharp firing, they broke up, and the route became general. They were pursued for some time, but Sieur Dumas, having learned that General Braddock had left a body of seven hundred men under the command of Colonel Dumar,<sup>2</sup> some leagues in the rear, ordered the pursuit to cease. The English have lost in this affair nearly seventeen hundred men. Almost all their officers have been killed, and General Braddock died of his wounds a few days after. All their equipments, which were very considerable, their provisions, artillery, consisting of eight pieces of cannon, seven mortars and furniture of all sorts, a vast quantity of arms and ammunition, their military chest and generally all their stores, have been captured, together with the Instructions given to General Braddock in England; also, numerous letters written to the Ministers of the King of Great Britain, containing reports of the dispositions he was making for the execution of the plans entrusted to him in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief of all his Britannic Majesty's forces in North America. Sieur de Contrecoeur remained afterwards on the defensive in his fort, after having been assured of the retreat of Colonel Dumar's reserve. But some Indian detachments have made incursions into the frontiers of the English Colonies.

The two other corps of English troops were likewise ordered to march; one, composed of about five thousand men, towards Lake Ontario to attack Fort Niagara and Fort Frontenac; the other, still more considerable, towards Lake Champlain to lay siege to Fort Saint Frederic. Sieur de Vaudreuil, Governor and Lieutenant-General of New France, having learned that General Shirley had already repaired with a portion of the first of those two divisions to Choueguen, an English post established some years ago south of Lake Ontario, determined on dispatching a detachment of Regulars and Canadian Militia, the four battalions of La Reine, Languedoc, Guyenne and Béarn, which the King had this year ordered to Quebec, and a certain number of Indians, to cover Forts Niagara and Frontenac, and gave the command of the whole to Brigadier-General, the Baron de Dieskaw. But learning, a few days after, that Colonel Johnson was in full march at the head of another body of men to attack Fort Saint Frederic, and that he had already established several dépôts on the route, M. de Vaudrenil sent a courier to communicate this intelligence to Baron de Dieskaw, and the resolution which had been adopted to send, without delay, a detachment of Regulars and Militia, with some Indians, to reinforce Fort Saint Frederic. Baron de Dieskaw proceeded thither in person, and was accompanied by the battalions of La Reine and the Languedoc, which consisted of only nine companies each. On arriving at Fort St. Frederic, he thought proper to go and meet the English, and found himself, on the 1st of September, eight leagues from that fort at a place called Carillon;<sup>1</sup> he halted there, and having sent out scouts in different directions learned that the English were busy erecting a fort some leagues off; that a garrison of five hundred men was already in that fort, which was much advanced; that a considerable reinforcement of troops was expected, and that Colonel Johnson was with his main body at the head of Lake St. Sacrament. On this report, and hoping to surprise that fort, Baron de Dieskaw resolved to march without delay at the head of fifteen hundred men, to wit: six hundred Indians under the command of Sieur de Saint Pierre; six hundred Canadians under Sieur de Repentigny, and three hundred Regulars, including the two companies of grenadiers of La Reine and Languedoc battalions, with three pickets of the artillery company belonging to the Colony. He sent the remainder of those two battalions, under the orders of Sieur de Roquemaure, commanding La Reine, to the place called the Two Rocks, in order to fall back on him in case of being forced to retreat, and sent Major de Celoron, commanding the Regulars and Militia of the Colony, with the remainder of his forces towards the falls of Lake Saint Sacrament to prevent the English attempting anything in that direction. In consequence of these arrangements he marched from the 4th to the 7th of September, when he found himself within a league of the English fort. As night was falling he halted and sent forward a scouting party of Indians under the orders of M. de Saint Pierre to reconnoitre the ground. The Indians killed a courier whom Colonel Johnson was sending to notify the Commandant of the fort, of the march of the French. They captured, also, some wagons which were carrying artillery and ammunition thither; but some of the drivers escaped. As there was no longer any doubt of the English fort being alarmed, Baron de Dieskaw gave the Indians the option of either adhering to the plan of proceeding to attack that fort or of marching against the camp of Colonel Johnson, who, according to all accounts, was only five or six leagues off with a force of three thousand men. The Indians all approved of the latter course. Early in the morning of the 8th he marched, in five columns, in the following order: The French troops and gunners in the centre; a column of Canadians and one of Indians on the right, and two other similar columns on the left, and arrived at ten o'clock in the forenoon within one league of the camp. Prisoners taken by the Indians declared that some wagons which the English were sending to their fort, were approaching along the road the army was marching, and that these wagons were escorted by a considerable detachment. Baron de Dieskaw ordered the Canadians and Indians to the left of the road, with instructions to let the English attack, and not to fire on them until the Regulars, who would continue their march on the highway, should have commenced the fight. A few minutes afterwards some musket shots were heard and the fire became animated between the Indians in front and the English. The Canadians immediately ran to their support, and the English fled, who were pursued to within sight of their tents, and that detachment, which consisted of eight or nine hundred men, was almost entirely destroyed. Very few of them returned to the camp, and it was in this fight that Sieur de Saint Pierre was killed. Baron de Dieskaw continued to occupy the road whilst the enemy were beating a retreat. Though the Canadians and Indians were greatly fatigued, he believed that the best plan to induce them to follow him was to hasten his march in order to profit by the confusion which the defeat of that detachment would create among the troops in Colonel Johnson's camp. It was not long before he reached it. Word having been sent him that his right was not supported by any column, a small body of Canadians proceeded in that direction and opened a very sharp fire on the English. But the camp being intrenched with bateaux, wagons and large trees, the French infantry in front were exposed to so hot a fire from the artillery and musketry that they were obliged to fall back behind some trees, where they remained during two hours discharging their pieces with the rest of the troops, which, consisted only of five hundred men in that attack, because a portion merely of the Canadians followed, and the Indians had come to a halt. It was then that Baron Dieskaw was wounded first in the leg, and he shortly afterwards received a ball that went through his right knee and entered the flesh of his left hip, obliging him to suffer himself to be removed some paces off, to sit down. He ordered Chevalier de Montreuil, Major-General; and second in command, to leave him there and to proceed to find out whether there was any chance of getting into the camp. Chevalier de Montreuil perceived the impossibility of effecting that object; the troops were too much fatigued; in too small a number and too much cut up by the fire to which they had been exposed. He concluded on retreating. At first there was some confusion, but the troop repaired in good order to the place where the bateaux had been left. The loss of the English has exceeded seven hundred men in the detachment that has been attacked by the Indians and Canadians, exclusive of the wounded who reached the camp, and the loss they experienced in the intrenchments is not known. That of the French has been only ninety-five men killed, including officers, soldiers, Canadians and Indians, and one hundred and thirty wounded, of all arms. Baron de Dieskaw has been made prisoner and carried to Orange with Sieur Bernier, his Aid de Camp, and two officers of militia, all three wounded like himself.

Nothing has since occurred in that direction. Colonel Johnson's loss, and the presenee of the French troops, who afterwards intrenched themselves in the neighborhood of Fort Saint Frederic, have caused him to abandon the execution of his design against that fort.

The reinforcements which Sieur de Vaudreuil had forwarded to Forts Frontenac and Niagara, have imposed also on Governor Shirley, who retired with his troops, except a strong garrison which he left at Choüeguen, with a considerable train of artillery. General Braddock's defeat and the ill success of Colonel Johnson, must have contributed to induce him to adopt that step, for all the different expeditions had been combined together.

Gentlemen,

No declaration of war has appeared on either side since the departure of the two frigates which I have dispatched to you by the King's order, to give you advice of the state of affairs at the close of the month of July last. Notwithstanding the aggressions committed by the English on the fleet his Majesty had sent to Canada, he has thought proper to order his ships to keep on the defensive. The English, on their side, have been some time without attacking the French vessels they encountered in the European seas. But since the end of the month of August, they have seized on all the merchantmen they met, without distinction of place or of destination. Even recently, they have attacked the King's ship L'Espérance, and you will find hereunto annexed, the detail of that combat.<sup>3</sup> You will learn that they have captured and taken into their ports a great number of ships which were employed in the trade of the islands. They have not, however, been condemned; indeed, it is not very clear on what ground they could be, since these prizes have been taken, contrary to all law. We are informed that they talk only of selling the cargoes and placing the proceeds on deposit; but the crews remain in prison, and we know not what course the English will adopt, both in their regard and in respect to the ships and proceeds.

Such is still the situation of affairs in Europe with that Nation. We are not informed that her ships have made any prizes on the West India Coasts, but it can hardly be doubted. The piracies she perpetrates in the European seas—those she has committed in the seas of North America, and the open war she wages in Canada, prove but too strongly that the most extreme violences on her part are to be expected. And, as the Island of St. Domingo is one of the <sup>1</sup> LOUIS PHILIPPE RIOAUD, Marquis de Vaudreuil, son of Philip R. de V., Governor of Canada, and Louise Elizabeth de Joybert de Soulanges, was born in Canada, and entered the Royal Navy of France in the eighteenth year of his age. In 1744, he commanded L'Aiglon, 48, in the combined Spanish and French fleet, which engaged the British fleet off Toulon; and L'Intrepide in the engagement with Admiral Hawke, off Cape Finisterre, 14th August, 1747, on which occasion he behaved, says Beaton, with great spirit and conduct in the heat of the battle, and rescued his Admiral from destruction. He was Governor of St. Domingo in 1755, when the above despatch was sent to him; it seems he remained there two years; in 1759 he commanded the frigate L'Aretuse, 32, which was captured on the 18th of May of that year, by three British men-of-war, off the Coast of Brittany, after a gallant fight, in which M. de Vaudreuil was wounded and taken prisoner. Out of respect for his bravery on this occasion, he was allowed to retain his sword, and was soon after sent to France without exchange. On the breaking out of the war between France and England, in 1778, he commanded Le Fendant, 74, in Count D'Orvilliers' fleet, which engaged that of the British under Keppel, in the battle of Quessant, 27th July, of that year. In January, 1779, he commanded a French squadron, which recaptured Senegal, and then joined the fleet under M. d'Estaing at Martinico, and in July following, did good service in the attack on the Island of Grenada, which was reduced. On his return to France, he was offered, but declined, the government of St. Domingo, and in 1780, returned to the West Indies with Le Fendant, where he joined the fleet under the command of Count Guichen, and took his share in the battle with Admiral Rodney, 17th April, of that year, off Martinico. In the unfortunate engagement off Cape François, 12th April, 1782, M. de Vaudreuil led the van in Le Triomphant, 80, after which he retreated to St. Domingo. He returned to France after the peace, and was created Lieutenant-General; in 1789, elected Deputy by the Nobles to the States General, but in 1791, retired to England; returned to France in 1800, and spent the remainder of his life in the most profound seclusion in Paris, where he died, 14th December, 1802. Ferland's Notes sur les Registres de Quebec, 42; Almanach Américain, 1783, p. 41; Beaton's Naval and Military Memoirs, I, 367, 369; II, 349; III, 52; IV, 451, 455, 462; VI, 231; Garneau's Histoire du Canada, II, 181, 182; Biographie Universelle. objects which, since some time, inflames her jealousy and cupidity, the King has deemed it proper to adopt measures for the dispatch of reinforcements to that Colony.

It is in that view that his Majesty has ordered thither a fleet composed of ships and frigates whereof I annex hereunto a list; and has given instructions, copy of which is here adjoined, to M. Périer, who commands that fleet.

They have a twofold object: the protection of the trade on the coasts of St. Domingo and the defence of the Colony itself.

As regards the first object, it will be necessary for M. Périer to direct the movements of the fleet in the most convenient manner to secure, as much as possible, the entrance and departure of the ships which will carry on the trade; and, touching the second, he is ordered so to conduct himself according to circumstances, as to support the posts that will happen to be either attacked or threatened.

There is a third object, which is that of his private Instruction, and regards the English men of war and merchantmen. You will see thereby that he has orders to attack the former, should he find any opportunity of so doing with advantage, and to seize on the others without distinction.

Should he capture any ships of war and they cannot be conveniently manned so as to strengthen his fleet, measures must be always taken to preserve them, and such other practical steps adopted as will enable him to bring them safely with him whenever he will return to France.

In regard to the English merchantmen which he will carry into the ports of St. Domingo, you will likewise see by his private Instruction that his Majesty does not mean that they should be confiscated without his further orders; that proceedings must be confined to the sale of the cargoes and to depositing the proceeds of such sales in the Treasurer's chest, which is to be done agreeably to the ordinances you will issue to that effect, and with all the formalities that time, place and circumstances will permit.

You will find hereunto annexed the draft of the ordinances you are to issue for these sales. You may commission the officers of the Admiralty to proceed therewith. You will observe, each in your department, that the inventories which are to precede the sales be made out with the greatest exactness; that no errors be committed either in regard to the sales or the costs they will occasion, and which M. de la Laune must, himself, regulate by private assessments and on the most moderate scale possible. You will take care to pay the proceeds immediately into the Treasurer's chest; you will observe, particularly, to state, in the procès-verbaux to be drawn up, the formalities which will have been observed; the object of each sale and the deposit which will have been made on account thereof, and independent of the transcript of each of the procès-verbaux which you will cause to be transmitted to M. Périer, you will, also, send me a duplicate thereof.

You will, possibly, receive, before M. Périer's return, orders as to what will have to be done with those funds thus in deposit. But should you not receive any, you will put those funds on board the ships of the fleet with the precaution of having a procès-verbal drawn up of their embarkation, copies whereof you will also send me.

As regards the officers and crews of the ships of war and merchantmen, you will also see by M. Périer's private Instruction, that the one and the other are to be delivered up to you to be detained in prison. You will, however, be careful to observe towards the officers all the courtesies and forbearance compatible with the necessity that exists of not allowing them an opportunity to acquire any information which they may afterwards abuse. And should the English furnish an opportunity, before M. Périer's return, for an exchange of the one and the other for French officers and Ensigns, you will be at liberty to coöperate therein, observing, in all the copies you will make, to explain yourself in such a manner as to let it be understood, but without affectation, that you do not regard those crews as prisoners of war.

In other respects you will pay attention to arrange all the matters in company with M<sup>r</sup> Périer.<sup>1</sup> [December,] 1755.

Baron de Dieskau to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

New-York, 12th January, 1756.

My Lord,

I had the honor on the 15th ult<sup>o</sup> to report to you my condition, and the means to which I was obliged to have recourse to procure some money.

Finding myself, since that time, entirely out of danger, and my wounds improving daily, I have requested Sir Charles Hardy,<sup>2</sup> Governor-General of New-York, to allow Sieur Bernier, my Aide-de-Camp, to proceed to England in a man of war, in the hope that he will be able to pass over without delay to France, to render you a more particular account of what concerns me.

I beg of you, my Lord, to extend your protection to him, and to be pleased to permit me to refer to the details which he will have it in his power to communicate, in consequence of the confidence I repose in him.

I have the honor to be with respect,

My Lord, ~

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

The Baron DE DIESKAW.

Remarks of the British Ministry on the Letter of the King of France.

Whatever may have been or are now the sentiments of the most Christian King, with regard to the differences concerning North America, it is unfortunate that the conduct of the Court of

Versailles towards Great Britain should so ill correspond to the dispositions which M. Rouillé's Memoir ascribes to his Majesty, and to the professions of good faith and unreserved confidence with which, it was pretended, the negotiation on the affairs of America was, on his part, carried on.

If it be from the course of this negotiation that the authentic proofs are to be drawn by which the most Christian King is able to demonstrate to the whole world that it is not owing to him that the differences in question have not been amicably arranged, it will not be improper to touch briefly upon some parts thereof. All the facts will bear witness in favor of his Britannic Majesty's moderation.

In the month of January, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, the French Ambassador<sup>1</sup> returned to London and made great protestations of the sincere desire felt by his Court to adjust all disputes between the two Crowns, concerning America, in a final and prompt manner, and, notwithstanding the extraordinary preparations which were at that time and are at present making in the ports of France, her Ambassador proposed :

"That before the ground and circumstances of the quarrel be inquired into, positive orders should be immediately sent to our respective governments, forbidding them thereafter to undertake any new enterprise or to proceed to any act of hostility; enjoining them, on the contrary, to put things without delay, with regard the lands on the Ohio, on the same footing that they were, or ought to have been, before the last war; and that the respective claims be amicably referred to the Commission established at Paris, so that the two Courts might terminate the difference by a speedy accommodation."

England at once declared its readiness to the proposed cessation of hostilities, and that all the points in dispute might be discussed and terminated by the Ministers of the two Crowns, but on condition that all the possessions in America shall previously be put on the footing of the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. Wherefore his Majesty proposed :

"That the possession of the lands on the Ohio, or Beautiful river, should be restored to the footing it was on at the conclusion of the Treaty of Utrecht, and agreeably to the stipulations of the said treaty, which was renewed by that of Aix-la-Chapelle; and, moreover, that the other possessions in North America should be restored to the same condition in which they actually were, at the signing of the said Treaty of Utrecht, and agreeably to the cessions and stipulations therein expressed; and then the method of instructing the respective Governors and forbidding them to undertake thenceforth any new enterprises and acts of hostility might be treated of, and the claims of both parties reserved to be speedily and finally discussed and adjusted in an amicable manner between the two Courts, that is to say, France should repair the injury done by open force before the parties should enter into treaty, even about that right, after which the possessions of both parties might be settled on the footing of a definitive treaty."

The French Ambassador thereupon drew up a kind of reply which at bottom was only a repetition of his first proposal. But to soften the matter, he produced, at the same time, full powers from his Court, couched in very specious and polite terms.

The effect was, however, as little correspondent thereto as before, and France soon after delivered a draft of a preliminary convention, which was nothing more than the first proposal somewhat enlarged. This, added to what was doing in the ports of France, was too plain to deceive, and England took care not to lend herself to a convention that would leave to France the fruits of her violences and usurpations, which constituted precisely the grievances England was complaining of; for after its expiration all would have to be begun over again.

A draft of a counter convention was afterwards delivered to the Ambassador, containing an offer of the most moderate terms, confined simply to those points which were an indispensable right, and essential to the security of the King's Colonies.

To this France did not vouchsafe any answer, and her Ambassador was authorized thereupon only to hear, but not to make any propositions.

In fine, after a long series of singular evasions, in which the cessation of hostilities continually recurred, the Ambassador, instead of receiving instructions to enter into negotiations upon the counter convention above mentioned, was ordered to demand, as a previous condition, that England should desist from three points which formed a large portion of the matter in dispute.

I. The south part of the River St' Lawrence and the lakes whose waters flow into that river.

II. The twenty leagues of country demanded along the Bay of Fundy.

III. The territory between the Ohio and the Ouabache.

The discussions by which this extraordinary piece was followed, and during which France tergiversated at every step, concluded with a Memoir presented by the Ambassador wherein were treated the affairs of the Islands as well as those of North America. This also was answered by a very ample piece which refuted the Ambassador's Memoir article by article, and fully justified the terms of the English counter convention. In consequence of the Ambassador's unexpected retreat, this piece has remained without any reply.

The assurances France received of his Majesty's pacific disposition were as honest and sincere as they were formal and precise; but he should have reproached himself had he carried them so far as to endanger the possessions of his Crown and the safety of his people.

It is to no purpose that France applies the epithet of hostile to the orders given to General Braddock and Admiral Boscawen. She would be very glad to draw a veil over all the hostilities committed on her part in America since the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle to the date of those orders. From the very instant, as it were, of the signing that treaty, and even at the opening of the commission which, in consequence of it, was established at Paris for the affairs of America, France, distrusting beforehand her right, and setting herself up as judge and party in her own case, caused the Province of Nova Scotia to be invaded, and after a series of open hostilities against the inhabitants, the King's subjects, had erected three forts in the heart of that Province, and had she not been prevented, was on her way to destroy the new settlement of Halifax. Like hostilities were committed, at the same time, against his Majesty's territories and subjects on the Ohio and the Indian lakes, where France, without any shadow of right, forbid the English to trade, seized them by force and sent them prisoners to France, invaded the territories of Virginia, attacked a fort which covered its frontier, and to secure these usurpations, erected, with an armed force, a chain of forts on the lands she had invaded. If his Majesty could have supposed that the Governors of Canada had so acted by orders from their Court, he would have been justified to repel these hostilities at once with the vigor which the case deserved.

He confined himself to complaining thereof to the Court of France, but with so little effect that that Court, not content with not vouchsafing any answer, gave, on this occasion, a very singular instance of its honesty; for, in despite of these complaints made by the late Earl of Albemarle, in consequence of an order from the King, particularly by a Memoir delivered in the month of February, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-two, on those usurpations in America, France had, afterwards, the modesty to allege, that England had never complained of those proceedings, and consequently had nothing to find fault with.

At last, the King's patience being worn out by the continuance of these violences, he found himself obliged to provide for the security and defence of his subjects. Yet, notwithstanding the just reasons he had for proceeding to extremities, he added to his many years' forbearance a signal proof of his moderation in the very smallness of the succors he sent to America, which consisted only of two battalions of 500 men each, escorted by two frigates, and in the orders given to the commanding officer, which were to dislodge the invaders of the King's territories. In these facts there is nothing irreconcilable with the assurances given of his Majesty's pacific dispositions. It is the invasion on the part of France and all the violences which have attended it, that are hostile, and it can never be unlawful to repel an aggressor.

In order to make out the pretended insult to the flag of the most Christian King, France is obliged to invert the order of things. She affects to take the consequence and effect for the cause, and, pretexting the small succors General Braddock carried to America, alleges, as the principal affair, what are only its result and accessory, as if the sending of that succor had given rise to the troubles. France equips a fleet of a very alarming force, and the King is, in consequence, obliged to make proportionable armaments. France dispatches that fleet to America with three times the number of troops carried to the same continent by General Braddock, intending, thereby, to support her previous acts of violence and to superadd new ones.

Now, the same law, the same principle of defence which authorizes the resistance of an invader, authorizes equally the preventing him overwhelming the party attacked by so formidable a reinforcement. It was, therefore, very natural to expect that the King would provide eventually for the protection of his subjects, by preventing the landing of so powerful an armament in America, and by endeavoring to preserve his American Provinces from total ruin.

For the rest, it is hard to imagine why an English fort and English Provinces in America should be less entitled to respect by an aggressor, than a ship of war on the Banks of Newfoundland, by an officer acting under the authority of a Prince, who defends himself and protects his subjects.

The same motive of defence hath forced the King to seize the ships and sailors belonging to the French Nation, in order to deprive the Court of France of the means of making a descent, with which her Ministers in all the Courts of Europe have incessantly threatened England. Menaces, the more significative to England, inasmuch as they have been preceded or accompanied by the precipitate recal of the Ministers of France from London and Hanover; by the march and cantonnement of large bodies of troops on the coasts of Flanders and of the Channel, and by the publicly avowed reëstablishment of the port of Dunkirk.

For the rest, it cannot be conceived why the French should imagine that the King ought to disavow the conduct of his officers, who have acted by his orders, or why they should wonder at his Majesty's demanding of his subjects the supplies necessary to enable him to frustrate the views equally ambitious and violent of France.

How can that Court pretend to be surprised at the acts of violence it complains of, after the Court of Great Britain had, during the whole course of the negotiation, constantly rejected the proposal made by France for a suspension of hostilities, unless it were preceded by the restitution of the possessions taken by open force from England; a condition to which the Court of Versailles would never agree. This was a broad hint to that Court, of the course the King proposed to follow in the prosecution of his just rights.

It was for such just and valid reasons that the King has rejected the peremptory demand contained in the Memoir signed by M. Rouillé. To avoid all occasion of taking notice of the terms made use of in that paper, which shock common decency, his Majesty caused M<sup>r</sup> Fox, his Secretary of State, to write a brief and negative answer to it, in the form of a letter. And he is the more determined not to admit what France demands, as a preliminary condition, prior to any negotiation, as it appears from that very Memoir that, after granting it, the King would be as far as ever from obtaining an equitable and solid accommodation with respect to the injuries he has to complain of for several years. And it does not appear how his Majesty's resolution to defend his American dominions and hinder France from insulting his Kingdoms, can be construed into a denial of justice, and a design formed by the King to disturb the repose of Europe.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 2 February, 1756.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to report to you in my letter of the 25th of 7<sup>ber</sup>, what precautions I had taken for the safety of Niagara, after the unfortunate result of Baron de Dieskau's campaign.

To accelerate the works which M. Pouchaut has deemed necessary, in order to put that place in a state of defence, I made the battalion of Guyenne sojourn there as long as the season admitted. I ordered four platoons of that battalion to winter there. These added to the Colonial troops and the Canadians, compose a force of about 300 men, who are continually at work. I cannot but express my praise of M. Pouchaut's zeal and activity. I have reason to hope that he will carry out his work to perfection; Niagara will then be in a condition to resist the enemy. Its position is, besides, very advantageous. But I shall be obliged to send considerable forces and provisions thither, at the opening of the navigation, for I may be well persuaded that the enemy will undertake its siege very early, as he is making preparations for it a long time, and his army may have arrived at Chouaguen, when I shall dispatch the one I intend to oppose to it, inasmuch as the River of Orange is navigable a month earlier than ours.

I shall be obliged to provide, at the same time, for the security of Fort Frontenac. The second armed sloop I ordered to be built, is considerably advanced. Our two sloops will be provided with cannon and will cruise on Lake Ontario. The enemy is busy building another.

Chouaguen is actually in a defensive condition. Its siege could not possibly be undertaken unless by a very large army and a good deal of artillery. The English have three forts there, each of which is furnished with cannon and mortars. The garrison is composed of 600 men who are continually on the alert. My knowledge of the situation of Chouaguen is derived less from the reports of prisoners and deserters than from actual reconnoissance, this winter, by two small parties which I sent thither.

The first of these parties has brought me two prisoners; the second, under the command of Ensign Mo<sup>r</sup> de Louvigny, has perfectly fulfilled its mission. This officer tarried several days in the neighborhood of Chouaguen and examined everything himself. He was unable to burn the sloops because they are all under the guns of the fort and well watched. He took two prisoners, and on his return rendered from 60 to 80 bateaux unserviceable.

In regard to the Five Nations, M. Joncaire Chabert, whom I sent to them on the return of his brother, made a long sojourn there and has been continually in council with the Senecas and the Cayugas, who, in the name of the Five Nations, have assured him that they were about preparing to come to see me early in the spring. They have disavowed those of their people who were found among the English in the affair of Lake St. Sacrament, and say, as is their custom, that it was only some hot headed fellows who had lost all sense. They have also said that they wished to remain neuter. I have so little confidence in this that I signified to them that if any one of their Nations was found among the English I should treat them as enemies, and let loose all the Upper Nations on them. I wish I may not be under that necessity.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Count d'Argenson to M. de Vaudreuil.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Sir,

I received, at one time, two letters you have done me the honor to write me from Montreal; one of the 30th of October last; the other without date.

We had already been informed, by the news from England, of the unfortunate fate of M. Dieskaw, who is, at present, in New-York. I hope you will have reason to be satisfied with the prudence of the gentleman whom the King has named as his successor, and that you will find in him all desirable dispositions to concur with you for the good of the King's service and the successful achievement of the operations which you will judge proper to intrust to him. I say nothing further on this subject, as I have no cipher with you, and am aware that M. de Machault has advised you of his Majesty's dispositions.

I submitted to him your proposal to employ Sieur de l'Isle as Commissary of War in the place of M. Crance, who has been taken on board l'Alcide, but his Majesty has not deemed it necessary to have a second Commissary in Canada, and had already chosen the one he intended to send to Louisburg, M. Prevost having stated that he was too much occupied with the details of the Marine to be able to attend, at the same time, to those of the land forces.

I request you, Sir, to be fully persuaded of the perfect attachment with which I have the honor to be, &c.

29 February, 1756. Approved.

Count d'Argenson to M. Malatie.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

You did me the pleasure, Sir, to send me a narrative annexed to your letter of the 6th of October last, of the movements of the battalion of Béarn, in which you were serving, since its landing at Quebec. I request you to continue to inform me, in like detail, of all the operations in which that battalion will be employed, and whereof you will have a personal knowledge, and to be persuaded that I shall be always pleased to make such use of it as may be profitable to you.

I am, Sir, your most humble and affectionate servant.

29 February, 1756. Good.

Count d'Argenson to M. Doreil.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Sir,

I annex hereunto the note of the letters I have received from you since your embarkation. You know that the answers from France cannot reach you except in spring. This will be dispatched by the first vessels leaving our ports.

I commence by assuring you of the satisfaction entertained by the King of your services, and as a token thereof, I announce to you that his Majesty has appointed you Ordonnateur, and has allowed you a gratuity of twelve thousand livres as an indemnity for the losses you have sustained on board l'Alcide. My nephew sends you the King's commission as Ordonnateur, and you will receive by M. de Machault the order for the gratuity.

The King has nominated M. de Montcalm to replace M. de Dieskau in the command of the troops in Canada, as Major-General (Marechal de Camp). He will be accompanied by Chevalier de Lévy, Brigadier; M. de Bourlamarque, Colonel of Engineers, and some officers of artillery; they will all embark immediately with two battalions and a considerable number of recruits.

No new Commissaries will be sent you as you expect alone to be sufficient for everything that is to be done in Canada, but one will be dispatched to Isle Royale whom I shall recommend to correspond with you particularly in whatever will regard the troops belonging to the garrison of Louisbourg.

I have been informed by M. de St. Jullien of the difficulties he has experienced from Sieur Prévost, and I have put an end to them by decisions which will be communicated to you by Sieur Portalis, whose presence will supersede the order authorizing Sieur Prévost to commission a deputy to pay the land forces; it will annul also that which empowered himself personally to do it.

I have commanded the Postmasters in the maritime ports, as you requested, to make packages to your address of all the letters which will be deposited with them for the officers of the troops in Canada, and to hand them to the Captains of the first vessels up for that country.

You have anticipated M. de Dieskaw's desire in preventing the sale of his property. He has written to me from New-York, requesting that it be preserved, as he proposes to sell it if he do not recover from his wounds.

I leave to M. de Machault to inform you of the King's intentions respecting the representations you have made concerning the exemption from duty of the effects the officers of the land forces have ordered to be sent to Canada for their own use, and the furniture indispensable for the officer and soldier; breeches, hats, snuff and medicine, in regard to all which he is invested with power.

I have noticed with pleasure what you have communicated to me in all your letters respecting the confidence reposed in you by M. de Vaudreuil and M. Bigot. I hope that such good understanding will go on always increasing, and I doubt not but you will do all that lies in your power to foster it. I am, &c.

29th February, 1756. Approved.

Count d'Argenson to M. de Montreuil.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Sir,

I annex hereunto a note of the letters I have received from you since you embarked, so that you may see if all you have written have reached me. The other private letters you have written have been also communicated to me, and I thank you for your attention in informing me of all the occurrences in the country in which you are stationed. It is unfortunate that we have lost, by over confidence, the superiority we had gained over the English by the defeat of General Braddock, and that M. de Dieskaw's detention has enabled them to turn to advantage an event which has cost them more than it did us. The King is fully convinced that no blame is to be attached to you, personally, in that regard, and that you have done, on that occasion, all that circumstances permitted you. I shall recommend you to the new Commander whom the King has designed for you, and I doubt not but by the application and willingness which I know you possess, that you will be a favorite with him.

For the rest, I beg you to continue to let me hear from you as often as you can.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

Commission for the Marquis de Montcalm.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

LOUIS, &c. Having resolved to send additional troops to Canada, and wishing to provide for the command both of the said reinforcements and of the troops we ordered thither last year, which command is vacant by the detention of Baron de Dieskaw, on whom We had conferred it, We have concluded that a better choice could not be made than of our dear and well beloved, the Marquis de Montcalm, Major-General in our armies, considering the proofs he has given us of his valor, experience, capacity, fidelity and affection to our service in the different engagements and other commissions entrusted to his care. These and other considerations Us moving, We have made, constituted, ordained and established, and by these presents, signed by Our hand, do make, constitute, ordain and establish, the said Marquis de Montcalm Commander, under the authority of our Governor-General of said country, of the troops that are to proceed to Canada, and of those at present there, and have given and do give him power to employ them wheresoever need shall be for effecting our intentions; to make them live in good order, police and discipline, according to Our military rules and ordinances; to cause the same to be kept, maintained and observed inviolable in all places where said troops shall be employed; to authorize the punishment and chastisement of those who shall dare to contravene them; to see that all the accoutrements which shall have been ordered, be made exactly by those commissioned to that effect, and generally to do and order, as regards said troops, all that he shall judge necessary; all, as already stated, under the authority of our Governor-General in Canada.

And We command Chevalier de Levy, Brigadier in our Infantry, and Sieur Bourlamaque, Colonel of Infantry, employed with the said troops, the Lieutenant-Colonels, Colonels, Captains, Lieutenants and Ensigns, the Commissaries of War, Engineers and all other officers who will accompany them, to acknowledge the said Marquis de Montcalm, in said quality of Commandant, and him to obey and hear in all matters to the said commission appertaining. For such is Our pleasure. In testimony whereof, We have caused Our seal to be affixed to these presents.

Given at Versailles, the first day of the month of March, in the year of Grace, 1756, and of our reign, the XLI<sup>a</sup>.

Count d'Argenson to M. de Montcalm.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Versailles, 13th of March, 1756.

Sir,

I have the honor to send you the commission of Major-General (Marechal de Camp), which the King has ordered me to transmit to you, with power to command his troops in Canada; a return of those which his Majesty sends thither with you, and the letters of service of Chevalier de Levy, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Bourlamaque and de Montreuil, who will be employed under your orders, the first as Brigadier of Infantry, the second as Colonel and the third, who is on the spot, as Adjutant-General. I annex hereunto a copy of the instructions I had furnished the Baron de Dieskau, by his Majesty's orders, to which he desires you to conform yourself in every particular, and a cipher which you can use when you will have anything secret to communicate to me. I request you to lose no opportunity of transmitting me news of yourself, and to be always persuaded of the perfect attachment with which I am, Sir, your most humble and most obedient servant.

Instructions to Ensign Douville.

[ Pennsylvania Archives, II, 600. ]

DUMAS, Captain of Infantry, Commandant of the Beautiful river and its dependencies.

Sieur Douville, Ensign en second, is ordered to march at the head of a detachment of fifty Indians to observe the enemy's movements back of Fort Cumberland.

He shall make it his business to harass their convoys and endeavor to burn their magazines at Canagiechuie, if possible.

He shall spare no pains to make prisoners who may be able to confirm to us what we already know of the enemy's designs.

Sieur Douville will employ all his talents and influence to prevent the Indians exercising any cruelty on those who will fall into their hands. Honor and humanity ought to be our guides in that regard.

Fort Duquesne, 23<sup>d</sup> March, 1756.

Extract of a Letter dated Quebec, 5th April, 1756.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris. ]

Since the battle of Lake St. Sacrament nothing of moment has occurred in this country. Our Indians only have laid waste the rural districts of Virginia in the course of the winter, which scatters despair throughout that quarter. We have taken some prisoners recently, who inform us that extensive preparations are making throughout New England to attack us next month on all sides. We are busy, on our side, in opposing their enterprises.

The authorities have received, within eight days, letters from Baron de Dieskaw, who is at New-York. He had received four wounds; one, a severe one which pierced his bladder, does not heal.

Expedition against Fort Bull, Oneida county, New-York.

[ Département de la Guerre, Paris. ]

Extract of a letter dated Quebec, 14th April, 1756.

Since my last we have received news of a detachment of about 400 men who left last March under the command of M. de Léry. On the 26th they reached the vicinity of a dépôt situated between Choaguin and Corlaer, which was full of provisions, merchandises and ammunition, and guarded by 80 men. M. de Léry's detachment, having run short of provisions, and the major part having eaten nothing since the previous evening, he could not determine on an attack that day. Fortunately, he had only halted, when 10 wagons made their appearance. An attack followed; the drivers were seized, and the wagons found loaded with provisions, which helped to recruit our people. M. de Léry having determined to attack on the morrow, the men rested the remainder of the day. Next day, the 27th, M. de Léry having divided his little army into two parties, half of whom was occupied in watching the loop-holes, whilst the remainder was cutting the stockades which surrounded the dépôt. On the breach being sufficiently large to admit a line of eight men, he ordered to charge bayonets and to summon the Commander to surrender. On his refusal the doors of the storehouse were burst open and the entire garrison, except about three, killed. The men next set about throwing into an adjoining creek whatever was in this store, where, 'tis stated, there were, among other things, thirty thousand weight of powder, considerable grenadoes, balls, and other stores destined to be forwarded, on the opening of the navigation, to Chouguin for the supply of that fort and the attack of some of ours. This advantage is the more important as it has cost only three men killed, to wit, one soldier, one Indian and a militiaman. Besides, it will retard, at least, the execution of our enemy's projects.

Abstract of Occurrences in Canada; 1755, 1756.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Detail of Occurrences in Canada, from the debarkation of the Regular troops in the month of June, 1755, to the 1st of May, 1756.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil learns, a few days after his arrival at Quebec, that the English have taken Forts Beausejour and St. John, in Acadia.

Orders all the preparations to be made for the siege of Chouaguen.

Learns that the enemy are advancing towards Fort St. Frederic.

Sends thither Baron de Dieskaw, at the head of 3000 men, with orders to attack them, and postpones the attack on Chouaguen until his return.

M. de Dieskaw learns, at Fort St. Frederic, that the enemy, numbering 4000 men, are constructing a fort at the Lidius house, on the River of Orange, six leagues from Lake St. Sacrament.

September 2<sup>d</sup>. He marches with his army to attack them.

Learns, on the way, from a prisoner, that the enemy have retreated towards Orange, and that five hundred men are encamped under the fort.

He alters all his arrangements; leaves half his army at the falls of Lake St. Sacrament and at the entrance of the Twelve mile marsh (Grand Marais), to secure his return.

4th Proceeds at the head of 600 Indians, 650 Canadians and 220 Regulars, to destroy that fort.

7th Arrives there in the evening; our Indians, at the moment he was making his arrangements to attack, bring him in two prisoners, who inform him that 4000 men are encamped six leagues in his rear, near Lake St. Sacrament.

8th In the morning determines to march against them in preference to the fort, calculating that they were not so numerous as was reported.

Falls in, at half-past eleven o'clock, with 1000 men who were coming to meet him.

Drives these back with success to their camp, which he attacks right and left, without losing any time, in order not to afford the enemy an opportunity of reconnoitring.

The firing continued an hour; half the detachment, abandoned by the remainder, was obliged to fall back; a general and precipitate retreat ensued without orders from any person.

M. de Dieskaw and Chevalier de Montreuil were left by themselves during the affair near the camp, between the two fires.

When the former received four gunshot wounds and was made prisoner of war.

Chevalier de Montreuil was wounded in the arm and received a contusion in the side.

The detachment was a day and a half in returning to its camp, across the woods, without provisions, and carrying one hundred wounded.

The French have lost in that affair 200 men killed, wounded and missing, and the English 400, many of whom are officers of distinction.

The remainder of the season passed on both sides in constructing a fort near Lake St. Sacrament.

Eight hundred Indians and 200 Canadians have killed, in the month of July, 1200 Englishmen and General Bradoc, near Fort Duquesne, on the River Ohio.

During the winter the Indians have burned several English settlements, made a number of prisoners and taken a great many scalps in every direction.

Four hundred Frenchmen or Indians have burnt, on the 25th of March, twenty-five leagues from Chouaguen, a small English fort filled with provisions and munitions of war, guarded by 40 men, whom they put to the sword. The English are collecting 6000 men at Lake St. Sacrament, and 4000 at Chouaguen.

Prisoners assert that their design is to attack Forts Niagara and Cataracoui, on Lake Ontario, and St. Frederic, on Lake Champlain.

M. de Vaudreuil expects to put seven thousand men on foot; the English, 'tis believed, will not make any attempt in the direction of the Beautiful river.

If the Five Nations remain neuter, as is hoped, the French will have on their side about 1200 Indians, and the English 400.

The fate of the operations of this campaign will be decided, according to all appearances, towards the end of July; everything appears to assume a favorable turn for Canada.

I augur that the enemy will keep on the defensive, having heard of the reinforcement which arrived from France in the course of May.

The battalions of La Reine and Languedoc are encamped under Fort Carillon, situate on Lake Champlain, five leagues beyond Fort St. Frederic.

The Guienne battalion is on the way to Fort Cataracoui, and that of Béarn to Niagara.

Eight hundred Canadians or Indians are encamped near Niaouré Bay, to harass the enemy, who are about to rendezvous immediately before Chouaguen.

Divers considerable parties of Canadians and Indians are out in the direction of Fort Lydius, on the River of Orange, to watch the movements of the enemy, who, 'tis reported, are preparing to come and attack Fort Carillon.

The battalion of La Sarre is to proceed immediately to Cataracoui or Niagara.

That of Royal Rousillon is destined for Carillon.

The nine companies of the battalion of La Reine number 327 men.

The battalion of La Sarre, 515.

That of Royal Roussillon, 519.

The nine companies of the battalion of Languedoc, 326.

The battalion of Guienne, 492.

That of Béarn, 498.

M. de Nau, first factionnary<sup>1</sup> of Guienne, died in the month of February.

Sieur de la Furjonniere, Lieutenant in the Regiment of Languedoc, was killed in the affair of Lake St. Sacrament.

M. de Sudria, Lieutenant in the Guienne, returns to France on account of sickness.

Four officers and two soldiers have married.

The Artois battalion, which is at Louisburg, amounts to 547 men, including the recruits arrived from France, who are attached to it whilst waiting for instructions from Court on this subject.

That of Burgundy numbers 543, including the recruits.

M. Delpriel, Sub-Lieutenant of Grenadiers in the Burgundy regiment, died at Louisburg on the 9th of April, 1755.

Total of vacancies by death, three.

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 21 May, 1756.

My Lord,

Although I have reason to believe that this letter, which I am dispatching by way of Louisburg, will not reach you before the one I shall have the honor to write you from this place, at all events, I have the pleasure of informing you of my arrival on the 13th. Le Héros is here since the 12th, and of the nine companies of the Regiment of Lasarre on board that vessel, only one man died on the passage; twenty-three were sick; of these, only one dangerously. I flatter myself that it will be the same on board the two other ships and the other two frigates which we may consider arrived, as le Leopard and la Sirenne are at anchor nine leagues below, and the remainder were at Bic island on the fifteenth. The first wind from the northeast will bring them all up. Our Staff, Engineers and troops are therefore all arrived. We have also four other ships in port, with stores and recruits on board, and a fifth is at anchor with our men of war. M. de Bourlamaque and M. Desandrouïns, Engineer, are already here, having come up by land from Cape Tormont, as I likewise did. I heard from Chevalier de Levis the 15th. He was at Bic island in very good health, awaiting a favorable wind.

The day following my arrival, I sent a courier to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and to-morrow I proceed to join him. Everything is in movement for the opening of the campaign. The winter has been less severe than usual. I found it impossible to repair sooner to Montreal, as the rain had rendered the roads impassable, and the winds were contrary. The same reasons have retarded M. Doriel's arrival, who is coming to receive the troops, and with whom I expect to confer on the way. During my eight days' sojourn, I have taken information respecting a country and a war, in which everything is different to what obtains in Europe, and acquired a knowledge of Quebec and its environs. I shall be in Montreal on Tuesday morning, although I have to travel sixty leagues, partly in a cart, in canoe and in a vehicle peculiar to the country, which seems to have served as a model to the cabriolets of Paris.

The winter operations consisted merely of some forays of Indians, who have really laid waste Pennsylvania and Virginia.

M. de Levis, a Colonial officer, carried on the 27th of March, sword in hand, a small fort near Chouaguen, in which the English had a dépôt of provisions and forty-five thousand weight of powder. This detachment was to consist, at first, only of Canadians and Indians, under the apprehension that our Regulars were unable to bear the fatigue which, according to their avowal, far exceeded that of Bohemia, and could not travel on snow shoes. But, to satisfy their zeal and request, it became necessary to adjoin to it sixty volunteers from the four battalions, who have distinguished themselves to the great satisfaction of that officer. This action cost only two or three men. Two young English officers have been brought in here lately, whom the Indians had taken on a scout.

It appears to me that the Iroquois are expected to remain, at least, neutral.

I write by this opportunity to M. de St. Julien, Commandant of our two battalions at Louisburg, directing him to be very exact in writing to you, and to inform me likewise of any particulars respecting those two battalions.

The attention and politeness of the gentlemen officers of the ships to the troops, cannot be mentioned in too high terms.

I shall have the honor to enter into fuller detail when I write to you directly.

I have the honor to be respectfully,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> LOUIS JOSEPH MARQUIS DE MONTCALM de Saint Veran, was born at the Chateau of Candiac, near Nismes, in 1712. At the age of 14 he entered on his military career and served seventeen years in the regiment of Hainaut, with which he made the campaign of Bohemia. He became Colonel of the regiment of Auxerre in 1743; received three wounds at the battle of Plasencia, in Italy, June 16, 1746, and two in the disastrous battle of Exiles, in Piedmont, July, 1747, in which year he was appointed Brigadier, and Colonel of Cavalry in 1749. In 1756, he was appointed Major-General; Commander of the Order of St. Louis in 1757; Lieutenant-General in 1758, and was mortally wounded before Quebec, on the 13th September, 1759. He died the following morning in the Castle of St. Louis, and his remains were interred the same night by torch-light, in the Church of the Ursuline Convent. The Biographie Universelle says that General Montcalm was buried in a hole made by a shell—"a meet tomb for a warrior, who died on the field of honor." This, we fear, is pure imagination on the part of M. Vincens St. Laurent. In Canada, says M. Garneau (Histoire du Canada, II., 827), he exhibited all his best qualities and all the most striking imperfections. He was brilliant, but not profound; brave in war, but timid of purpose; by no means enterprising; negligent of the discipline of his own troops. Like Braddock and Dieskau, despising everything Colonial, he was jealous of others to such a degree, that he may be said to have sacrificed his life to the fear that the victory he anticipated, when he went forth to meet General Wolfe, would be shared by the Marquis de Vaudreuil. — Ed.

Journal of Occurrences in Canada from October, 1755, to June, 1756.

1755. October. By a letter from Detroit dated the 18th, all the Indians of that quarter appeared inclined to attack the English. The Miamis and Poutouāmis are equally so disposed. The latter have had parties out constantly, and have killed or captured, up to the date of this letter, 120 English.

M. de Dieskau has been removed from Orange to Boston; no news have been received from him for a considerable time.

110 Acadian families have been removed to the Island of St. John, and 40 to the river of that name, notwithstanding the efforts of the English to the contrary.

1756. January. Spies have been sent to Minas and Port Royal, who have reported that there were 400 Regulars at Chibouctou, now Halifax, and 80 at Port Royal.

The English have burnt a barn on us filled with hay, in the neighborhood of Carillon, and have taken one prisoner.

February. The English, 'tis said, are making great preparations and considerable levies in all the New England Provinces. At Orange they have organized a company of Rangers composed of Dutchmen, and other people of the same sort, who are familiar with the woods.

March 18th Received information that M<sup>r</sup> du Mas, commanding at Fort du Quesne, has defeated the English on the same ground where they were beaten last year, and that the Indians have committed great ravages on the enemy's territory.

20th 200 bateaux, designed to transport our troops in the next campaign, are just completed.

April 11th Some Englishmen, who came to the neighborhood of Fort St. Frederic, have burnt 4 barns. A sergeant and soldier, who went to hunt from Fort Carillon, have been attacked by a party of Mohawks; the sergeant has been killed and scalped; the soldier escaped.

May. A party of Iroquois took some English prisoners, among whom was a Major and another officer; the first was bearer of what are considered important despatches, but nothing has transpired respecting their contents.

3<sup>d</sup> We learn from M<sup>r</sup> de Klerec,<sup>1</sup> Governor of the Mississipi, that the Indian Nations within his government design to make an attack on the English of the Beautiful river, where we have taken a considerable number of prisoners, amounting to 600, since the battle of Fort de Quesne, where M<sup>r</sup> Braddock was killed.

6th A letter, written from the country of the Wiatanons, states that the Illinois have attacked the Kikapaux and Miamis of St. Joseph, on the River of the Iroquois;<sup>2</sup> they have killed two women and taken five children prisoners.

23<sup>d</sup> We have taken three English prisoners in Lake St. Sacrament.

This moment news arrives that three deputies of the Five Nations have come to Montreal to demand that the road from us to Chouaguin be open. They have been very coldly received by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and 'tis in consequence of this proposition that M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers has been detached, with 1100 Frenchmen and Indians, to intercept all communication with the English, and prevent the transportation of their provisions, ammunition and artillery to said Fort Chouaguin. The reports of divers prisoners leave it to be presumed that it is badly provided in every way.

Some Englishmen, in ambush near Carillon, have killed a militiaman, made a prisoner of a young cadet who had been sent with 20 men to remove some trees that had fallen across the road. This young officer was so imprudent as to leave the guns belonging to his detachment at some distance from his party.

On 27th of March last there was a fight near Chouaguin in which M<sup>r</sup> de Lery, a Colonial officer, distinguished himself. I shall append the relation of that affair at the end of this Journal.

The King's ships le Héros, l'Illustre and le Léopard, with the frigates la Licorne, la Sauvage and la Sirène, which sailed from Brest in the forepart of April, in three divisions, that is to say, a ship and a frigate in company, arrived at the end of this month at Quebec. Le Léopard had a large number of sick which have increased since the arrival of the vessel. M<sup>r</sup> Gomain, Commander of this ship, and M. de Romainville, his First Lieutenant, have died; also, an officer of the land forces. The mortality among the soldiers and sailors is not as considerable as was to be apprehended.

June 7th Word is arrived from Montreal that M. de la Colombière, a Colonial officer, who has been gone three weeks with 300 men, on a scouting expedition, and to burn the canoes belonging to the English at Fort Lydius, about 20 leagues from Fort St. Frederic, which were designed to transport the provisions and ammunition, has been discovered some leagues from that fort, in consequence of the indiscretion of a Cadet who was taken in the neighborhood of Fort Carillon, now called Fort Vaudreuil, and had informed the English that that officer was on his march. Thereupon they have adopted measures to oppose his project, by reinforcing the garrison of Fort Lydius and removing their canoes under the cannon of the fort.

M. de la Colombière having learned what the English had done, from scouts he had abroad, thought only of making prisoners in case the enemy should think of showing themselves, which failed not to be the case.

They made a sortie of 80 men, who would have all perished, had it not been for the precipitancy of our Canadians and some Indians, who showed themselves too soon; a portion of that detachment has, notwithstanding, been defeated, and three prisoners taken. That officer has returned to near the same place with 200 men.

A party of Indians has killed 14 carpenters and taken three prisoners in the neighborhood of Chouaguin, out of 40 who were at work there.

The Mississagués and Senecas have killed 50 Englishmen near Fort Cumberland, on the Beautiful river.

Considerable consternation prevails in that quarter among the English, and the news received last winter in France of the desolation of Pennsylvania, are not without foundation. The great pillage at the time of General Braddok's defeat, has attracted some Indian tribes from very remote countries to Fort du Quesne.

The merchant vessels, la Renommée, le Robuste, la Reine des Anges, le Sàgittaire and two schooners which sailed from France in the month of March, freighted with provisions for the Colony and bringing troops, have arrived in the month of May. Several others are expected.

The news received of the enemy is to the effect that they have collected two considerable bodies of troops which are estimated to amount to 10,000 men each—one at Orange, destined for an attack on Fort St. Frederic, and the other at Chouaguin, threatening Niagara; but 'tis hardly to be believed that there are really 20,000 men assembled.

Our troops will be distributed this year, according to the following order :

The battalions of La Reine and Languedoc are already encamped at Carillon, or Fort Vaudreuil, with a corps of Canadians and Indians, who go out frequently and always come back with some scalps.

Béarn is on the march since the last days of May, to encamp at Niagara, and Guyenne at Frontenac; La Sarre will join it, and our Engineers are going there—that place requiring their presence.

The news to be received of the enemy will determine the destination of the Royal Roussillon regiment, which cannot reach Montreal before the end of the month.

The navigation of Lake Ontario is an object of consequence. We have 4 vessels on it; the largest of these carry 14 12-pounders. The English have some craft on it also, but there is reason to believe that we shall be an overmatch for them, especially as the largest of their ships cannot be launched, as we are assured.

The latest intelligence from Fort du Quesne is of the 27th of April. The enemy does not appear to be making any considerable movement in that quarter. The Upper Nations appear to be well disposed towards us, and as yet, nothing but neutrality is perceptible among the Five Nations.

Capture of Fort Bull by M. Lery.

On the 27th of March, 1756, at four o'clock in the morning, the detachment commanded by M. de Léry, Lieutenant in the Colonial troops, commenced its march, very much weakened by the fatigue it experienced during fifteen days since the men left Montreal, and because these were two days entirely out of provisions. They arrived at the Carrying place about half-past five o'clock, and the scouts in advance brought in two Englishmen who were coming from the fort nearest Chouaguin, whom M. de Léry caused to be informed that he should have their brains knocked out by the Indians, if he perceived that they attempted to conceal the truth, and if they communicated it to him, that he would use all his influence to extricate them.

These prisoners stated that the fort towards Chouaguin was called Bull, having a garrison of 60 soldiers commanded by a Lieutenant and containing a considerable quantity of ammunition and provisions; that the fort was constructed of heavy stockades, 15 to 18 feet above the ground, doubled inside to a man's height and was nearly the shape of a star; that it had no cannon, but a number of grenadoes which Colonel Johnson had sent, on receiving intelligence from the Indians of our march; that the Commandant of this fort was named Bull; that 15 bateaux were to leave in the evening for Chouaguin; that sleighs were arriving, at the moment, with 9 bateaux loads; that the fort on the Corlar side, at the head of the Carrying place, was of much thicker stockades and well flanked, having 4 pieces of cannon and a garrison of 150 men, under the command of Captain Williams, whose name the fort bore; that they did not know if it were provisioned, as they had not been in it.

At 10 o'clock the Indians captured 10 men who were conducting the sleighs loaded with provisions. These confirmed what the prisoners had stated, and added that 100 men had arrived at 8 o'clock on the preceding evening, who announced that they were followed by a large force.

M. de Léry, whilst occupied in distributing among his detachment the provisions found on the sleighs, was informed that a Negro who accompanied the loads, had escaped, taking the road to Fort Williams; whereupon, not doubting but they would have intimation of him at that fort, he acquainted M. de Montigny, his second, of his determination to attack Fort Bull, as the prisoners had assured him that it contained the greater part of the provisions and ammunition. Each officer immediately received orders to form his brigade, and M. de Léry told the Indians that he was about to attack the Bull; but they represented to him that there was provisions enough to carry the detachment to La Présentation—English meat which the Master of Life had bestowed on them without costing a man—and that to risk another affair would be to contravene His Will; if he desired, absolutely, to perish, he was master of his Frenchmen. This Commandant replied, that he did not wish to expose them and asked them for only two Indians to act as guides, which they, with difficulty, granted. Some twenty determined, afterwards, to accompany him, being encouraged by some drams of brandy. The Algonquins, Nepissings, and those Iroquois who were unwilling to follow, accepted the proposition offered by M. de Léry, to guard the road and to watch the movements of the English at Fort Williams.

The detachment having proceeded along the high road, the soldiers, with fixed bayonets, M. de Léry gave orders, when within 15 arpens of the fort, to move straight forward, without firing a shot, and seize the guards on entering. He was still at a distance of 5 arpens when he heard the Indians' whoop notwithstanding the prohibition he had issued. He instantly ordered his men to advance double-quick so as to secure the gate of the fort, but the enemy had time to close it. Six Indians only followed the French; the others pursued six Englishmen, who, being unable to reach the fort, threw themselves into the woods.

M. de Léry set some men to cut down the gate, and caused the Commandant to be summoned to surrender, promising quarter to him and all his garrison. The only answer to this was a volley of musketry and the throwing of a quantity of grenades. Our Regulars and Canadians, who ran full speed the moment the Indians whooped, got possession of the loopholes, through which they kept up a fire on such of the English as they could sight. Great efforts were made to batter down the gate, which was finally cut to pieces in about an hour. Then the entire detachment rushed into the fort with a cry of Vive le Roi, and put every one to the sword they could lay hands on. One woman and a few soldiers only were fortunate enough to escape the fury of our troops. Some pretend that only one prisoner was made during this action.

The Commander and officers repaired to the stores and caused their men to use diligence in throwing the barrels of powder into the river, but one of the magazines having caught fire and M. de Léry, considering that he could not extinguish the flames without incurring the risk of the people being blown up who might be employed in that duty, gave orders to retire as quick as possible. There was hardly time to do this before the fire communicated to the powder which exploded in 3 places. The concussion was so violent that a soldier of Guyenne and an Iroquois of the Sault were wounded by the debris of the fort, though they were already at a distance. The Indian, especially, is in danger of losing his life by the wound.

Meanwhile, a detachment was sent to look after the baggage that remained on the road, and shortly after an Indian came to notify M. de Léry that the English were making a sortie, which caused him to collect his men, and placing himself on the bank of the creek, he had the shells, grenades, balls and all the ammunition that could be found, thrown into the water, notwithstanding. He had the 15 bateaux staved in, and then set out to meet the sortie of which he had been notified, but he learned on the road that it had been repulsed by the Indians, after having killed or captured 17 men. This sortie was made from Fort Williams, on the intelligence carried thither by the Negro, and so well did the Indians who took charge of the road acquit themselves, though unwilling to attack Fort Bull, that the party quickly retreated with a loss of 17 men. Wherefore, the Indians, on coming some hours after, to congratulate M. de Léry on his fortunate success, failed not to make the most of their advantage.

One Chief asked him if he proposed attacking the other fort; this was nothing more than a vaunt on the part of this Indian. M. de Léry answered that he would do so forthwith if the Indians would follow him. This reply drove this Chief off, and all his party prepared to go after him.

Our troops did the same thing and encamped in the woods, three-quarters of a league off. The Fort Bull prisoners were examined, and we learned that Colonel Johnson, having been informed of our march, had sent to warn all the posts thereof, though regarding it, however, as impossible, in consequence of the rigor of the season. Fort Bull is situated near a small creek that falls into that of Chouaguin, about 4 miles from the fort. Fort Williams is near the Mohawk river, which falls into that of Corlar. The Carrying place, from one fort to the other, is about 4 miles long, over a pretty level, though in some places swampy, country.

M. de Léry's detachment consisted of 15 officers, 2 cadets, 10 soldiers of the regiment of La Reine, 17 of Guyenne, 22 of Béarn and 27 Colonial, making, in all, 93 soldiers; 166 Canadians, 33 Iroquois of the Lake of the Two Mountains, 33 of La Présentation, 18 of the Sault St. Louis, 3 of St Bigrin,<sup>1</sup> 3 Abenakis of Mississkoui, 2 Algonquins and 11 Nipissings. Total, 362 men, 265 of whom attacked the fort. A soldier of the Colony and an Indian of La Présentation were killed. A soldier of La Reine, 2 Canadians and 2 Iroquois have been wounded.

It is estimated that more than 40 thousand weight of powder was burnt or thrown into the creek, with a considerable number of shells, grenades and shot of various calibre. A great quantity of salted provisions, bread, butter, chocolate, sugar and other stores was likewise thrown into the water. The magazines were filled with clothing and other effects which were plundered; the rest have been burnt. This day cost the English 90 men, 30 of whom are prisoners. Our detachment killed or captured 30 horses.

22nd of June. News has been received of several merchantmen in the river, among others of Le Beauharnois; they are all at Bicqs, and will reach Quebec with the first northeast wind, which has not been frequent this spring, though it be the season.

Chevalier de Tourville, Commander of the King's frigate la Sauvage, having received despatches from the Marquis de Vaudreuil by 2 couriers who arrived at Quebec on the 19th and 20th of this month, set sail on the 22<sup>d</sup> for France.

24th Intelligence is received from Montreal informing us that the English have erected forts every two leagues from Lake St. Sacrament to Orange, a distance of about 30 leagues. 'Tis also reported that they are on the march to attack Fort St. Frederic with a force of 10,000 men, which has caused the Royal Roussillon to be destined for that quarter, where the Marquis de Vaudreuil has likewise sent all the militia he could muster. I have already mentioned that the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc were already there with a considerable force of Canadians and Indians. The battalion of La Sarre can be easily forwarded thither, if thought necessary, instead of leaving it at Frontenac with that of Guyenne.

The Marquis de Montcalm has remained at Montreal, in order to be more convenient to the quarter where his presence will be required. Chevalier de Levi has set out for Montreal on the 22nd of this month for Fort St. Frederic.

M<sup>r</sup> de Bourlamarque is destined for Frontenac or Niagara.

FROM ILE ROYALE.

On the first of this month 4 English vessels made their appearance off Louisburg, but did not remain. It is presumed that they wintered at Halifax, and were on their way to Europe when seen. Louisbourg is so much the more quiet, as it is well provided with supplies and munitions of war.

27th June. We have found l'Ouarde, a flyboat from Rochefort, and l'Ascension, anchored at Bicqs, having on board troops and munitions of war for Quebec.

M. Kerlerec to M. de Machault.

New Orleans, 1 June, 1756.

My Lord,

By the last letters of the 16th of March, which I have received from M. de Mackarty, Commandant at the Illinois, he informs me that he has not received any order from M. de Vaudreuil, and appears ignorant of the different events passing in Canada. He adds, that Captain de Chation, commanding at St. Joseph, a dependency of Canada, writes that he received a letter from M. de Vaudreuil, recommending him to labor in keeping the Nations quiet in existing circumstances, and that he will soon send him packets for M. de Mackarty, which he will be hardly able to receive before this month. Therefore, my Lord, I cannot give you any news of what is passing in the North and on the Beautiful river. As regards the domiciliated Indian Nations, and others in the neighborhood of Illinois, they appear pretty quiet.

M. de Mackarty in accordance with the letter of M. Dumas, Commandant at Fort Duquesne, copy whereof I annex hereunto, complied as far as he was able with the requisition for flour and salted provisions, but not to near the quantity that was desired. As soon as I shall be better informed, my Lord, of what will take place both at the Illinois and the Beautiful river, I shall not fail to send you an account thereof.

The only information I have from different Indians of that quarter is, that those of the North are incessantly, and most successfully, ravaging and laying waste all the settlements belonging to the Provinces of New-York, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia and Potomac. Several have even quite recently been discovered with all their baggage within 5 days' journey of the Kaouitas,<sup>1</sup> going in quest of an asylum between St. Augustine and New Georgia. This is what I have learned pending my voyage to Mobile.

I am with the most profound respect, My Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

KERLEREC.

Copy of the letter written to M. de Makarty, Commandant at the Illinois, on the 10th of 9<sup>ber</sup>, 1755, by M. Dumas, Commandant of Fort Du Quesne.

Sir,

The critical condition of Canada last summer; attacked on all sides by numerous armies, whose movements M. Du Quesne, at the time our general, was unwilling to foresee; with posts defenceless and without supplies; Lake Ontario closed by Chaouaguin during the entire of the fine season; all this, Sir, has placed this post in the most sad want of provisions.

The enemy having cut off our communication, as I have had the honor to inform you, Sir, it is a long time since I have received any news from M. de Vaudreuil; I have reason to believe he is busy clearing the roads, but the greatest success cannot at present provide so many indispensable necessities; therefore I have to look elsewhere.

In this so delicate a conjuncture, I take upon myself, Sir, to send to you for provisions, and if they can reach us in season, they will afford us the opportunity of being provided with other necessities by facilitating the carriage of whatever comes to us from below.

Wherefore, I send you Sieur Ducharme, a skilful voyageur who formerly came up the Beautiful river as far as the Falls, and who expects to be able to ascend it again as far as this place, with carts loaded with 10 thousand weight under a guard of six men.

I have had the honor to advise M. de Vaudreuil of all this, and I flatter myself that you will give all your support to an undertaking on the success of which depends perhaps the fate of our settlement.

I furnish M. Ducharme with 18 men; he proposes to engage some at the Illinois, but I foresee that it will be difficult for him to find people sufficient to convey 120 thousand weight of flour and 40 thousand weight of pork. It is on you, Sir, that I rest the confidence with which I enter on this project.

You, Sir, can easily furnish Sieur Ducharme with a detachment under the command of an officer. It will march as an escort, and the soldiers will be paid as laborers by the contractor for working in the convoy.

I have heard of one Delisle undertaking formerly to convey provisions to the Ouyatonons. I suppose, Sir, you have orders to protect him. I demand the same assistance for Sieur Ducharme, and that you will add thereto whatever will be in your power.

In laboring for the good of the service your reward and mine are assured, since we have performed our duty.

I have the honor to be, etc.,

Abstract of Despatches received from Canada.

The despatches just received from M. de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of the Colony, dated the 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, and 8th of February, contain the following particulars.

That Governor remained at Montreal, in order to be in a more convenient position to harass the English during the winter, and to make preparations for the next campaign.

With this double object, he directed his efforts principally to gaining the Indians, and flatters himself that he has generally succeeded.

All the Nations on the Beautiful river have taken up the hatchet against the English.

The first party that was formed in that quarter, since the last report M. de Vaudreuil had sent in the month of October, ultimo, was composed of two hundred and fifty Indians, to whom the Commandant of Fort Duquesne adjoined some Frenchmen at the request of those Indians.

This party divided themselves into small squads, at the height of land, and fell on the settlements beyond Fort Cumberland; defeated a detachment of 20 regulars under the command of two officers. After these different squads had destroyed or carried away several families, pillaged and burnt several houses, they came again together with the design of surprising Fort Cumberland, and accordingly lay in ambush during some time; but the Commandant of the fort, who no doubt was on his guard, dared not show himself. This party returned to Fort Duquesne with sixty prisoners and a great number of scalps.

The second detachment, which consisted of a military Cadet, a Canadian and 4 Chaouanons, took two prisoners under the guns of Fort Cumberland, whither the party had been sent by the commandant of Fort Duquesne, to find out what was going on there.

The third, made up of a Canadian and several Chaouanons, destroyed eleven families, burned sixteen houses and one mill, and killed a prodigious number of cattle. The Indians returned on horseback.

The fourth party was composed of one hundred and twelve Delawares (Loups). They struck in separate divisions. Thirteen returned, first, with twenty-one scalps and six prisoners. The remainder of the party took such a considerable number of scalps and prisoners that these Indians sent some to all the nations to replace their dead.

M. de Vaudreuil reports only what these four parties did. A number of others had marched with equal success. Some have actually been on the war path as far even as Virginia.

The Commandant of Fort Duquesne has informed M. de Vaudreuil that the Delawares settled beyond the mountains which separate us from the English, had, on his invitation, just removed their villages so as to unite with their brethren, our allies; that the old men, the women and children, had already gone with the baggage, and that the warriors were to form the rear guard and, on quitting, to attack the English.

M. de Vaudreuil observes, on this migration, that it will be of so much the more advantage to us, as the Delawares will become respectable in the estimation of all the other nations, and the Beautiful river will acquire new settlers who are sworn enemies of the English.

All the Indians towards Acadia and New England are, in spite of the various attempts which the English have made to seduce them, more hostile to these than ever; but, unfortunately, they have not as yet been able to go on the war path, having been afflicted by the small-pox in all their villages.

This disease has committed ravages also among the Canadians, and prevented M. de Vaudreuil executing the movements and incursions he had projected during the winter.

Another and a most extraordinary event, in that country, had equally prevented that project; namely, since the twentieth of January, there has not been a particle of snow on the ground; this is the case ordinarily only towards the end of April or even the beginning of May. The roads were thus rendered impassable. He was impatiently waiting for the return of the cold weather to send out some expeditions. (Letters from Ile Royale, of the month of April, state that the frost has been quite severe there at the close of February.)

Some parties have been out, but have only taken a few scalps, as the English were always distrustful and dared not appear except in numbers.

Among the number of scalps is one which is represented to be that of the English Engineer at Lake St. Sacrament.

In regard to the Iroquois, they have sent word to M. de Vaudreuil, by a French officer resident among them, that their deputies will come to see him this spring.

They have disavowed all those of their people who were with the English in M. Dieskau's affair. They have likewise said that it was their intention to follow their former system of neutrality, and M. de Vaudreuil had them notified that if any of their Nation was found among the English he would regard them as enemies, and would let all the Upper Nations loose on them. He will be better able to judge of their true disposition in the course of their proposed visit.

In respect to the operations of the campaign, M. de Vaudreuil foresaw that he should be constrained to confine himself to the defensive. He did not consider himself in a condition to risk the Choûaguén expedition. The English have constructed their forts there, which are provided with cannon and a garrison of six hundred men continually on its guard. M. de Vaudreuil was, however, not losing sight of that expedition; he was making every preparation that depended on him in order that there should be no delay, if circumstances permitted him to undertake it on the arrival of reinforcements from France.

According to intelligence received from the English Colonies, they were preparing to make the greatest efforts for attacking Canada again this year on the Acadia side, by Lake St. Sacrament, Niagara and the Beautiful river; but their dispositions for these four campaigns are different from those of last year. They are to direct their principal strength against Fort St. Frederic and Forts Niagara and Frontenac.

The troops from Old England are to be employed in the army that is destined against the two last mentioned forts; after having reduced these, they are to proceed towards the Beautiful river at the same time that fifteen hundred men will be dispatched to that quarter from Virginia.

Whatever these plans may amount to, M. de Vaudreuil is preparing to face them all. He does not transmit the distribution he proposes to make of his forces to effect that object, because it will depend on circumstances and events.

He merely remarks that at the opening of the navigation he will dispatch the men and provisions he will consider necessary for the defence of each part; but that he will be careful to form a corps of reserve of Canadians, either to forward assistance to the most exposed points or to serve in the expedition against Choûaguén, should it take place.

Meanwhile the following are the measures he has adopted.

Towards Acadia and New England: He has sent orders to Captain Boishebert, who commands on those frontiers, to maintain, to the last extremity, the post on the River St. John so as to prevent the progress of the English in that quarter. And he hopes that officer will succeed therein with the aid of the French and Indians, whose confidence he fully possesses. The Missionaries will second him, and, possibly, he will likewise be assisted by some Acadians who have retired thither in order to be safe from the cruelties which their fellow countrymen experience at the hands of the English.

For the defence of Fort St. Frederic: M. de Vaudreuil has set about fortifying Carillon, which post he had caused to be occupied between the above mentioned fort and Lake St. Sacrament, after M. Dieskau's affair.

Twelve guns and eight peteraroes had already been placed in battery with four small mortars for throwing grenades, and M. de Vaudreuil was to send thither, at the opening of the navigation, eight other pieces of artillery, two of which are eighteen, and the remainder twelve, eight and four-pounders. The fort is, moreover, well supplied with powder, balls and grape shot (mitraille), &c.

M. de Vaudreuil had left a garrison of only four hundred men there, but was to send a considerable detachment thither and to establish a flying camp at the Little Carrying place of Lake St. Sacrament, which is an important post some leagues beyond Carillon, and he flatters himself that he will be able to stop the English in that direction. He has been, moreover, informed that the English have had a new fort constructed on this side of Lake St. Sacrament since M. Dieskaw's affair.

The works which have been considered necessary to put Niagara in a state of defence, were much advanced, and they would, it was expected, be completed this spring. A garrison of three hundred men is actively at work there. Niagara will, thus, be capable of resisting the enemy; its position is, moreover, very advantageous. M. de Vaudreuil remarks that, meanwhile, he will be obliged to send thither, early in the season, a considerable force with provisions, and that he will hasten to do so the rather as the navigation of the English in that quarter is open earlier than with us.

He will provide at the same time for the security of Fort Frontenac. He has caused two sloops to be built on Lake Ontario, which are to be equipped as war cruisers on that lake, where they will be capable of doing good service.

Respecting the Beautiful river: The commandant of Fort Duquesne has advised M. de Vaudreuil that that fort will not be in a condition to resist an attack with artillery. That Commandant is Captain Dumas; the same that happened to be in command at the affair against General Braddock after Sieur de Beaujeu's death.

He has observed to M. de Vaudreuil, that to go out to meet the enemy and give him battle appeared inevitable. M. de Vaudreuil had not yet given any positive orders on that point; they were to be transmitted after mature reflection. He was to send him also, very early in the season, all the assistance he had demanded, both in men, provisions, &c.

In order that M. Dumas may not be straitened in any of his operations, M. de Vaudreuil has issued his commands to all the posts convenient to the Beautiful river, to forward some Indians and Frenchmen to Fort Duquesne.

M. Dumas will find himself in a condition to continually send out some considerable parties to meet the enemy, and M. de Vaudreuil expects that before the English have reached our territory, they will have lost more people than they will possibly kill of ours in a decisive action.

"I will probably depend," he adds in one of his letters, "on who will do best; the enemy or I. I will offer them everywhere the most active resistance."

"I shall be prepared to take advantage of every circumstance that chance will throw in my way."

"I am confident they will not make any progress, and that they will lose men; but it is easily seen that all those movements cannot be made without immense expense, and this is what causes me most uneasiness."

M. de Vaudreuil to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 8th of June, 1756.

My Lord,

I have received the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the

I cannot but bear most favorable testimony of the conduct of the battalions of La Reine, Languedoc, Guyenne and Béarn. Equally good has been the behavior of those which have passed the winter in Montreal or its environs, and of those of La Reine and Languedoc which have wintered at Carillon, of Guyenne at Niagara and of Bearn at Fort Frontenac.

The two former battalions are encamped at Fort Carillon; the third at Fort Frontenac and the fourth at Niagara. The one and the other are very useful for the works which I am obliged to have constructed at these forts, and they apply themselves with good will.

I must render you the best report in particular of M. Pouchot, Captain in the Bearn regiment. He perfectly understands all the departments of engineering. He was so good as to take on himself the direction of the fortifications I proposed constructing at Niagara, and applied himself so closely thereto, from the time of the unfortunate issue of the Baron de Dieskau's campaign until now, that he has almost entirely superintended them to their completion, and that fort which was abandoned, and beyond making the smallest resistance, is now a place of considerable importance, in consequence of the regularity, solidity and utility of its works. I add, my Lord, that M. Pouchot has surmounted all obstacles and that his zeal has suggested resources to accelerate his labors; he has even accomplished all with an economy whereat I cannot but feel agreeably surprised. He is, besides, much experienced in all that concerns the service, and every reason will engage me to unite with the Marquis de Montcalm in requesting you to procure for him such favors from the King as he will deserve.

During the past winter, I have employed, my Lord, two soldiers of each company of the battalions of La Reine, Guyenne and Bearn, in a detachment composed of Colonial troops, Canadians and Indians, under the command of Lieutenant de Lery. I could not include any of the soldiers of the Languedoc battalion, because it was at Chambly, and the river was impassable to Montreal either in bateaux or on the ice. I sent this detachment to the carrying place situate between Corlar and Chouaguen to seize one of the forts the English have erected there, and which was the principal entrepôt of their provisions and ammunition. This detachment has fulfilled its mission to perfection; some soldiers belonging to the troops of the Line and of the Colony, several Militiamen and Indians, burst open and cut down the gate of that fort, despite the fire from the enemy's musketry and a prodigious quantity of grenades. All the English in that fort have been killed or taken. We had only two men killed and six wounded; of these, one was a soldier belonging to La Reine, and one of Guyenne. Whatever was in that fort, whether provisions, ammunition or stores, has been thrown into the creek or burnt in the flames, according to the report of the detachment and even of the English prisoners. There was 45 thousand weight of powder, which it will not perhaps be easy to replace.

The parties I have sent out this winter to harass the enemy have not been as considerable as I had wished. I could not do entirely as I wanted in this matter, because no fort was sufficiently supplied with provisions, and the roads have not been passable, as the season has been one of the most unsettled. Nevertheless, I calculate that, without exaggeration, the English have, since my arrival, lost one hundred men for our one.

The English muster this year, my Lord, a much more considerable force than they employed last year; and I am, on my side, prepared to offer them everywhere the same resistance, and am confident they will not be more fortunate this, than they were last season.

The battalions of La Sarre and Royal Roussillon are fortunately arrived at Quebec; also 117 volunteers drafted from different regiments.

The Marquis de Montcalm and M. de Bourlamarques are now at Montreal. Chevalier de Levis will not delay joining them. He has remained at Quebec in order to get the two battalions in order.

I have experienced a real pleasure, my Lord, in conferring with M. de Montcalm, especially in what relates to the service of the land forces, both in garrison and in the field. I act in concert with him for the incorporation of the Recruits into the different corps, and we conform ourselves exactly to the intentions of the King. I have not concealed anything from him of the actual condition of the Colony. He is very prepossessing. On my side, I neglect nothing for the maintenance of union and good understanding between us, and we shall always agree as to whatever will tend to the good of the service and the advantage of the Colony.

I will immediately dispatch the battalion of La Sarre to Fort Frontenac. I am obliged to have that fort put in the best state of defence, in consequence of its proximity to Chouaguen, and to anticipate the English, who probably will attack it in preference to that of Niagara.

If a party of about 900 men, composed of a detachment of Marines, Canadians and Indians, that I sent to attempt the capture of some convoys of provisions, and to hinder the junction of the forces at Chouaguen, meet with success; and if my circumstances be also anywise favorable, I shall be able to undertake the reduction of that fort, and the battalions of Guyenne, Béarn and La Sarre will be ready, on receipt of my orders, to encamp there, and to join the Colonial troops that I shall have destined for the same expedition.

As regards the battalion of Royal Roussillon, I shall send it to Carillon.

I have not assigned any command as yet to Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm, de Levis and de Bourlamarque; I shall employ each according to the exigency of the case.

I shall have the honor, my Lord, to inform you of whatever will transpire in the places where these battalions are employed during the campaign; and I shall seize with avidity every occasion to renew to you the assurances of my respectful attachment.

The pains I have taken, my Lord, to acquire positive information of M. de Dieskaw, have not been fruitless. I have received two letters from him, and I know that he is cured of his wounds. I have sent him letters of credit, and have also written to M. Schirley, to the Governor of New-York and to M<sup>r</sup> Johnson, requesting them to exhibit towards him the regard and attention which are due to him personally, and particularly to his rank of General officer.

I am, with most profound respect, My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 8th of June, 1756.

My Lord,

I have received the letter you did me the honor to write me on the 15th of March, with the King's instruction respecting the conduct I was to observe towards the English, whereunto I shall exactly conform.

In truth, there must be no longer any question of managing the English. Their enterprises are carried to excess, and you see, my Lord, by the reports I have the honor of rendering you, that they are making new and greater efforts against this Colony; that I am making use of the reinforcements the King has granted me to oppose them, and that I neglect nothing to enable me to carry the war into their country. But before undertaking any enterprise, I occupy myself in making all the dispositions necessary to assure the defence of my government, and it will be always on this principle that I shall regulate my operations as his Majesty has prescribed in my instructions.

I apply myself particularly, my Lord, to sending parties of Indians into the English Colonies. I also do my best to multiply them as much as circumstances permit. Nothing is more calculated to disgust the people of those Colonies and to make them desire the return of peace. My labor in this regard has not been in vain. None of the New England Countries but feels the incursions of our Indians, and I can say, without exaggeration, that the English have lost one hundred men for our one. I should greatly wish to discover some means to make that people more and more sensible how much it would be to their advantage not to countenance such odious views, the consequences whereof may be so fatal to themselves. But the matter is not so easy, and I shall have recourse to it only so far as I shall be sure of not compromising anything.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 12th of June, 1756.

My Lord,

I profit by the first opportunity that presents, in the departure of Chevalier de Tourville with the frigate La Sauvage, to report to you the actual condition of everything. I have had the honor to write you by way of Louisbourg on the 21st of May. Although that letter does not contain any detail of interest, in order to be more exact, I annex a duplicate of it hereunto.

The reinforcements sent by the three ships of war and the three frigates, arrived safe. Le héros entered the harbor of Quebec on the 12th of May; the frigate on board of which I came, on the 13th. The other ships and frigates arrived at Quebec between the 25th and 31st.

No English ship was seen except on leaving Brest. Le Léopard and l'Illustre, with the Royal Roussillon regiment and four companies of that of La Sarre on board, have had a great many sick. The regiment of La Sarre lost, during the passage, up to the 31st of May, only six soldiers and one servant. That of Royal Roussillon lost only two. Both these regiments had, on the second of this month, two hundred and twenty sick in the hospital at Quebec. Two died the evening before. I flatter myself this sickness will not have any unfortunate results. Six merchantmen have also arrived at Quebec, freighted, on the King's account, with provisions, munitions of war and 400 men, part recruits and part soldiers drafted from the different regiments of Infantry.

Since the battle of Lake St. Sacrament, the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc have remained in camp at Carillon; Béarn, at Frontenac; Guienne, at Niagara, and entered into winter quarters only at the end of November. As this entire Colony had been neglected and the forts existed only in name, these regiments had been engaged with some Canadians in putting them in order. M. de Vaudreuil employed M. Pouchaut, Captain in the regiment of Béarn, who has erected a good fortification at Niagara. It consists of a horn-work with its half-moon, covert-way, lunettes at the places d'armes reëntering from the covert-way. The front of this work is 120 toises. It is fortified according to M. de Vauban's method.

At Carillon has been constructed a square fort with four bastions, which are defended by a redoubt situated on a hill that commands the fort. The object of this fort within five leagues of St. Frederic has been to cover the latter, which becomes a place of second line; to secure the navigation of Lake Champlain, and to command the principal egress of the English at that point. The works are of earth and will be soon in a state of defence. The fort of Carillon has been superintended by M. de Lotbinière, Colonial Engineer. He has been assisted by Captain Germain, of La Reine, and by Adjutant Joannes, of the Languedoc regiment. I have written to these gentlemen to enable me to render you a more exact account thereof.

Frontenac which is the centre of our line of defence, is the part on which the least has been done. Our two Engineers are on the march for that place, to construct a fortification there partaking of the character of an intrenched camp and commanding an ill located fort, which must be preserved because it is in existence.

The winter operations have been confined to forays of the Upper country Indians, who have really laid waste Virginia and Pennsylvania; to negotiations with the Five Nations who have, as yet, promised only neutrality, and to an expedition of which I have had the honor to speak to you in my letter of the 21st of May.

The soldier is very well off here, as he has rations as well as his pay and is employed in works for which he is remunerated. He has, as it were, too much money, wherefore the greatest attention has to be paid to discipline. The climate, the manner in which he sees the Militia of the country and the Indians do service, inspire him with a spirit of independence, for much patience and management are necessary when Canadians and Indians are led to battle. Since coming to Montreal, I spend my time among the latter in receiving and returning compliments according to M. de Vaudreuil's instructions. The Iroquois of the Sault St. Louis have done me the honor of coming to present me with a Belt, and in all their speeches, speak with respect and veneration of the power and protection of Ononthis Goa, as they style the King.

There cannot be better hospitals than those in which our soldiers are treated. You will see, my Lord, by the return annexed to this despatch, that the loss of men in the four battalions far exceeds that occurring in full peace in France.

There are only two vacancies in the four battalions. One by the death of Captain Nau of the Guienne regiment; the other by that of Lieutenant de la Fargeonniere of the Languedoc regiment, who was killed in the affair of Lake St. Sacrament.

Lieutenant de Sudriat of the regiment of Guienne proceeds to France by leave of the Marquis de Vaudreuil; he is dying of consumption. I have the honor to address you a Memoir for filling the vacancies created by the death of M. de Nau. I shall propose others to you for the remainder, at the close of the campaign.

I have communicated the despatch you have done me the honor to write me on occasion of the favors his Majesty has been pleased to bestow. The example of the pensions and crosses which you have had granted before the time, will redouble zeal and emulation. It must be allowed that expatriation and the fatigue merit a particular consideration.

Only two soldiers have as yet been married in the Colony, but there have been four officers. These have married respectably but do not increase their fortunes.

I have agreed with the Marquis de Vaudreuil that, as it is impossible to allow the extra pay of Colonial troops to all the soldiers that were drafted in France from the different Infantry regiments, the overplus should be given to us in preference, to recruit our battalions.

I have sent Chevalier de Montreuil his commission as Adjutant-General. I have no doubt of his application and zeal. I have sent M. Doreil to Quebec to receive our two battalions.

By our last advices from <sup>the</sup> Louisburg of the 23rd of April, they had at least ten months' provisions, and the two battalions were completed, having even some supernumeraries. According to a return transmitted by the Adjutant of the Burgundy, that battalion amounted on the 9th of April to 543, and had lost since the tenth of April, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, only thirty-two men, namely, twenty-eight dead, three discharged and one sent to the galleys. I have as yet seen no return of the situation of the Regiment of Artois.

The portion within brackets, is in cipher in the original. [The battalion of La Reine, with that of Languedoc, the Canadians and Indians, are encamped at Carillon. Chevalier de Levy will command at that post; the Canadians and Indians there amount to eight hundred. The Béarn battalion is going to Niagara; Guyenne with the battalion of La Sarre will encamp before Fort Frontenac with M. de Bourlamaque. The Indians and Canadians, numbering nearly one thousand men, [are] near Chouaguen at the head of the Bay of Niaux, between Forts Frontenac and Niagara. The destination of the Royal Roussillon battalion, as well as my own, will depend on the movements; it will not arrive at Montreal until the twentieth.

The navigation of Lake Ontario is most important; the English have three sloops with some three and five-pounders. They are building two which will, it is reported, be of twenty guns. We have four vessels, one of which carries twenty four-and six-pounders, and eighty men; the others have forty men and ten four-pounders.

From intelligence we have received from our prisoners, or Iroquois who being neutral visit the English, it appears certain that there is a camp at Orange, eight hundred men at Chouegen, three hundred at Fort Lidius, with two hundred bateaux on Lake St. Sacrament. M. de Vaudreuil believes that the English had twelve thousand men for our seven thousand, the remainder are in Acadia or Fort du Quesne, or on the works, or forwarding provisions. M. de Vaudreuil particularly respects the Indians, loves the Canadians, is acquainted with the country, has good sense but is somewhat weak, and I stand very well with him. He ought to have been supplied a month ago with provisions and artillery, but everything is behind. I urge that all be at Fort Frontenac, which is to be the dépôt for the siege of Choueguen, in sufficient season to make an impression on the enemy and commence the siege whenever the opportunity offers, or at least, this next spring.<sup>1</sup> M. Bigot's letters make me apprehend that the plan of operating this winter or earlier will be stopped by [the want of] provisions. M. de Vaudreuil has no fear for Quebec in any event. He has cruisers at the mouth of the River St. Lawrence.]

M. de Boishébert continues to occupy a small portion of Acadia. He has collected a number of Acadian families there with Father Germain, the Jesuit; they lie in the woods and harass the English.

The latest news from Fort du Quesne is to the 9th of May. No English movements of any importance yet in that quarter. Our Indians, together with some of our detachments, made many successful forays. Thirty scalps have been sent us, and the commissions of three officers of the English regiments raised in the country, who have been killed. The Upper country Indians carry off entire families, which obliges the English to construct several pretended forts; that is to say, to inclose a number of dwellings with stockades. Our Upper Indians appear well disposed towards us, notwithstanding the presents and solicitations of the English. M. Dumas, an officer of great distinction in the Colony, commands at Fort Duquesne and on the River Ohio. We have lost, in one detachment, Ensign Douville, of the Colonial troops.

We keep small parties of Indians out everywhere in the direction of Lake St. Sacrament and Choueguen, who frequently bring in prisoners and scalps. Recently, one of these parties fell, at the gates of Choueguen, upon a workshop full of carpenters, some twenty of whom they killed, and brought away five of them prisoners.

Of the six ships or frigates, la Sauvage, commanded by Chevalier de Tourville, is now on her departure; another frigate will remain to take the news of the campaign to France, and the rest will doubtless sail in succession. Le Leopard is condemned as unseaworthy. Her crew will reinforce those of Le Héros and l'Illustre, and serve to man a frigate built here, called l'Abenakis.

[I believe the ships and the two frigates have orders to go and capture Fort Beausejour, at the head of the Bay of Fundy; they will be supported from Acadia. Captain Beausier of le Héros will command the expedition. M. de Vaudreuil has not mentioned the matter to me; they might possibly sail in a month. It is to be seen whether the English will offer any opposition. It is no secret here.

Fort Duquesne is not worth a straw. A freshet nearly carried it off a short time ago. Chevalier de Levy and M. de Bourlamaque may exchange; but one will be always at the Camp of Fort Frontenac; the other at that on the Island of St. John.<sup>2</sup>]

I shall punctually inform you of everything as well as I am able. I annex to this despatch a return of the equipments and subsistences belonging to the officers and soldiers during the campaign, with some observations. I fancied you would be perhaps pleased to be acquainted with customs different from ours.

I am, with respect, my Lord, your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

<sup>1</sup> Je presse pour que tous soit au Fort de Frontenac qui sera le dépôt pour le siège de Chouegen, assi de le persuader aux ennemis et le faire si l'occasion se trouve ou au moins ce printemps. Text.

I have omitted to inform you that in this Colony, honors regulated by particular orders from his Majesty are paid to the Governor-General, the Bishop, the Intendant, and the Captains of Men of War. Baron de Dieskau at first made some objections to it. I think you will approve my not having offered any, and merely having demanded what has been allowed, that the guards at Quebec turn out for Colonel de Bourlamaque the same as for Captains of Ships, although that officer did not wish it, because the ordinance of the 25th of June, 1750, does not accord that honor to Colonels; but I thought it my duty to maintain the equality of that grade with that of ship captain.

The four officers of our battalion who have married last winter at Montreal are, Captain de Germain, of the regiment of La Reine; Captain de Marillac, of the regiment of Languedoc; Captains de Barotte and de Figuères, of the regiment of Béarn.

Advices have just arrived from Louisburg of nearly the same date as the preceding. There was nothing new. I have received a return of the condition of the regiment of Artois; it amounted to 547, by means of the 28 recruits which it needed, and the twenty-two supernumeraries. Its losses, since the 11th of April, 1755, to the 9th of April, 1756, were twenty-eight men, of whom two were discharged, one condemned to the galleys, one delivered up to justice, and 24 dead in the hospitals.

NOTE.—Some soldiers may have died in the detachments which spent the winter at Forts Frontenac, Niagara and Carillon, of whom no exact return has as yet been received on the 25th of May. 5 soldiers will, I believe, return to France, being entitled to admission into the Hotel Royal des Invalides on account of wounds.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Machault.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 12 June, 1756.

My Lord,

Although you have communication of the letters I write, I should consider myself wanting in my duty did I not have the honor to inform you directly of the arrival of the whole of the reinforcement, and of a portion of the recruits, with considerable provisions and ammunition.

I am waiting for Chevalier de Levis who arrived last, and then M. de Bourlamaque, who will proceed, the one to Frontenac, and the other to Carillon, which will be the two principal camps, convenient to Lediis and Chouegen, the two points where the English are beginning to collect. We are assured that they have few people there yet; though possessing more facilities for concentration than we, they must experience a part of our difficulties.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil wishes me not to leave Montreal until all the troops have passed through to their destination, and it is determined whether an offensive or defensive course shall be adopted. This plan appears to me regular. The Governor-General overwhelms me with politeness; I believe him to be satisfied with my conduct towards him, and I think it convinces him that general officers can be found in France who will study the public good under his orders, without pretension or finesse. He is acquainted with the country; possesses in his hands both authority and means; is at the head of business; he it is who must prescribe it; it is mine to relieve him of the details relative to our troops, in what regards discipline and the execution of his plans.

The article of discipline requires all of a general officer's attention, in a country where the soldier possesses too much money and has contagious examples before his eyes.

Our latest advices from the Beautiful river are of the ninth of May; there has not been, as yet, any movement of importance on the part of the enemy. Meanwhile, Pennsylvania and Virginia are really desolated. Letters found on officers who have been killed admit not a doubt of the alarm prevailing in that quarter where the inhabitants are not soldiers (guerriers). All the Indians generally appear to us very well affected, and I believe that the neutrality of the Five Nations can be depended on. This will be a great point; they are quite convenient to the English who shower caresses and presents on them.

Our regiments are very far from being complete. Their losses since [leaving] Brest up to the twenty-fifth of May, 1756, according to M. Doreil's return, amount to 118; of these 34 died on the passage.

27 were killed in the affair at Lake St. Sacrament.

57 died in the Canada hospitals.

Add to this number some few who may have died during the winter unknown to this Commissary, in the garrisons of the forts at a distance.

Our hospitals are admirable, and M. Doreil, who acquits himself very well of all his functions, bestows the greatest attention on an object of so much importance. He has appeared to me content with Sieur Arnoux, Surgeon-Major of Quebec, who acts as Surgeon-Major of the land forces. M. Doreil is at Quebec to receive La Sarre and Royal Roussillon, which are actually on the march. The delay of the two last ships has put two hundred and fifty of them on the sick list. I flatter myself that these will be soon recovered. With the return fleet some soldiers will be sent back who are entitled to admission into the Royal Hotel of Invalids. I believe they number five.

I hope that in spite of the distance at which I am, you will have the goodness not to forget one who has always reckoned on your kindness; who glories in his devotion to you and to all that bear your name, and who joins to these sentiments those of the respect with which I am,
My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. 17th Letters of the 14th of July,<sup>1</sup> state that the ship le Beauharnois, freighted on the King's account, having 150 recruits on board, was at the Island of Bic; consequently safe. She had left at the mouth of the Gulf four other vessels, which will arrive, as is to be presumed, without inconvenience.

M. de Montreuil to ———.

Montreal, 12th June, 1756.

I am very well satisfied with M. Montcalm. I shall accomplish impossibilities to deserve his confidence. I have spoken to him in the same terms that I did to M. Dieskaw, namely: Rely only on Regulars in an expedition, but on the Canadians and Indians to harass the enemy; send me to points of danger with your orders; do not expose yourself. M. de Vaudreuil is prejudiced against M. Doreil, the Commissary ordonnateur, and me, because he suspects we report to the Court what passes. I always continue my course, adopting every possible precaution; I continually pay my court to him. The Colonial officers do not like those of the regular army. It is incredible to what a degree luxury prevails in this country, and to what an extent the King is robbed in consequence of the bad administration of affairs. All the French who arrive here are shocked at the waste that is made. The Governor and Intendant are too easy and too remiss in a country where greater strictness is required than in any other. There is no police. The Canadian is independent, wicked, lying, braggart, well adapted for skirmishing, very brave behind a tree and very timid when not covered. I believe a defensive course will be adopted on both sides. M. Montcalm appears to me not to have any desire to attack the enemy. I believe he is right. In these countries a thousand men would keep three thousand of them in check. The enemy are, at least, three thousand stronger than we. I expect to leave in the course of July with M. Montcalm. I have received your two letters in duplicate and another in ordinary writing. I should be inconsolable were you to secretly disapprove of my conduct. You could not furnish a more certain proof of your friendship than to correct me when I am wrong. The detachment was morally certain of being wholly cut off had I returned to M. Dieskaw, whom I would have removed by force had I had four men with me, when he was wounded in both hips, but I was alone with him. I called two Canadians who were the only persons within hail of us;

one was killed near M. de Dieskaw and me, and the other was wounded. I also received a shot in the arm. I sent his servants to him when I was moving to the attack on the right; he sent them away after he had had his overcoat and vest laid beside him. It depended entirely on himself to retire after the first wound, which was slight, and I exhorted him to do so as much as I could. M. Dieskaw, 'tis said, is well. The three Commandants have arrived from France with the reinforcement. I will endeavor only to do right; I shall not confine myself to minutiae; no person is more devoted than I to his profession. This campaign will, I hope, afford me an opportunity to continue to deserve [your good opinion.] I have received a letter from Count d'Argenson full of kindness. I have had the honor to write him. No one can love you more strongly than I do. I embrace you thousands and thousands of times. I already stand very well with M. Montcalm. I shall commence the campaign with him in the course of July, and will so demean myself that he will be satisfied with me. He furnishes me considerably more occupation than M. Dieskaw did. I am never happier than when I have a great deal to do.

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 17th June, 1756.

My Lord,

Since my annexed letter of the 12th, Chevalier de Levis arrived yesterday, and I have just arranged with my Lord the Marquis de Vaudreuil that he should pass a few days at the camp at Carillon. That is the point where we shall have the greatest body of French troops together, and against which the English, perhaps, will direct their greatest efforts; for, until they have succeeded in acquiring a superiority in vessels on Lake Ontario, I consider them less formidable in the direction of Frontenac. As for myself, I expect to depart in the beginning of next month for the camp at Carillon, and after having remained there a fortnight or three weeks, according to the enemy's movements, I shall possibly go and terminate my campaign on the Frontenac and Niagara frontier. Should my Lord the Marquis de Vaudreuil authorize me to accomplish this plan, I shall view the different important points to be guarded, and the works erecting there; it is a matter of four hundred leagues, but 'tis fortunately traveled in canoe.

M. de Bourlamaque leaves here on Monday with the last companies of the regiment of La Sarre, for the camp at Frontenac.

Advices from the latter place, of the 12th, state that M. de Villiers, a Colonial officer commanding a corps of a thousand Canadians or Indians, had started on the 10th, with seven hundred men, to try and surprise three hundred English, who are occupied in constructing, or protecting those who are building, two vessels near Chouaguen. We cannot have any news of them before three days, and the courier who carries the despatches and the order for the sailing of the frigate, leaves to-night.

My Lord the Marquis de Vaudreuil has just had the politeness to communicate to me the despatches he transmits to you, in obedience to his instructions of this year to report to you the details relative to the French troops. I noticed that he remarked to you that he had had news of Baron de Dieskaw. I consider it my duty to add, that the last news he had received, of which he speaks, are of last November, and consequently of a date anterior to those which that general officer has communicated directly to yourself, by way of England. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has written, six weeks ago, to Colonel Jonson, inquiring about him. He has sent his letter by an Indian; he has not yet received any answer.

According to a letter from M. Doreil, of the eleventh, we had still in hospital one hundred and seventy-four sick, belonging to the regiments of La Sarre and Royal Roussillon. Eleven more had been admitted since their arrival. The greatest number of sick has been in le Léopard, on board of which our two companies of grenadiers were. There are a great many sick also among the crew of that vessel. Notwithstanding all I hear said, I believe that the officers of that vessel have paid as much attention as the others to good order and cleanliness; in my letter to the Keeper of the Seals,<sup>1</sup> I do not enter into any details, and have considered it my duty to congratulate myself on the attentions of all the captains of the ships towards our troops, without excepting Mr. Gaumin, the commander of le Léopard.

I am, respectfully,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient Servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. I learn by letters from Quebec, of the 14th, that le Beauharnois, with 154 recruits, was, on the 10th, within 30 leagues of that city, consequently safe. She left four other ships, with like freight on the King's account, at the entrance of the Gulf.

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

Montreal, 19th June, 1756.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to write you by way of Louisburg the 21st of May, and to send you, by Chevalier de Tourville, two letters dated 12th and 17th instants, containing all the details which it was my duty to communicate. I shall not delay transmitting the duplicates thereof by a surer conveyance than this, which is no other than a small merchantman on her return to France. All is now in a decided position. Though the troops which arrived last have a great many sick, the number is considerably diminished.

The brackets denote the portion in cipher in the original.

[The Béarn battalion is in camp at Niagara; the battalion of La Sarre and that of Guyenne at Fort Frontenac with M. de Bourlamaque; between Fort Frontenac and Niagara, one thousand Canadians and Indians. The battalions of La Reine and Languedoc are at Carillon with Chevalier de Levis. M. de Vaudreuil wishes to send his brother there to command the Canadians and Indians under Chevalier de Levis. The delay in the artillery and the provisions puts a stop, for the present, to all projects against Chouaguen.

M. de Vaudreuil appears not to renounce it for the fall. I apprehend the same obstacles. I fully share his confidence, which he never bestows on any person from France. He is well intentioned, but very irresolute. According to certain intelligence of the proceedings of the English, their troops will rendezvous at Chouaguen, Albany and near Lake St. Sacrament. I pray you observe, that I do not write to M. de Machault by this occasion.]

Four prisoners have been brought in this morning. One of them states that M. de Dieskaw was, two months ago, at Boston; that he has been transferred to New-York and was well.

I am, respectfully,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. Whilst I have the honor to write to you, I see two canoes of Indians on the point of arriving. They raise the Dead cry; I have just counted them. That wail announces to us that they have killed or captured eleven of the English.

Baron de Dieskau to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

New-York, 22 June, 1756.

My Lord,

I received, on the 15th of June, the letter you had the goodness to write me on the 17th of February, and I profit by the sailing of a ship for London, to have the honor of informing you that my wounds are beginning to assume a favorable appearance, as three of them are already healed, and only the fourth, which is serious, remains and still confines me, for the most of my time, to the bed, and permits me only to drag myself occasionally along my chamber, on crutches. I expect, however, according to the promises of surgeons, to be able, in two or three months hence, to profit by the departure of some vessels, if occasion offers, and to proceed to London, where I shall solicit permission to go to France.

I sent my Aide-de-Camp, Sieur de Bernier, to London, in February, in the hope that he might there obtain permission to repair to France, where I reckon on his arriving, and on his having rendered you an account, my Lord, of an engagement which might have covered me with glory, had treachery not interposed, as my plan could not fail, and the blow would have been decisive. Unfortunately for me, the result has not equaled my expectation; but I hope that on future occasions fortune will be more favorable, as I have great hopes that my wounds will not incapacitate me from continuing to serve his Majesty.

I doubt not but M. Bernier has reported likewise to you, my Lord, the infinite obligations I am under to Chevalier de Johnson, general of the English troops by whom I was taken prisoner, as had it not been for him I should have been assuredly burned at a slow fire by the Iroquois, who wished to oblige him to deliver me up to them to avenge the death of three of their chiefs killed in the action; the General declared it impossible, in order that I might escape so cruel a fate; to nothing but the attachment that Nation entertains towards him, do I owe my salvation, as it is certain, had these barbarians persisted in their sentiments, he would have been obliged to deliver me up, as they had threatened him with being abandoned by the whole Nation, did he not give it satisfaction. The General has pushed his attention so far, that he had me always guarded by a detachment of 50 men as long as I remained in his camp. Yet all these precautions did not prevent one of them entering my tent, sword in hand, on the morning following, to dispart me; but an English officer, happening there by chance, threw himself before me, calling on the guard at the same time for assistance; this obliged Chevalier de Johnson to have me removed to Orange, notwithstanding the bad state of my health.

I beg you, my Lord, always to continue to me your favors, and the honor of your protection.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Baron de DIESKAU.

Abstract of Despatches from Canada.

FORT DUQUESNE.

Letters of the 23<sup>d</sup> March assure us that the French and Indians have, since Admiral Braddock's defeat, disposed of more than 700 people in the Provinces of Pennsylvania, Virginia and Carolina, including those killed and those taken prisoners.

The Delawares and Chouanons, Indian Nations of the Beautiful river, some of whose chiefs have been put to a cruel death by the English, to whom they had gone on an embassy, are enraged to an extraordinary degree, and would not make any prisoners were it not for the continual recommendations of the Commandants to commit as few murders as possible. Independent of this, those two Nations have not ceased sending Belts among all the Nations since the close of summer and of the fall, inviting them to come and avenge the insult done them by the English; this invitation has been accepted, and caused all those Nations to chant the war during the whole of the winter.

In April, there had been in those parts twenty detachments of Delawares and Chouanons; these were joined by more than sixty Indians of the Five Iroquois Nations who have committed frightful ravages. The only resource remaining to the inhabitants was to abandon their houses, and to remove to the seacoast. Three forts have been burnt, among the rest one containing a garrison of forty-seven men, which was besieged by a party of 40 Indians under the command of M. Douville, a Colonial cadet. The garrison was summoned to surrender, but having refused, the fort was set on fire in the night; the garrison then attempted to escape, and the Indians gave no quarter. M. Douville lost his life on that occasion.<sup>1</sup>

We have now on the Continent one thousand French, seven hundred Delawares and Chouanons, besides a number of Illinois, as many as three hundred French and Indians, under the command of Sieur de Villiers, about 250 Miamis and Outaganons, under M. de Belestre, 300 from Detroit and 700 from Michilimakinac, commanded by Chevalier de Repentigny, d'Anglede and Hebert, Junior, amounting to 3,250 men. [We are] expecting to hear whether M. Beaubassin, Commandant at the Point, will have brought the Sauteurs belonging to his post; we shall soon learn the exploits of these Nations.

M. Dumas, a Colonial Captain, and Commandant of Fort Duquesne, had his eye on Fort Cumberland, which is a vast dépôt belonging to the English to enable them to reach the Beautiful river; it is situate at the foot of the mountains, about 70 leagues from the sea and 80 from Fort Duquesne.

July, 1756, carried to the King.

Letters received from Canada by the frigate la Sauvage, and dated the first days of June, contain the following details respecting what occurred in the different parts of the Colony since the last despatches from M. de Vaudreuil, Governor-General, dated last February.

Detachments have been continually in the field, in all directions, against the English Colonies.

M. de Vaudreuil had stated that the mildness of the winter, in the heart of the Colony, had prevented those parties being as numerous as they might have been, had there been snow and ice, as usual, in the country.

BEAUTIFUL RIVER.

Quite an untoward revolution has been experienced in the direction of the Beautiful river. The winter there is always very mild; this year it has been exceedingly cold; and as the Indians of that quarter are not in the habit of walking on snow shoes, and still less of going to the enemy when the latter can track them in the snow, Captain Dumas, Commandant at Fort Duquesne, has not been able to have them out as frequently as he desired. Nevertheless, he has continually kept parties in the field, both in Virginia and Pennsylvania, and has placed officers and cadets at the head of some of them.

M. de Vaudreuil does not enumerate the scalps they have brought in, nor the prisoners they have taken, but it appears that the number of the one and the other has been considerable; that they have destroyed whole families; that several villages on the frontiers of the two Colonies have been abandoned by their inhabitants, who have removed into the towns; that a great many houses and a number of barns filled with grain have been burnt in the country; that a considerable amount of cattle has been killed; that some of the little forts, whereof the English have formed, as it were, a chain along the frontiers, have been attacked and burnt, and that a great many people had perished in the flames, and that we have not, so to speak, experienced any losses in all those forays.

Ensign Douville is the only officer killed; he fell in an attack on a little fort which he was on the point of carrying.<sup>1</sup>

From what Sieur Dumas had written him, and from what M. de V. had heard of the enemy's plans from other quarters, it does not appear that they designed marching, this year, in that direction. M. de Vaudreuil adopted all possible measures to enable M. Dumas to make a good defence. He has sent him an abundant supply of all sorts of ammunition, by a detachment of three hundred Canadians who, with the garrison and the Detroit Militia that will be near enough to go to his assistance, will compose a force of twelve to fifteen hundred men, exclusive of the Indians, who are quite numerous. M. Dumas proposes to harass the enemy by trying to oblige them to keep on the defensive. But whenever advised of their marching against him, he is to call his forces together again in order to proceed to meet them, as, in the present state of the fort, it would be impossible to make any resistance for any length of time, were he to allow himself to be besieged in it.

But in case he will succeed in keeping the enemy at home, he is to send a party of his Indians to reinforce the posts of Niagara and Frontenac. He will always have enough of them to keep detachments in the field. On the one hand, the village of Delawares, domiciliated among the English, who, according to M. de Vaudreuil's despatches of February, were to remove over to us, has executed that project, and made a vigorous attack on the English when leaving them; and on the other hand, M. de Vaudreuil has entered into a negotiation with the Flatheads, a numerous Nation, in alliance with the English, who promised to abandon the latter, provided peace were established between themselves and our Nations in the Upper countries. M. de Vaudreuil expects to accomplish this at an early day.

M. Dumas has, meanwhile, advised him that some Indians of the Beautiful river appeared to be relaxing in their zeal, but M. de Vaudreuil had no doubt of their soon resuming their original ardor.

As for the rest, quite a considerable quantity of shell, shot and bullets has been again discovered this winter, which had been secreted in the woods on General Braddock's defeat. The whole has been removed to Fort Duquesne.

THE LAKES.

It is in the direction of the Lakes that the enemy apparently are to move all their forces for the purpose of attacking Forts Niagara and Frontenac on Lake Ontario, and Fort St. Frederic on Lake Champlain.

And by a letter dated Quebec, the twenty-third of June, which is later than those written by M. de Vaudreuil from Montreal, the Intendant of the Colony states, in substance, that he had just learned that M. de Vaudreuil had been informed of the march of an army of 10 m. English to attack Fort St. Frederic.

M. de Vaudreuil has written, in February, that in order to defend that fort, he was busy fortifying the post of Carillon, between it and Lake St. Sacrament, whereof he had caused occupation to be taken after M. Dieskaw's affair, and that already twelve pieces of cannon of various calibre, and eight swivels, have been placed in battery there, with four small grenade mortars. Since then he had had conveyed thither eight other guns, two of which were eighteens and the remainder twelves, eights and fours. That post is, moreover, supplied with all sorts of provisions.

Since the close of May, two thousand men were stationed there; to wit: La Reine and Languedoc battalions, and the remainder Colonial troops, Canadians and Indians. And the Intendant advises, that M. de Vaudreuil had, on hearing of the enemy's march, sent thither the Royal Rousillon battalion, some companies of Colonials, and some Militia detachments.

In order to render the attempt of the enemy against Fort St. Frederic still more difficult, M. de Vaudreuil had taken possession of the Little Carrying place of Lake St. Sacrament, an important post, which he has secured by a strong intrenchment, very well situated, and flanked by two bastions, and containing six hundred and seventy men. He has, moreover, established a post between Fort Carillon and this intrenchment, to facilitate, in case of necessity, the retreat of the camp of the Carrying place, and to keep it open for the transportation of stores.

M. de Vaudreuil was attending at the same time to keeping parties in the field, so as to be informed of all the enemy's manœuvres, and he had even sent out some pretty considerable detachments to intercept their convoys.

Previous to the news mentioned by the Intendant, Chevalier de Levis was to be sent to Carillon. But according to what M. de Vaudreuil and M. Moncalm have written, it is probable the latter will, on that intelligence, have been to take the command of that canton.

In regard to Forts Niagara and Frontenac, M. de Vaudreuil had reported that they were in a bad condition.

People had been to work at Niagara since last fall, and had erected a fort there with which M. de Montcalm, who has seen the plan, is well satisfied.

It consists of a hornwork with ravelins, a covert-way, and lunettes at the places of arms reëntering from the covert-way.

Men were employed on the works deemed necessary at Frontenac.

M. de Vaudreuil had sent the Béarn battalion to Niagara; this, added to the garrison already there, made a corps of six hundred men, which is sufficient for a respectable resistance.

For Frontenac he had designed the Guyenne battalion, which had arrived there at the end of May, and the battalion of La Sarre, which had set out in the beginning of June. And the Government had adopted measures for the conveyance of succors to these two posts according to circumstances.

He was, in addition, occupied during the winter in harassing the enemy in that direction also; and, according to his report, a great many of the English have been killed, both in New-York and even in the vicinity of Chouaguen.

In order to profit by the advantage which the detachment commanded by Sieur de Léry had had in the month of March, when it destroyed Fort Bull with the stores the enemy had erected there, he dispatched another party of nine hundred men, consisting of Colonial troops, Canadians and Indians, under the command of Captain de Villiers, towards Chouaguen. This officer has orders to post himself wherever he shall consider most advantageous, so as to be in a position to attack the English either at that carrying place, or on the river by which they pass on their way to Chouëguen. He is authorized to make such manœuvres and expeditions as circumstances and the enemy's situation will permit, provided they tend to weaken Chouëguen and to destroy the enemy's preparations against Niagara and Frontenac.

The Commandants of these two posts, and of others in the neighborhood, have orders to communicate with him, and even to send him some Indians.

He is not to retire from the enemy's territory as long as it shall be possible for him to maintain himself there, and if, notwithstanding all the obstacles it will be in his power to offer to the arrangements of the English, they succeed in collecting their forces together, to march against one or the other of those forts, he is to proceed with his detachment to that which will be menaced, and establish a camp of observation at such place as will seem to him best adapted to prevent their landing.

The four vessels that have been constructed on Lake Ontario are all armed and afloat; they will be able to face those the English have built at Chouëguen, which had not as yet made their appearance.

M. de Vaudreuil observes that all those precautions which tend to the defence of Niagara and Frontenac will also contribute to the attack on Chouëguen.

He does not lose sight of that object; he will be in a condition to undertake it whenever an opportunity presents, unless he find means to reduce it by famine; for which he has also projected his arrangements.

ACADIA AND NEW ENGLAND.

Since the report rendered by M. de Vaudreuil in the month of February last of the movements which took place on the frontiers of Acadia and New England, our Indians have surprised and captured an English schooner, whilst riding at anchor in the Bay of Fundy, carrying six guns and a crew of ten men, and freighted with provisions for Port Royal.

Sieur de Boishébert, Commandant of the River St. John, had burnt in Bay Verte a vessel of two hundred tons burthen, which the English were building there, and a schooner at anchor in the same place.

Seven Englishmen were killed and one taken prisoner in that expedition.

On the eighth of February an English vessel entered the mouth of the River St. John; she showed French signals and sent her boat ashore for a pilot, saying that she was returning from Louisbourg with provisions.

An Acadian was foolish enough to go on board; but he had no sooner put his foot on deck than the Captain hoisted his colors, and discharged his guns on the Acadians who were on the shore, after which he entered the harbor, but the Acadians lay in ambush and kept up such a brisk fire of musketry as to oblige him to return to Port Royal.

The English having taken, and forcibly embarked, thirty-six Acadian families at Port Royal, numbering two hundred and twenty-six persons, to carry them to Carolina, these Canadians revolted, and having rendered themselves masters of the ship, carried her into the River St. John, on the twelfth of February.

A special report will be made of this exploit, because the Captain of the vessel pretends that he is a Portuguese.

The Indians have made incursions, also, into New England, where they have taken a considerable number of scalps, burned barns filled with grain, plundered the inhabitants and killed a large quantity of cattle.

The settlers on these frontiers have been so intimidated that a party of Indians who returned thence on the eleventh of June, have reported that they had not yet dared to begin their sowing.

The English, on their side, have had several parties in the field against us.

They have burned three barns in the neighborhood of Fort St. Frederic; killed a Sergeant of La Reine near Fort Carillon and a militiaman; captured a Cadet belonging to the regulars and a farmer. To this is reduced all their success.

M. de Vaudreuil states, in general, that all the Indian Nations continue well disposed towards us, notwithstanding all the manœuvres of the English.

The five Iroquois Nations also continue their friendly demonstrations, but the English have partizans among them.

M. de Vaudreuil is of opinion that they will remain neutral. He announced to them that he would leave them at liberty to declare for the English, but if contrary to the protestations they had made him, any Iroquois should be found in their ranks, he will let loose all the other Indians on them.<sup>1</sup>

He has, in fact, ordered Sieur de Villiers to act so, should there be any Iroquois among the enemy's detachments that he will fall in with.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 5th July, 1756.

My Lord,

The English vessels have made their appearance repeatedly on Lake Ontario; ours engaged in transportation to Niagara have not been able to give them chase. Nevertheless, on the 26th of June, our two barks, returning from Niagara, discovered, opposite the Bay of Quintie, something approaching. We gave chase, all sails set, but the enemy sheered off. He was pursued so closely that he was obliged to abandon a sloop, which was his third craft. We left this to our two barks; our two cruisers continued in pursuit of the enemy, who, seeing himself approached, cut his boat loose, and threw a number of other articles overboard. In vain we fired our chasers at him; he made no response, being occupied exclusively in hastening his retreat, and the wind having lulled, he gained on our cruisers in consequence of the quantity of sail he carried. After having chased him quite close to Chouaguen, we tacked in order to overhaul the craft our two barks had missed. She struck at once. This prize is about 20 tons, carrying 6 swivels, 12 muskets, 6 sailors and 8 soldiers.

On the 25th of June, as our two cruisers were luffing between the Islands of Couis and those of the Galops, one of them being near the Bay of Niagara,<sup>2</sup> got intelligence of a schooner returning to Chouaguen. He gave chase, and found himself doubling a point quite close on Chouaguen. The schooner had time to enter the river, were it not for which she would not have escaped.

This, my Lord, comprises the movements and exploits of our little navy, on Lake Ontario, up to the present time.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Recent Victory of the French over the English.

General Detail of the recent Victory gained in Canada, by the French, over the English army, on the 18th of July, 1756, in the attack on the outer and advanced works of the town of Manton, the capital of Canada, belonging to the English, and besieged by the French under M. de Vaudreuil, Commander-in-Chief and Major-General of the Naval and Land forces in that country.

M. de Vaudreuil, the General-in-Chief, and M. de Léry, the second in command, having reduced the Island and the forts of Bull, deemed it proper to carry their victorious arms farther, with the design to capture the Island of Manton, before which they arrived after having been joined by eight hundred and fifty Indians and eleven hundred and forty Canadian soldiers, exclusive of the detachment which lately came from Marseilles and Toulon, making in all an army of eight thousand men, including the Regulars.

The towns in that country are not fortified like those here, for the most of the fortifications are made up only of small ramparts, bastions, horseshoes, little redoubts and ravelins; therefore it was not long before all the outer works were carried.

16th July. M. de Vaudreuil caused the Governor, five times consecutively, to be summoned to surrender, threatening him, in case he refused, not to grant any quarter either to him or his garrison. But having answered that he was resolved to defend himself to the last, our Commander ordered a general assault for the following morning. And it was the fine Royal Scotch regiment that was the first to scale the walls, between 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning, followed by one hundred and sixty Canadians and three hundred Indians, who, on entering the town, seized the Governor and hung him over the breach. The garrison was put to the sword and all the inhabitants were slaughtered and burned. Thus it was that the town was captured after a siege of three weeks.

Of all the forts on that island, one only, called Jerabelle, was approached in form, and it has been carried at the end of nine days. The garrison shared the fate of that of the town of Manton.

As this place was the magazine of almost the entire country belonging to the English, a prodigious quantity of munitions of war and provisions were found there, viz: two hundred and four brass guns fit for service, twelve spiked and thirty iron pieces for the vessels; seventy-six mortars, three unserviceable; twenty-nine thousand seven hundred balls; twenty-three thousand shell; five thousand four hundred and seventy-eight barrels of powder; four hundred and forty-four thousand six hundred and seventy-nine muskets fit for use; four hundred and sixty-six unserviceable, and provisions for three years.

We have had four officers killed and twenty-six wounded in this expedition; sixty-seven soldiers are dead and one hundred and one wounded, including Frenchmen, Canadians and Indians. M<sup>r</sup> de Léry is Governor until the appointment of another by the King.

This account is conformable with the despatch which the M. de Vaudreuil's Principal Secretary has had the honor to write to the King from Manton, the twentieth of July, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six.

Although it is excessively hot in that country, our Frenchmen are well pleased with it, and in this connection it will not be irrelevant to give a brief description of the place.

It consists of two islands formed by two sand banks of a square form. The first is more than three or four hundred leagues in circumference, and is entered by an arm of the sea of about four leagues. Here stands the town of Manton. Though not very large it is pretty handsome, and its harbor, though only two hundred and thirty-three toises in circumference, is capable of receiving all sorts of goods. Wheat is scarce in that country, and insufficient for the support of all its inhabitants; but as an offset, it possesses abundance of sugar-cane and wild grapes; the vine twines around elm trees, and it takes three men's arms to span it at the base. Quantities of oranges and lemons grow there also.

In regard to the other island it only consists of forests, and has a population of not quite four thousand, including the towns and forts. All the trees there bear fruit, such as pepper, cloves, coffee, nutmegs, oranges, cotton, &c., which the people barter with French and other European merchants.

Names and Rank of the Officers killed at the siege of Fort St. Philip,<sup>1</sup> in the attack of the 27th and 28th June, 1756, according to the order of the regiments and companies, as sent to the King.

Regiment of Brittany: M. de St. Alby, Captain of grenadiers, and M. Duperier, Lieutenant.

Regiment of Vermandois: Captain de Kejan and Lieutenant de Charmont.

Regiment of Royal Artillery: Captain Dupinay and Lieutenant Dutore.

Regiment of Medoc: Sub-Lieutenant Gerard.

Royal Comtois Regiment: Captain Desartre and Sub-Lieutenant Dusard, both of the grenadiers.

Regiment of Cumbis: Captain Pigius of the grenadiers.

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 20th July, 1756.

My Lord,

I had the honor to write to you on the 26th of March last [on] my departure with Chevalier de Levis for the camp at Carillon. I remained there from the 3rd, the day of our arrival, until the 16th. I left there by order of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and arrived yesterday at Montreal, having traveled night and day, and I start to-morrow to repair as quick as possible to Frontenac.

I was not unoccupied the fifteen days I remained at the camp; ambulances in a horrible condition; provisions, to wit, the article of bread, bad; the works of Fort Carillon, begun last year, very little advanced; a number of necessities wanting in the store; order to be introduced everywhere; reconnoissance of the locality, of the passes through which the enemy can come, and the arrangements for the defence of that frontier, which is always supposed to be threatened.

The southwest winds, which have almost constantly prevailed this year, had contributed to delay the transmission of everything that was wanting. The presence of M. Bigot, who repaired to Montreal, has essentially aided me in restoring order to matters so necessary to the men's lives. No person could employ more activity and expedition in his labors than this Intendant. Sickness was increasing, especially among the Militia. Sieur Arnoulx, Surgeon-Major of our troops, whom I took with me and brought back, is very zealous, and has been very useful to me in what regards the hospitals.

The fort commenced last year, cannot, before a month at soonest, be in a condition to risk a garrison in it, in case of an untoward event. And moreover, it is necessary to use the same activity that I introduced there during my fortnight. That fort consists of pieces of timber in layers, bound together with traverses, the interstices filled in with earth. Such construction is proof against cannon, and in that respect is as good as masonry, and much better than earthen works; but it is not durable. The site of the fort is well adapted as a first line at the head of Lake Champlain. I should have wished it to be somewhat larger, capable of containing five hundred men, whereas it can accommodate, at most, only three hundred.

To understand the ground, I took two long walks afoot with Chevalier de Levis. I am indebted to him for a third, which was necessary to acquire a knowledge of a part called the Mohawk road, of which every one speaks without being acquainted with it. He has been sleeping three days in the woods au Bivak. I do not believe there are many superior officers in Europe who are obliged to make such journeys afoot. It would be impossible for me, my Lord, to speak too highly of him to you; without possessing much genius, he has considerable practical knowledge, good sense, is quick-sighted, and though I had served with him, I could not have believed that he had so much readiness. He has derived profit from his campaigns. Though I write you somewhat [fully] I would not do so with the same frankness to M. de Mirepoix.<sup>1</sup> His present position does not fail to be difficult. I left him fully aware of it as well as of his resources. It may be delicate if we have to contend against an enemy aware of their advantages, and able to attack him with a very superior force. I wished he had at least 3000 good men, exclusive of the Indians who come and go. I left him only 2000, fourteen or fifteen hundred of whom are Regulars or Marine forces; the remainder, Militia. About 400 recruits, soldiers or Militiamen are on the march to join him. I urge M. de Vaudreuil to augment them still further.

During my sojourn at the Camp at Carillon, we had, as usual, some parties of Indians and Canadians detached, rather to observe the enemy's movements than to make any attack. Nevertheless one of these parties brought in 7 prisoners and 6 scalps. An English detachment captured two little bateaux belonging to us, and eight men, at the mouth of Otter creek, in Lake Champlain. 'Tis fortunate they did not take any more, for it was not until after that event that we began to see the necessity of using a little more precaution with our convoys. And the Marquis de Vaudreuil has approved of the orders I issued on that occasion, and of my having dispatched a detachment to reconnoitre the whole of that part of Otter creek, to examine whether the English were not designing to form some settlement there.

The object which has recalled me to Montreal so soon, and causes my departure for Frontenac, is a project that appears to me sufficiently military, if all the details be well combined, and I leave without being either assured or convinced of that. It is proposed to proceed with the three battalions of La Sarre, Guyenne and Bearn, stationed at Frontenac and Niagara, and some Canadians who are on shore in the vicinity of Chouaguen, to attempt the siege of that place, or at least, to make a diversion. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has issued, during my absence, several orders relative to this expedition, the success of which is of the greatest importance. Our Engineers are to reconnoitre the place, and to be prepared to report to me thereupon when I arrive. The Commander of the artillery precedes me some days, as well as M. Rigaud de Vaudreuil, brother of the Governor-General, who takes up some Marines, Canadians and Indians to cover, with M. de Villiers' corps, my camp of observation, should I lay siege to the place. I have no need of enlarging on all the difficulties of this expedition, which is, in fact, undertaken only on the supposition that the enemy has but 1000 men there, and that this movement must withdraw a portion of the force which threatens Carillon. I cannot reach Frontenac before the first of August; it is 80 leagues from here. In order to be successful, we would require secrecy and celerity, which are not the virtues of the Colony. You may be assured, my Lord, that I readily yield to this project; and that I count myself as nothing on an occasion of so much interest, and which has appeared to me quite pregnant with obstacles to be surmounted. Increased diligence on the part of the enemy may oblige me, on my arrival at Frontenac, to renounce this grand project, but we shall have made a diversion.

We have had two or three advantages in that quarter in the course of this month. M. de Villiers, a Colonial captain, has incommoded by his musketry some sloops which would attempt a landing; surprised a party of thirteen men, six of whom are prisoners, and seven killed. The same M. de Villiers has attacked three or four hundred bateaux, each having on board three men, who were returning after having carried provisions, ammunition and cannon for the new sloops the English were building there. He has routed them, and, 'tis reported, killed four hundred men; 26 scalps and 50 prisoners have been secured. This advantage would have been more considerable had it not been for the precipitancy of the Indians, who commenced the attack too soon. Some time previous to that affair there had been a naval skirmish on Lake Ontario. Our armed sloops have met those of the English, given them chase and captured a boat with sixteen men and some swivels.

Sickness diminishes in the two regiments of La Sarre and Royal Rousillon. M. de Berval, brother of Madam de Blot, and M. de Romayniac, sous Lieutenant of the grenadiers of La Sarre, are dead.

Our incorporated soldiers conduct themselves very well in their regiments, since the example of which I had the honor to render you an account in my preceding, which went with our two vessels and frigates. I doubt whether the expedition has taken place, which it was wished they would attempt in the direction of Acadia, and I have had the honor to mention to you in my despatch of the 12th of June. I believe some changes will occur in the orders issued on that occasion; besides, they were conditional and I am not in the secret.

I have left Major-General<sup>1</sup> Chevalier de Montreuil at Carillon. That has been of service to me in letting it be supposed that I should return soon, and in preventing our domiciliated Indians from following me. They are necessary at Carillon, and I shall have, where I am going, those of the Upper country; M. de Montreuil having served during the last campaign only in that quarter, may be of use to Chevalier de Levis, if need be. Should M. Péan, Colonial Adjutant, go thither, as I expect, a difficulty would arise with our Adjutants to determine who should have the detail of the camp. I am very glad to avoid it, though I believe it ill founded. The presence of the Adjutant-General has decided it, and where I go, I shall find two Adjutants who are very minute, those of Guienne and of Béarn; M. de la Pauze and M. Malartic.

M. Doreil has returned here. He gave himself considerable trouble at Quebec and Montreal about the sick; our hospitals are admirable; as regards those attached to our camps, 'tis a department he could not superintend.

I have the honor to be with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 8th of August, 1756.

My Lord,

I have the honor to report to you what has occurred at Fort Du Quesne since my despatch of the 10th of June.

Five deserters from Fort Cumberland arrived at Fort Du Quesne.

A detachment under the command of Sieur de Celoron de Blainville, fell in with some of the enemy's scouts at this side of Fort Cumberland. These two parties met unexpectedly and fired point blank; the enemy immediately fell back; we killed three of them whose scalps have been carried off by the Indians, but we lost Sieur de Blainville, one Huron, one Delaware and one Onondaga.

5 Chaouanons had had a similar adventure a little nearer Fort Cumberland. They scalped 3 English. One of their men was killed.

A party from different tribes having divided, returned in squads with a number of scalps.

Sieur de Rocheblave with another Cadet, a corporal, a militiaman and 20 Chaouanons. knocked at the gate of a small fort, 3 leagues beyond Fort Cumberland, where there remained some families and 30 Militia. He killed 4 Englishmen, whom the Indians scalped, wounded 3, who dragged themselves into the fort, and took 3 prisoners.

M. de Montisambert could not approach Fort George's Crown as near as had been recommended to him, because he had only 7 Frenchmen and 20 Indians. He attacked the settlements, after which he mastered a little fort, burnt it, and returned with 18 prisoners and 5 scalps.

Some Indian parties have taken 11 prisoners and scalps in the rear of that fort, and in Pensilvania have destroyed a great many cattle and burnt many settlements.

The domiciliated Mississagués of Presqu'isle have been out to the number of 10 against the English. They have taken one prisoner and two scalps, and gave them to cover the death of M. de St. Pierre.

Another party that had been out to avenge said M. de St. Pierre's death, has returned with two scalps and 5 prisoners.

A detachment under the command of M. de Celoron had a fight near Cresap's fort,<sup>1</sup> in the rear of Cumberland; killed 8 Englishmen whose scalps the Indians were not able to secure, finding themselves in the dusk of the evening under the musketry of the fort. We have had two Indians killed and one wounded.

Finally, M. Dumas writes me that he has been occupied for more than eight days merely in receiving scalps; that there is not an English party but loses some men, and that it was out of his power to render me an exact report of all the attacks our Indians made.

M. Duplaisis, Commandant at Niagara, has sent M. Dumas the message he had received from the Delawares who are settled near the Five Nations. M. Dumas advises me that such of these Delawares as are in his vicinity give him daily assurances that all their villages will remove this fall. This will make an addition of more than 500 new inhabitants to the Beautiful river, exclusive of those who will go from the neighborhood of Niagara.

All the Loups who have withdrawn from the English, are located near M. de la Chauvignerie; those farthest off are only 10 leagues from him.

That officer has informed them of the massacre committed by the English on 3 villages of their brethren settled near Orange. They told him it was very true, but that the English would pay dearly for it.

In regard to the Flatheads, M. Dumas follows, point by point, everything I had prescribed to him. He has profited by the sojourn of the Upper Nations to speak to them on my part. He has treated this affair with the policy necessary to determine the chiefs to conform to my intentions, but those tribes have made answer to him that having left their village with my axe, every other matter must surcease; and that they could think only of making war on the English. M. Dumas has sent a Belt to the Chaouanons, to be given in my name to the Flatheads, whom they are expecting to see, to induce them to come to Fort Duquesne. If that message succeed, I do not despair of entire success.

The Iroquois of the vicinity of Fort Duquesne have almost all retired to M. de la Chauvignerie, at the mouth of the River au Bœuf, on a Belt from the Five Nations. M. Dumas is very glad to be rid of them. His affairs will only improve as soon as he thoroughly understands the dispositions of the Delawares and Chaouanons towards them. He will render me an account thereof; the former appear to think as I desire, but the one and the other require to be better sounded.

Those of Kanaouagon<sup>1</sup> have altered their minds; a dispute among themselves has determined them to remain at their old village, rather than to go settle near M. de la Chauvignerie.

M. Dumas had received the provisions which he had demanded from the Illinois; they were not in as great a quantity as I should have desired.

I knew that the route from the Illinois to Fort Duquesne was as fine as could be desired. Chevalier de Villiers, who commanded the escort of those provisions, came up as far as Fort Duquesne with a bateau of 18 thousand weight. This little convoy makes known to this Colony a sure communication with the Illinois, whence I can derive succor in provisions and men, sooner and more easily than from the heart of this Colony.

M. de Villiers' report shows more strongly than ever the necessity of erecting a fort at the Fall,<sup>2</sup> to secure that communication. In my opinion, my Lord, that work ought not be deferred and ought to be of solid masonry. Our neighbors are going to work in such a manner as to make us bethink ourselves of it; we require only some good posts. I made, in 1746, the like representations to the Court, which authorized me to have that fort erected; but its execution was neglected owing to circumstances, and since then there has not been any further question of it.

M. de Villiers has brought with him one Illinois chief and four warriors; he made them smoke with the Chaouanons. The peace between these two nations will be lasting; the Chaouanons appear disposed to send one of their chiefs with M. de Villiers to completely cement it.

These Illinois return home much displeased at having made about 20 days' journey, with M. de Villiers, without having met with any opportunity of striking a blow. I doubt not but they will invite the Missouri, next spring, to join them in an expedition against the enemy.

M. Dumas has likewise caused peace to be concluded between the Illinois, the Nations of the Bay, the Saulteux and Pouteouatamis.

He has sent me two young warriors, Chaouanons, who are attached to him. They have assured me, on the part of their chiefs and their entire Nation, of the pleasure they experienced at seeing me; that from the first moment they had learned my arrival, they had wholly declared for the French; that they have given me proofs thereof in the battle we gave the army of General Braddock; that they were resolved never to quit the French, and to die with them. I have warmly received these Chaouanons. The welcome I have given them will not fail to excite the envy of the other Indians of the Beautiful river to follow the same route. I am sending them back.

According to certain prisoners and deserters, and also our scouts:

The enemy is not announcing any early movement on the Beautiful river. Our continual incursions have placed it out of the power of Virginia not only to undertake anything without, but even to construct any fort to protect herself.

The garrison of Fort Cumberland is not paid; it is greatly diminished by sickness, which has prevailed there all winter and still continues.

On the 5th of June the grass was growing in the roads communicating with Cumberland. Expresses no longer came any farther than Winchester,<sup>1</sup> on account of our Indians, who are always in the field.

Not a grain of Indian corn has been planted between that post and Kanéghuigik,<sup>2</sup> 25 leagues distant from it towards the sea.

The entire frontier of the three Provinces is in the like condition.

It was thought that Fort Cumberland would be soon abandoned; more than three months have elapsed since a wagon or bateau had come there.

The English are in daily dread of being attacked. They have scouts out to be informed of our march; have dug a ditch to bury their cannon, and propose blowing up Fort Cumberland and retiring. This news is of the close of June.

Other scouts and prisoners have reported to me:

That the provinces of Pennsylvania and Mariland were reassembling and uniting their forces.

That first, 3000 men, under the command of General Loudoun, were to march, after the harvest, to attack Fort Duquesne. This report is contradicted by the last prisoners taken on Lake St. Sacrament, who unanimously state that Lord Loudoun is to command the army designed to besiege Carillon.

Although the greatest portion of the Upper Nations have returned, through fear of the small-pox that prevailed at Niagara and subsequently at Prequ'Isle, which they have been equally apprehensive of catching at Fort Duquesne, M. Dumas' force consists, nevertheless, of 810 men; and if the enemy was really marching against him, he could soon have raised the Indians of the Beautiful river, who are better disposed, by means of whom he would be enabled to prevent the former making any progress.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 13 August, 1756.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to report to you the pains I had taken to secure the Five Nations.

The Senecas came to Niagara to receive my answer to the message they had entrusted to M. Duplaisis. He has postponed speaking to them, having no news of the Cayugas, Onondagas and Oneidas. These Senecas have told him that the Iroquois would join them, and that they had not yet decided what side they should take. They have hesitated to receive my answers, saying that they were at Niagara only under the auspices of the Cayugas. Finally, the Cayugas arrived. M. Duplaisis answered them agreeably to my orders. They knew not what to say.

They disapproved of the Onondagas and Oneidas; said that the former had promised to open a road by Oneida to the English, to enable the latter to ride their supplies to the forts they had erected. They allowed him to perceive that the Onondagas, Oneidas and Tuscarorins had accepted the hatchet from the English.

They likewise told M. Duplessis that Colonel Johnson was refusing the Indians nothing, not even money, in order to gain them over.

These Senecas and Cayugas have assured M. Duplaisis that they would remain perfectly neutral. The Cayugas have added, that they would never consent that the English should construct forts in their country; that they will be always attached to the French and will not trouble themselves except with good business.

M. Duplessis pressed them warmly to revenge the blows which the English struck on their nephews, the Delawares.

I never flattered myself with determining the mass of the 5 Nations to make war on the English. I endeavored to divide them and to seize every opportunity to make them strike the others.

A party of Senecas, sent by M. Duplessis to the River Chouaguen, remained there 3 days waiting for its opportunity; saw a number of loaded bateaux pass; attacked one that was astern, defeated it and returned with 3 scalps.

The Senecas have made several attacks; they even have some English prisoners in their village, whom they have made use of to replace their dead.

M. de la Chauvignerie has formed a party of 29 Senecas, Cayugas and Onondagas, among whom are some belonging to the Grand village. He has sent them to M. Dumas who will not fail to make them strike.

The Onondagas and Oneidas have sent me 80 deputies, who arrived here whilst the Marquis of Montcalm was on his way with the expedition against Chouaguen; they expressed to me the pleasure they, and the 5 Nations in general, felt in receiving my message; that they had even anticipated my intentions in retaining all their warriors in their villages, in order that none of them should be with the English. They have promised me to do their best, in remembrance of my father and out of regard for me, so as to afford me proofs of their attachment to the French. They have communicated many arguments to me, all which lead me to think that they will remain neutral for the present.

I spoke to them with great kindness, but have not left them in ignorance that I was perfectly aware of their conduct. I even showed them the messages and Belts they had introduced, from the English, among the Nations of the Upper countries. I made the most of the zeal of two of their chiefs who had rejected the medal of the English and gave it up to me.

An Onondaga chief, particularly attached to me since last year, told me in the presence of those deputies, that he would have nothing more to do with the affairs of his nation, because it had not received his advice with sufficient cordiality; that he wished to die with the French; that he should not discontinue to make war on the English, and that those of his Nation who had sense, would follow his example. I have appointed this Onondaga a chief, and have decorated him with the King's medal, in consideration of the proofs he has afforded me of his fidelity in the different embassies in which I have employed him. He has attacked the English and even brought me some prisoners. He has assured me he should always labor to promote good business.

I have learned from some Iroquois of the Sault and the Lake that those deputies had presented them some Belts, to induce them to remain quiet on their lands and not to meddle with the war between the French and English. They have invited them at the same time to come into their village to confer on business. Our domiciliated (Indians) have answered in my presence, that they never would have any will but mine; that they had heard my sentiments and exhorted the 5 Nations to conform thereto, for their own sakes.

I have, my Lord, accomplished my principal object, as regards the Five Nations. I proposed sending them a great distance from their villages during my expedition against Chouaguen. I have succeeded therein, for whilst M. de Montcalm lays siege to that place, the Senecas and Cayugas who have been at Niagara, have not yet returned home, and I have in my power 80 Onondaga and Seneca deputies. In consequence of this foresight, I am certain that none of the Five Nations will be found among the English, whatever effort Colonel Johnson may make to induce them to join him.

I have the honor to be, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Journal of the Siege of Oswego.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Journal of the Siege of Chouaguen, commenced the 11th August, 1756, and concluded the 14th at night. [Transmitted by M. de Montcalm.]

On the arrival of the French troops in Canada in the month of May, every disposition was made for the campaign of that army. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of New France, had detached a body of Colonial troops and Militia towards the St. John river, to harass the English and receive the remains of the Acadians driven from their settlements, of whom those who had not been transplanted to the more distant English Colonies were wandering in the woods. Another detachment of observation of about 500 men was in the direction of Fort Lydius. The battalion of La Reine and that of Languedoc were encamped in front of Fort Carillon. Bearn was destined for Niagara; Guyenne for Frontenac, and Sieur de Villiers, Captain of Colonial troops, hung on the enemy and watched his movements towards the River Chouaguen, with a corps of 700 men, Canadians and Indians. The defence of Fort du Quesne and the Beautiful river was confided to a somewhat considerable party of Canadians and Savages, and Sieur Dumas, Commandant in that quarter, had orders to retain with him all the Indians of the Upper country whose rendezvous was at Presqu'Isle, in case his posts were threatened; if not to send a part of them to Montreal.

Reinforcements having arrived from France, Royal Rousillon was sent to Lake St. Sacrament and La Sarre to Frontenac with the two French Engineers, also arrived this year, under the orders of Colonel Bourlamaque, to erect new fortifications at that place, or rather an intrenched camp which would have placed them beyond insult. Chevalier de Levis, Brigadier, was destined to command on Lake St. Sacrament, and Major-General the Marquis de Montcalm, to proceed to the quarter which may apparently be most threatened by the enemy.

Thus everything seemed arranged for defence in different parts; on Lake Ontario, Lake St. Sacrament, and the Beautiful river. Some parties, only of Canadians and Indians, succeeded each other without intermission on the English frontiers exposed to their ravages, and were laying waste more especially Pensilvania, Virginia and Maryland.

Toward mid-June it clearly appeared from the report of the Indians sent out as scouts; from the depositions of several prisoners; from the vast preparations made at Albany and Fort Lydius, that the English had offensive intentions in the direction of the Point, or of Lake St. Sacrament. Upon this intelligence, the Marquis de Montcalm proposed a diversion towards Lake Ontario, for the purpose of attracting a portion of the enemy's forces thither, and consequently relieving the Point. This diversion was to be made, however, in such a way that the defensive could be changed into the offensive, according to circumstances.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil had never lost sight of the siege of Chouaguen, a post important by its situation at the mouth of the river of that name on Lake Ontario; the key of the Upper country by its communication with the Five Nations, Albany and the River Hudson; defended by three forts — Fort Ontario on the right bank of the river, Forts George and Chouaguen on the left bank, as well as a species of an earthen crown-work, serving as an intrenched camp, having also a good port and a well sheltered roadstead. But this siege, so important to the

Colony, did not seem feasible this campaign, the season being already far advanced, the preparation which this expedition required being very great, the distance considerable and transportation not being accomplished except with difficulties and endless delays across a country having no other roads but rivers, filled with falls and rapids, and lakes rendered frequently impassable to bateaux in consequence of the violence of the waves.

Sieur Bigot, Intendant of Canada, arrived at this conjuncture at Montreal; took upon himself the collection of munitions of war of all sorts, and of provisions, the dispatch of convoys and their uninterrupted supply. The diversion towards Chouaguen was then determined on with the design to besiege it, if the condition of that place, or the carelessness of the enemy permitted.

Sieur de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of Three Rivers, was, accordingly, sent with a fresh body of Colonial troops and Indians to assume command of Sieur de Villiers' camp, established at Niaouré bay, about 15 leagues from Chouaguen; Sieur de Bourlamaque received orders to commence at Frontenac whatever preparations he may deem necessary. Sieur Decomble, Engineer, to proceed with a detachment of Canadians and Savages to reconnoitre Chouaguen; and, in order to conceal the project from the enemy, the Marquis de Montcalm departed on the 27th June with Chevalier de Levis for Fort Carillon. The defensive positions to be adopted in this quarter; the fortifications erecting at Carillon; the movements of the enemy at Fort Lydius and Albany; all these reasons justified the Marquis of Montcalm's presence at Lake St. Sacrament. This General remained there only long enough to make the necessary arrangements and put the English on the wrong scent. He placed the defence of that frontier in the hands of Chevalier de Levis with a corps of 3000 men; left there on the 15th July for Montreal where he arrived on the 19th; received there his last Instructions and set out again on the 21st and arrived at Frontenac on the 29th. The Béarn battalion had already received orders to repair thither from Niagara, and Sieur Mercier, Commander of artillery, had arrived there two days before.

Having made the preparations inseparable from a new expedition in this country, which consequently presented difficulties unknown in Europe, and provided everything necessary to secure a retreat in case superior forces rendered this inevitable, orders were given to two barks—one of 12, and the other of 16 guns—to cruise in the latitude of Chouaguen. A corps of scouts, Canadians and Indians, were sent on the road between the latter place and Albany, to intercept expresses.

The Marquis de Montcalm left Frontenac on the 4th August with the first division of the army, consisting of the battalions of La Sarre and Guyenne and four pieces of cannon. He arrived on the 6th at the Bay of Niaouré, which the Marquis de Vaudreuil had designated as the rendezvous of all the troops, and where the second division, composed of the Béarn battalion, of the Militia, of 80 bateaux of artillery and provisions, arrived on the 8th. The number of troops destined for the expedition was nearly 3000 men—to wit, the battalions of la Sarre, Guyene and Bearn, amounting to only 1300 men; the remainder, soldiers of the Colony, Militiamen and Indians.

Sieur de Rigaud's corps, destined as the van-guard, set out on the same day to advance to a cove called L'anse aux Cabanes<sup>1</sup> within three leagues of Chouaguen. The first division having arrived there on the 10th, at two o'clock in the morning, the van-guard proceeded four hours afterwards across the woods to another cove situated half a league from Chouaguen to cover the debarkation of the artillery and troops. The first division reached the same cove at midnight; a battery was forthwith erected on Lake Ontario and the troops bivouacked during the night at the head of the bateaux.

On the 11th, at day-break, the Canadians and Indians advanced to within a quarter of a league of, and invested, Fort Ontario, situated, as we have stated, on the right bank of the River Chouaguen. Sieur Decombles, sent at 3 o'clock in the morning to make arrangements for this siege and to determine the part against which immediate operations were to be directed, was killed, returning from his reconnoissance, by one of our Indians who had escorted him and who mistook him in the dark for an Englishman—a mishap which was rendered of the greatest consequence to us from the circumstance of carrying on a siege in America with one Engineer only that remained. Sieur Desandronis, the surviving Engineer, ran a road through the woods, partly through swamps which were explored the evening before, for the purpose of conducting the artillery across. This road, commenced at 11 o'clock in the morning, was finished at night and thoroughly completed next morning. The camp was established at the same time, the right resting on Lake Ontario covered by the same battery that protected our bateaux from attack; the left, on an impassable swamp.

The precaution of marching only at night, and of entering rivers when halting, by which we were concealed, had till then hid our advance from the enemy. It was announced to them only that same day by the Indians who went even to the foot of the fort to fire. Three armed sloops, which sailed at noon from the River Chouaguen, came cruising in front of the camp, discharged some pieces of artillery, but the fire from our battery forced them to sheer off. Since then they cruised only at a distance.

On the 12th, at day-break, the regiment of Béarn arrived with the bateaux of artillery and provisions. These bateaux were forthwith unloaded in presence of the English barks which cruised in front of the camp. The battery on the beach was increased—the park of artillery and the dépôt of provisions established, and Sieur Pouchot, Captain in the regiment of Béarn, who had successfully begun a fortification at Niagara, received orders to act as Engineer during the siege. Arrangements were made to open trenches that very night; Sieur de Bourlamaque superintended them. Six pickets of workmen, fifty men each, were under orders for that night; two companies of grenadiers and three pickets to support them.

Notwithstanding the greatest possible diligence, the work at this trench could not be begun until midnight. It was rather a parallel of about 100 toises, the front opened at 90 toises from the ditch of the fort through ground embarrassed by obstructions and stumps of trees. This parallel, finished at five o'clock in the morning, was completed by the day laborers, who cut the lines of communication and commenced erecting batteries. The enemy's fire, which had been very brisk since the break of day, ceased about eleven o'clock at night, and it was perceived that the garrison evacuated Fort Ontario and passed over to that of Chouaguen at the opposite side of the River. They abandoned, in retiring, 8 pieces of cannon and four mortars. The fort having been immediately occupied by the grenadiers of the trench, the workmen were commanded to continue the communication of the parallel to the river side, where, at nightfall, was commenced a large battery, placed so as to batter Fort Chouaguen, the road from that fort to Fort George, and take the intrenched camp in the rear. Twenty pieces of cannon were conveyed, during the night, in men's arms, a labor which occupied the whole army, with the exception of the pickets and the camp guard.

14th At daylight the Marquis of Montcalm ordered Sieur de Rigaud to ford the river to the other side with the Canadians and Indians; to occupy the woods and harass the communication with Fort George, where the enemy appeared making considerable preparations. At six o'clock we had nine pieces ready to bear, and though the fire of the besieged, up to that time, was more brisk than ours, they hoisted the White flag at ten o'clock and sent two officers to demand a capitulation. The celerity of our operations in a soil which they considered impracticable, the erection of our batteries completed with so much rapidity, the idea these works gave them of the number of the French troops, the movements of the corps detached from the other side of the river, the dread of the savages, the death of Colonel Mercer, Commandant of Chouaguen, who was killed at eight o'clock in the morning, doubtless determined the besieged to a step which we had not dared to expect so soon.

The Marquis de Montcalm sent Sieur de Bougainville, one of his aids de camp, as a hostage and to propose articles of capitulation, which were to the effect that the garrison should surrender themselves prisoners of war, and that the French troops should forthwith take possession of the forts. The articles having been accepted by the Commandant, Sieur Lithlealles, commanding Shirley's regiment, and sent to the Marquis of Montcalm, Sieur de la Pauze, Adjutant to the regiment of Guienne (acting Major-General) was sent to revise them; and Sieur de Bourlamaque, named Commander of Forts George and Chouaguen, took possession of these with two companies of grenadiers and the pickets from the trench. He was intrusted with the destruction of said forts and the removal of the artillery, munitions of war, and the provisions found there.

There were, on our side, only about thirty men killed or wounded; on that of the English about 150, including several soldiers, who, wishing to escape across the woods, fell into the hands of the Indians. The number of prisoners was nearly 1700 men, to wit: Shirley's and Pepperell's regiments, arrived from Old England and who were at the battle of Fontenoy, a detachment of Schuyler's regiment, Militia of the country; about 80 officers, among whom were two artillery, two engineer and 12 navy officers. We captured, also, 7 vessels of war; one of 18 guns, one of 14, one of 10, one of 8, three mounted with swivels, 200 barges or bateaux, 7 pieces of bronze, 48 of iron, 14 mortars, 5 howitzers, 47 swivels, a quantity of shot, bombs, balls, powder, and a considerable pile of provisions.

On the 21st of the same month, all having been demolished, the prisoners, artillery and supplies being removed, the army reëmbarked, and repaired in three divisions to the Bay of Niaouré, whence the several corps proceeded to their respective destinations; the savages having, with the Marquis of Montcalm's permission, departed successively after the siege. This general had, previous to the expedition, bound the Nations the one to the other, by a Wampum belt, which he had presented them in his Majesty's name, according to the custom of the country.

So much warlike stores and provisions found at Chouaguen—the fleet which secured the command on Lake Ontario to the English—the additional reinforcements they expected from day to day—all announced designs on their part against our posts, Frontenac and Niagara, the execution of which was calculated on this Autumn, and the danger whereof the Colony, very fortunately, had not to incur.

Articles of Capitulation on the Reduction of Fort Chouguen, 14 August, 1756.

1. The garrison [to be] prisoners of war, and will be conducted hence to Montreal, where they will be treated with humanity, and each have the allowance suitable to his respective rank, according to the usages of war.

2. The officers, soldiers and private persons will retain their baggage and clothing, which they will be permitted to take with them.

3. They will remain prisoners of war until exchanged.

Signed, John Littlehale, Lieutenant Colonel commanding. I accept the above articles, agreeably to the French translation, to which I add, The Capitulation applies only to the Military. Besides, private merchants and hired men will be at liberty to retire whenever they please. No injury will be done them. I detain the two officers as hostages, having sent the Major-General to make arrangements. I also send a Surgeon for the sick.

Done at the Camp before Chouaguen, the 14th August, near the small fort surrendered on the 13th of August.

Conference between M. de Vaudreuil and the Five Nations.

CANADA.

In the year One thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, and on the twenty-eighth day of July, at three o'clock in the afternoon, before us, Pierre Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor, Lieutenant-General for the King throughout the whole of New France, the territory and countries of Louisiana, in our Castle at Montreal, appeared one hundred and fifty Indians, assisted by Sieur Toussaint le Cavalier, Interpreter of the Iroquois language, who has told us that the Indians at whose head he came, are Onondagas and Oneidas, and are a deputation on the part of the Five Nations; whereupon, we having notice sent to M. Bigot, Councillor of the King in his councils, Intendant of Justice, Police, Finance and Marine throughout the whole of New France, the territory and countries of Louisiana, and having summoned M. Dailleboust, Knight of the Military Order of St. Louis, Lieutenant of the King over the town and government of Montreal, M. Denoyau, likewise, Knight of St. Louis, Lieutenant of the King over the town and government of Three Rivers, at present in this town, Captain de Boucherville, of the troops of the detachment of Marine, M. Douville, seconded Lieutenant in the said troops, who understands and speaks the Iroquois language; who, being immediately come into our Castle, after having explained to them the subject for which we had invited them, and having at the same time taken their seats in the Council chamber according to their rank, Chekeuariné, an Onondaga Indian Chief, arose and spoke, according to the explanation given us by said Sieur de Cavalier, the interpreter, as follows:

On laying down a Belt.

Father. We present ourselves before you authorized by the Belt which you have sent us last fall; we have come in virtue of that Belt, to hear your word.

On laying down two Belts.

Father. Here are two Belts which we Oneidas and we Onondagas have received on your part this Spring; these, again, are the same Belts which bring us hither to hear your word.

By two Strings of Wampum.

We are come and we are ready to hear you. (On presenting a Belt.) This Belt which we present you has been given us in your name to prevail on us to remove to a distance from our villages, lest the blows you aim at the English may fall on us.

By three Strings.

We answer to that Belt, that we find it almost impossible for us to change a village which has been, since so long a time, inhabited by the Five Nations. The bones of our ancestors repose there and we cannot abandon them.

By eight Strings.

Father. We dry your tears. We have participated in the losses you have experienced.

By six Belts.

We again behold the blood of your warriors flowing on your mat. By these Strings of wampum we wipe it up, in order that your mat may be no longer stained with blood, and that you may employ yourself in good business.

And said Sieur Perthius hath signed with us. Done the day and year above written. Thus signed in the original.

And on the eighth of August, One thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, at eight o'clock in the forenoon, we, the Governor aforesaid, assisted by said Sieur Le Cavalier, their Interpreter, being in the aforesaid Council chamber, have explained, through Sieur Le Cavalier, the Interpreter to the said Indians, our answers to their speech and our address to said Indians, as follows:

Children. I feel a sincere pleasure at seeing you present before me with the Belt I sent you last autumn; you are come to hear my word; you do hear it and you will see that I speak to you with the sincerity I have always felt when I have addressed my Children.

Children, Oneidas and Onondagas. I am charmed to see you present before me with the two Belts I sent you this spring, and that you are likewise disposed to hear my word. I wish that you may not forget it.

By two Strings of Wampum.

I have received your two Strings whereby you assure me that you are ready to listen to me.

Receive the two Strings I present to you, to give you light and to open your ears, in order that none of my words be lost to you.

By three Strings.

By these three Strings I reassure you, and exhort you to remain quiet on your mats. Your village is that of your ancestors; you could not have a better asylum; their bones repose there, and I am delighted that you would not abandon them.

I assure you, likewise, that I have never thought of making the blows I direct against the English recoil on you; when I shall have developed my sentiments, you will see that I seek only your good.

By eight Strings.

Children. You wipe away my tears; by these eight Strings, I, myself, wipe away yours.

By six Strings.

Children. You perceive, you say, the blood of my warriors flowing on my mat; you dry it up, in order that my mat may be bloody no more, and that I may labor in safety at good work.

By these six Strings, I thank you for the interest you take in what concerns me.

Children of the Five Nations, namely, Onondagas and Oneidas here present. I repeat to you the pleasure I feel at seeing you on my mat; we can look on each other in peace; it is the Master of Life who favors us with this interview and procures for us the opportunity of opening our hearts and of concealing nothing.

By three Strings.

Children. Listen to what I am about to say to you :

I have heard your answers to the messages I have sent you by my children, on divers occasions ; I am very glad that you have returned them to me these days past.

Many of the points are different from what I had stated them, owing either to their having been badly explained or to your not having understood them correctly.

By a Belt of 2000 beads.

Children. I present you with this Belt to reassure and to confirm to you what I intended should have been said to you. All the reasonings which have been communicated to you are reducible to what I am about to say to you.

I tell you, then, by this Message that I never thought of driving you from the lands you inhabit, nor of giving you an axe to strike your brothers, the English. I engage you, on the contrary, to remain quiet. Pay particular attention that your warriors be not, on any pretence whatsoever, with my enemies. I advise you beforehand that my love for my Children, the Five Nations, is so great, that I should be sorry that any accident would befall them. It would be very unfortunate for them and for me ; remember well what I tell you ; you will not have it in your power to reproach me that I have not forewarned you, like a good father. I have an infinite number of children who, in these troublesome times are not accustomed to see you : they might commit a mistake in taking one for the other ; did they begin striking you, it would be no longer possible for me to restrain them, as I have done since last year.

By a Belt of 2000 beads.

Children. You are right in saying that it is I who have invited you here. 'Tis true. Could I act otherwise and have the bowels of a father ? The joy I felt on beholding Nations whom the King has confided to me, and the memory I retain of the friendship my father felt for you, whereof he has so often afforded unquestionable proofs to your ancestors, who, on their side, formed only one heart with him, must convince you that I tell you the truth. Will you say, 'tis false ? Can you forget how deeply your ancestors regretted a father who was so dear to them, and the troubles you have experienced at different times since his death ? This is enough on this point.

Ought I to expect so long a silence on your part, and that you should forget me ; me, who have been born on the same soil with yourselves ? I have not ceased to behold you with pleasure, and during my absence I felt no greater desire than that of returning to you. I supposed that the Five Nations would feel a pleasure in seeing me, but I was mistaken, and I have experienced nothing but ingratitude from you. This makes me regret your ancients, who had sense ; I cannot sufficiently recall them to my mind. This is not the only fault you have committed to the knowledge of all the Nations. You have omitted to come and bewail the death of your son, M. de Longueuil, Senior, who was so attached to you ; your ancestors would not have failed to do so. All that shows me, I repeat to you, that you no longer possess any head to resist the poisoned speeches of the English.

I cannot doubt the attachment many among you, children of the Five Nations, feel for the English. You have afforded me but too many proofs of it, inasmuch as you have been the bearers of their Messages to all my children, the Chaouanons, Delawares, Outaouas, Saulteux, Poulx, Ouias, Missisagues, Hurons, and other Nations, who, especially the Chaouanons, to prove to me their attachment in sending me these Belts, joined thereto a number of English scalps.

Many persons of the Five Nations, who have discovered the falsehood of the English, have even sent me the Medals received from them. You see them. I wish these persons may give sense to those who havn't any. I know not whether you will be always attached to the English when I shall have told you the reasons which oblige me to strike them. You are aware that the French have been true from all time, and never sought any quarrel with the English. Such has not been the case with the latter. A number of their ships captured two of ours under pretence of speaking them. My brother, De Rigaud, who happened to be on board, was taken prisoner and has suffered all sorts of hardships at the hands of the English.

Can you, Children, deny that the English are deceivers? Why have they built vessels; do they require them to go to Orange? If you desire to speak the truth, you will say that you know they wish to take this country, and because I am defending myself, will you say that I am seeking a quarrel with the English? I am well aware that they make you think so, and that you are simple enough to believe them. None of your nation dare say a word to the English. Colonel Johnson's word makes all your villages tremble.

By six Strings.

Children. Be persuaded that I keep nothing on my mind and that I tell you all I think.

I cannot conceal from you that I know that the majority of my children of the Five Nations would be delighted, were their brother the English our conqueror, and if you speak otherwise 'tis contrary to your true sentiments. You pretend to be friends of the French and of the English, in order to obtain what you want from both sides, which makes you invent lies that an upright man would never think of.

Could you suppose that my children of the Sault and of the Lake, who are incorruptible, would have been capable of abandoning their religion, their father and their lands, to become the slaves of Englishmen? Is that common sense? Yet you have given them a Belt to induce them to do so.

That is not all. By a Message which I have seen, you also invite four of the Chiefs of the Sault and Lake whom you have named, to go with you and sit on your mat to speak of business. You must readily believe that I see that these are tricks which your brother the Englishman has dictated to you. I am too well assured of the attachment of my children of the Sault and the Lake to apprehend their following your advice.

You fear being the victim of the English or French. You have indisputable proofs that I have never betrayed you. The King who loves you has no other view as regards you than to place you among the number of the Christians. This is not the case with the English who have built two forts in your villages and seek to aggrandize themselves only for the purpose of becoming your masters and making you their slaves.

And said Sieur Cavalier, the Interpreter, hath signed with me. Done on the above day and year. Thus signed in the original.

And at three o'clock in the afternoon of the twelfth of the said month of August, One thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, we, the Governor aforesaid, being accompanied as before mentioned, the said one hundred and fifty Onondagas and Oneidas, assisted by the said Sieur Le Cavalier, their Interpreter being in the said Council Chamber, have applied to answer our speech, and immediately said Sieur Cavelier, the Interpreter, explained to us their answers, as follows:

We come to answer your speech and to explain to you our determination; in order not to forget any part of what you have said to us, we have caused the Interpreter to repeat it to us.

By three Strings.

We have been so pleased to hear your sentiments that we have lost none of the words which you have uttered. We thank you, and though we are but two nations here, yet we shall answer you in the name of the Five Nations.

By three Strings.

We have received your Belt with pleasure; we are going to communicate to you our reflections on your words.

By a Belt.

You have told us that you did not propose obliging us to abandon our villages. You recommend us not to mingle with the English, as many of our young people did last year; we thank you for your speech.

What we say to you by this Belt was agreed to between us, the Five Nations, before leaving our villages. Our Chiefs have fulfilled your intentions. They, themselves, have given Belts to our young men recommending them to remain in our villages. We in our turn confirm this word. We shall always retain our warriors and we assure you that none of our people will be found among the English; but as we cannot answer of ourselves, and as some foolish fellows may happen to be with the English, we advise you beforehand that such will be without the consent of the Nation.

By a Belt.

We admit the truth of all you have said to us, and that there are no longer any people of sense in our villages.

We pray you to hold this Belt by one end and we shall hold it by the other; we shall never let it go, and shall occupy ourselves only with good business. You, Father, and the English are the cause of our not having been to see you. You likewise are, one and the other, the cause of the troubles. We have been obliged to make a road to reach our villages. A hatchet of yours has made its appearance in our parts; 'twas small, 'tis true; we have concealed it under our armpit.

You told us that Colonel Johnson made us tremble in our villages; we assure you that We, the Five Nations, fear no man on the face of the earth; especially when the point in question will be to labor in good affairs from which we shall never depart; and a proof of that is that we have come in spite of Colonel Johnson, who has done his best to retain us in our villages, and in spite of all the opposition that was offered.

By two Strings.

You told us that we no longer had any people of sense. We present you Tekanesoren, who is the son of a great man; we request you to make him a chief, that he may labor at good affairs.

By two Strings.

Again. You told us that we had not covered the death of M. de Longueuil. We have lost two of our great chiefs, whom you, neither, have covered. By these two strings we cover M. de Longueuil. We would wish to resuscitate, in him whom we present to you, those two chiefs to labor at good business.

By two Strings.

After having arranged our affairs we are content, and desire to return home.

By two other Strings.

We have been told that we do not run any risk, that you will cause us to be conducted to our own country; we thank you for your attention and request you to furnish us canoes and the same persons who came in search of us, to carry us back; also, to give us guns for our protection, being resolved to make use of all our strength to prevent the English encroaching on the lands on which the Master of Life has placed us.

Father. We have no other children than M. de Longueuil, Noyan, Joncaire and La Chauvignerie; we request them to be always aiding unto us near you. We shall regard them always as our children. We expect that you will employ them, on the first occasion, to bring us your orders.

An Onondaga by a Belt.

Father. You know my sentiments. The Master of Life has opened my eyes. I have perceived what I formerly promised you; I no longer meddle with the affairs of my village. I have declared to my nation that I would not belong any longer to it, because it has not acted fairly by me. I acknowledge that it is the Master of Life who has prompted me to act thus, in order to be able to occupy myself with Prayer. By this Belt, I enroll myself among the number of Ononthio's children. I wish to die with him, and with this view I fix my residence at La Galette, where I hope to become a good Christian.

And the said Sieur La Cavalier, Interpreter, hath signed with us. Done the day and year above written. Thus signed in the original.

And at nine o'clock in the forenoon of the fourteenth of the said month of August, One thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, We, the Governor aforesaid, accompanied as before mentioned, the said one hundred and fifty Onondagas and Oneidas, assisted by the said Sieur Le Cavalier, Interpreter, being in the said Council chamber, have caused said Sieur Le Cavalier, Interpreter, to explain to the Indians our reply to their answer, as follows:

Children, Five Nations. I am pleased with the care your chiefs have taken to restrain your young people in your villages; you will do well to pay attention on your return that none of them be found among the English.

I shall always hold one end of your Belt with both hands; be careful to keep it; hold it fast and do not occupy yourself except with good affairs.

It is not I who am the cause of your not coming to see me; confess, yourselves, that it is the English who have kept you back; they also are the authors of the troubles of which you speak, as I have already told you; nothing, my Children, must prevent you coming to see me, whenever you think proper; you have found a very clear path on my lands; it will be always so, and you will be always welcome.

'Tis true you have received a hatchet from me; I had no other design than your own security, and to deliver you from the bondage with which you are menaced; keep it concealed and make use of it whenever occasion will require. Be assured I shall aid you whensoever you will need assistance.

Children, continue not to fear Colonel Johnson; but do not listen to his evil counsels; labor only at good business; you will be always quiet on your mats.

By two Strings.

Children, Onandagas. I cannot but approve the choice you have made of one of the descendants of Tekanesoren to replace that great chief; he was much attached to my father whom he greatly loved; they had but one heart and one will. I recommend to his successor to work like him, only at good affairs; and in order that he may not go astray, let him not listen to the evil minded. I flatter myself that he will prove to me that he has the same sentiments and the same talents as his predecessor.

By two Strings.

Here are two Strings of Wampum whereby I cover the death of your chiefs; meanwhile let us, one and the other, acquit ourselves better of a like ceremony.

By a Belt of 2500 beads.

You have correctly comprehended my words; you know my sentiments; nothing remains for me, Children of the Five Nations, than to confirm your minds and to engage you by this word to do, on your side, your best, always to keep up your union as well as that with your brethren, my children. I ask that we may be united in order that we may have but one mind, one heart, in every respect the same as existed between your ancients and my father. I assure you that I will occupy myself only for your advantage so far as you will deserve it.

Hearken not to the Evil Spirit which oftentimes divorces the best friends. That Evil Spirit is always near us; place not your trust in him; so soon as you will hear anything, come to me; conceal nothing from me; have recourse to this Belt which will always tell truth and afford you consolation at all times; come confidently to explain yourselves; you will find no ambush in your path; the end of your village is at La Galette; the road is always good; fear nothing; it is the same path our ancients traced for the one and the other of us; 'tis shorter than it was at that time. The Master of Life has pity on you; he wishes to draw you closer to Prayer, in order to place you among the number of his children, and to render you happy. Many of your brethren have profited thereby; it depends on yourselves only to imitate them, therefore, my children, the Five Nations, have only one and the same heart, and one and the same mind, and always follow the counsels I, as a good father, shall give you.

I grant you the canoes you ask of me; I expect those who have brought you here will convey you back to your villages, so much the more safely as there is nothing to fear, either for you or for them.

I give you some presents and some guns, as a testimony of my friendship, whilst waiting to do better, if your guns be not in order I shall have them repaired.

Children, I was correct in thinking that you would not have forgotten Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan, Joncaire and La Chauvignerie; they sincerely love you; they will be always ready to go and to come to you whenever occasion requires, for the purpose of bearing my words to you, and I am well assured that in time of war, as well as in seasons of peace, they will have nothing to fear in going to your country; such was the custom among your ancients.

By a Belt of 2000 beads.

I see, my Son, that you are honest; you have performed by me all you have promised. I can only testify to you the joy which I, as well as all your Praying brethren, experienced therefrom. I enroll you among the number of my cherished children, and I am delighted to see you attached to the Religion and to the Service of the King. By this Belt I exhort you to be firm in your sentiments. I assure you that on all occasions I shall prove to you that I am a good father. You have afforded me sufficient proofs of your fidelity that I will bestow on you a mark of distinction. I constitute you a Chief, and decorate you with the Royal Medal. I hope it will assist you not a little to labor successfully in good affairs.

And said Sieur Le Cavalier, Interpreter, hath signed with us. Done the day and year above mentioned. Thus signed in original.

At three o'clock in the afternoon of the twentieth of the said month of August, One thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, We, the Governor aforesaid, accompanied as already mentioned, the said one hundred and fifty Onondagas and Oneidas, assisted by the said Sieur Le Cavalier, Interpreter, being in the Council Chamber, have caused said Sieur Le Cavalier, Interpreter, to explain to said Indians our words, as follows:

Children. You have expressed to us the joy you feel at the victory I have gained over the English; I think that joy is sincere and thank you for it. The Master of Life has given me that advantage over his enemies and ours.

How many a time have the English not told you that, compared with their power, the French were no better than ciphers. The Master of Life has permitted me to pull down their pride; He wished to humble them and make them acknowledge that the French will be always Victors so long as He will protect their arms.

By a Belt of 2000 beads.

Children, and especially you others here present. I saw with pain the difficulty you experienced in finding a path to return to your villages. He who rules all the Earth blesses my labors, and I have cleared for you a fine road; I have long been desirous of making it smooth.

You will now no longer doubt that the walls of Chouaguen have been unable to resist the intrepidity of the Warriors whom the King has sent into this Colony; they have not left one stone upon another. Not a vestige remains of that fort, nor of any of those establishments which were the source of all the bad affairs. I began at the very commencement of this winter to clear that path for you, but you did not second my efforts; I exhort you not to do the like with this new path.

Children. According to the representation of the English, they had purchased from you the lands on which they were settled at Chouaguen. What a foolish notion! In fine, these lands are no longer either your property nor that of the English. The King, my master, has conquered them. I have had them replaced in the same state that they were in when you or your ancestors were inhabiting them.

I have had no other intention in becoming master of them than to have you use them as did your ancients in the time of my father.

Children. I expect that the fine path I have just leveled for you will afford us, reciprocally, the pleasure of seeing each other oftener than we have done. You will learn the custom of your ancestors who never failed to come and see their father.

Children. I recommend you not to allow yourselves to be corrupted as heretofore, by your brethren, the English. Remember that under pretence of setting a little trap for beaver, at Chouaguen, they insensibly built forts and sloops which have caused so much trouble, as your ancients had wisely foreseen.

I warn you beforehand, that if you suffer the English to make the smallest establishment at Chouaguen, or on the lands you occupy in the vicinity of Lake Ontario, I will go forthwith and drive them thence. You can no more beseech me as formerly, not to stain those lands with blood. I will not listen to you.

Children. Forget not what I say to you as a kind father. Be firm; encourage your warriors to be firm also, for your and my peace sake.

By two Strings.

You are at liberty to leave whenever you please. I recommend you not to carry along with you any of the English who are here our prisoners, nor any of those belonging to the Indians. Children, do not take charge, either, of any of their letters. If they give you any, take them and hand them to me. If they be not suspicious, I will return them to you in order that you may deliver them according to the address.

And said Sieur Le Cavalier, Interpreter, hath signed with us. Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

We, PIERRE RIGAUD, Marquis de Vaudreuil, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout the entire of New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana,

Do certify that the foregoing copy is conformable with the original remaining in our Secretary's office. In testimony whereof We have signed these presents, caused the Seal of our Arms to be affixed thereto and had them countersigned by our Secretary.

Letter from an Officer, dated

Camp at Chouaguen, 22nd August, 1756.

I have the honor to transmit you a detail of the campaign we have just made, from our departure from Quebec to Chouaguen where we have gathered laurels which we dared not promise ourselves. We are repaid for the hardships and disagreeable moments experienced in making war in this country, by the complete victory just gained over the English at the siege of this fort.

We left Quebec on the 6th of June in canoes, for Montreal, to receive the orders of the Marquis de Vaudreuil. We had two Canadians to steer and ten of our soldiers at the paddles. During that voyage we had all imaginable reverses; we never camped, and in the brief intervals of repose which we gave the men, in order to prepare the soup, we were devoured by musquitoes. We have, in consequence, several men at the hospital and three or four officers of the regiment have had frightful tumors all over the body from the bites. Throughout the entire passage we never ceased admiring the banks of the river. An extremely handsome forest, a soil adapted to every purpose, most beautiful sites, an abundance of fish and a remarkable quantity of game made us offer up wishes to see it peopled. Little lakes intersect the current of the river; a number of settlements, met with every couple of acres, amuse you; about midway up is the government of Three Rivers, formed of Indian villages, built of the bark of trees which are changed at pleasure and oppose the threatening storm.

We arrived on the 17th at Montreal, where the Governor-General was awaiting us, in order to dispatch his army. Montreal is a very large town and much subject to be burnt, all the houses being built of wood. The French tone reigns there; the inclination for marriage is dominant; very pretty persons engage you; we have already five officers married there; the people are proud though poor, and none but the individual who has the superintendence of posts is in a position to keep up with the rate they live.

On the 20th we marched over land to form the advance of the Frontenac army, and to resume our bateaux at La Chine and to get canoemen qualified to extricate us from the bad places we had to pass. We made scarcely six leagues when we were obliged to ascend three steep rapids to reach the camp designated for us. We had been wading continually up to the waist in the water and had to travel thirty leagues before we got half way. The soldier, with whom we all have reason to be pleased, did not lose courage; his ardor redoubled at every difficulty, and though repeatedly forced to carry our canoes, landed us at La Presentation where the river assumes its ordinary course.

On the 1st of July, we arrived at the rendezvous, where the regiment of Guyenne was encamped. La Sarra took its right, with its flank under the cannon of the fort. The bad position of the latter, Sir, is inconceivable; all the works our new Engineers are laying out there do not render it defensible. It is commanded on all sides; no magazine protected. At first view it appears to have been constructed only for trade. We were very quiet there, being covered by a considerable party of Canadians and Indians; and although we had only pork to eat, the attention we paid to our good friends the Algonquins, procured for us either fish or game. We expected to be fixed there, when the operations of the campaign changed appearances. M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, who had disposed of the General officers at our departure, was informed of the projects of the English. He had sent Chevalier de Levi, Brigadier, with three French battalions to the point of Lake Saint Sacrament, to oppose 8000 men collected there. Colonel de Bourlamaque, with the other three, to the camp we were occupying; the Marquis de Moncalme was reserved to take post wherever he would be most necessary. Previous to his departure he was at Fort Carillon, where he found the enemy in force. He wrote to that effect to M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, who knew how necessary it was to create a diversion. M. de Moncalme set out again and proceeded to join his army at Montreal, in order to arrange there everything his troops had to do, so as to prevent our being attacked. He issued orders, in consequence, to 1,500 Canadians to follow him; put all the artillery in motion, and had the report spread throughout all the Indian nations that there would be plunder for those who would come and fight with us. The captain of artillery arrived at our camp with an order for the regiment of La Sarre to proceed to the Bay of Njouaré. The Engineer who had reconnoitred Fort Chuagen informed us of its situation.

On the 29th, we left to encamp at Isle aux aillo,<sup>1</sup> and arrived on the 30th at our rendezvous. The scouts reported everything to us, and we rendered a faithful account thereof. The Marquis de Moncalme, who, by his instructions, was at liberty to profit by the favorable moment, if he should perceive any, thought proper to seize it in consequence of the intelligence he received of the enemy. We had orders to send our bateaux back to Frontenac for the regiment of Guyenne and that of Bearn, and the artillery necessary for that expedition. We learn that Colonel Johnson was no longer at Chuagen, and that he had left one of his Aids-de-Camp, named Mer Ler,<sup>2</sup> there in command of 1,500 men. Our army altogether amounted only to a force of 3,000, including French, Canadians and Indians. We labored several days at the construction of ovens, and nothing escaped the vigilance of our Generals in order to provide for the wants of an army that ought always to be accompanied by its supplies, and which any accident might starve.

On the 8th the army had arrived at Nioaré, after having experienced rough weather on Lake Ontario. It left on the 9th. M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud detached advance parties of Canadians and Indians through the woods; twenty Abenakis constituted our van-guard. M. de Moncalme followed the grenadier company of La Sarre, M. de Bourlamaque, the field hospital was at the head of the Regiment, the four pieces of cannon and of that of Guyenne. We marched the whole night between the 9th and 10th when we overtook M<sup>r</sup> Rigaud at L'ance aux barraques. We left Bearn the heavy artillery. The army cooked provisions at the River aux Sables, where it halted until the night in order to be able to take up a position at the investment of the fort. M<sup>r</sup> de Moncalme ordered the artillery to be landed in the course of the night, in order to be less exposed in our manœuvres. We disembarked with all imaginable success within three-quarters of a league of the ground without any opposition; bivouacked through the night, after having sent out some grenadiers and pickets in advance, to mark our camp. Two hours before day Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Bourlamaque and Senezergue accompanied the two Engineers to reconnoitre the ground suitable for opening the trench and placing the batteries. Decombles, who was chief, was unfortunately killed there by one of our most trusty Indians, who was overpowered by the desire to procure a scalp, and did not recognize the officer until he was killed. This event appeared to throw a damper on our hopes. The willing disposition of our soldiers made up for it; we continued our labors without any interruption; the army was occupied in making gabions; we had not the least knowledge of the enemy, who appeared ignorant of our designs, when we were discovered by a little canoe which they sent out every other day into the lake. It did not suppose that 'twas the army; on the report it made at Chuagen, the Commandant dispatched two large sloops to batter our bateaux on the beach. Our guns did wonderful execution and obliged them to return to their harbor.

On the night of the 12 and 13th we opened the trench at a distance of a pistol shot from Fort Ontario. The fire of the besieged was pretty lively, without, however, disturbing our workmen; we lost some men in the course of the morning; they fired astonishingly when evacuating the fort; we discovered their retreat by the trips they were making from the other side of the river. Curiosity got the better of us and we seized the fort without fear of consequences, although we were assured it was mined. Their precipitate retreat made them abandon a quantity of stores, the greatest part of their papers and whatever they could not remove in the first trip. We became that day acquainted with their situation by an express our Indians took, intercepting their letters. They demanded reinforcements, and besought Mr de Johson to send some to them. The feeble resistance they offered determined our Generals to invest Chuagen closely. The soldiers were encouraged; a new trench was opened and it was resolved to discharge all our guns en Barbet<sup>1</sup> at the break of day on the 14th of November, and the rest on platforms which had been hastily constructed. Our troops distinguished themselves on the occasion by incredible diligence. Those who worked by day were half covered. I entered the trench at three o'clock in the morning, and day had hardly broke when our cannonade began. They answered us with an unparalleled fire, well served, and we could not persuade ourselves that people who had abandoned Fort Ontario would defend that of Chouagen. We persisted in that opinion; our artillery battered their camp, and the very moment we were thinking only of our destruction we arrived at that which witnessed the glorious termination of our labors. In my picket, seven men were either killed or wounded within an hour and a half, and I had yet the entire of the day before me, when we heard the rappel beat and saw the White flag waving from the tower of their crenellated building; cries of Vive le Roi communicated the tidings to the trench. The loss of their commander and of their artillery officer; the tears of their women; the terror of such as saw their husbands exposed to the same danger, prevailed on the garrison to surrender. We have taken 1,640 prisoners, 120 of whom are women; five standards, 120 pieces of ordnance and six large sloops. Their magazines, provided with everything, supply us wherewith to subsist the army during the next campaign. The King of England's loss is estimated at 20,000,000. Those who are the least superstitious attribute our success to Providence. 'Tis true, Sir, that they could hold out somewhat longer. We have, meanwhile, lost 80 men, and our little army would have been swept away, had the valor so justly attributed to the troops of Old England extended as far as their Colonies. Ours to-day is more flourishing than ever, trade entirely reestablished, Lake Ontario ours, without their being able to oppose it. We are recovering with difficulty from our surprise. The bulwark of New England was at first only a house the Iroquois permitted a private individual to build, which the King seized some years after, to trade in; he had strengthened it with all the works we are demolishing. Their losses are unheard of; the Canadians and Indians have had a very considerable slice of the cake. The latter have supped full of horrors; and have massacred more than 100 persons who were included in the capitulation, without our being able to prevent them or having the right of remonstrating with them. These species of animal, whom I look on as mad dogs, are, when drunk, beyond control. We are waiting orders for our destination; either to go down to the Point, or to occupy the quarters which the Marquis de Moncalme reserves for the three battalions that have formed the siege, and which have exhibited every sort of emulation to follow in the footsteps of Marshal de Richelieu in the Mediterranean. From all these events I conclude that peace will be near, and that it is impossible for England to resist all these checks. We shall be the sooner in France.

Journal of the Siege of Oswego.

An Account of the Capture of the Forts of Choueguen, or Oswego; and of what occurred this year in Canada.

The new preparations the English have made to invade Canada, notwithstanding the ill success of their expeditions last year, have been as public in Europe as in America. They were expected there, and independent of the arrangements made in that Colony for its defence, the King sent thither a reinforcement of troops with provisions of all sorts.

From the close of last year's campaign, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor and Lieutenant-General of New France, made arrangements for the continual harassing of the English in their own Colonies. He kept, throughout the winter, in the field, detachments of Canadians, soldiers and Indians. These detachments made excursions on all sides. The Indians have killed a great number of people, and a great quantity of cattle have been driven off. A considerable number of houses and stores have been burnt. In divers places on the frontiers of the English Colonies, the settlements have been abandoned, and all these movements have effectually served not only to increase the discontent engendered among them by the injustice of their Governors' projects, but have also created embarrassments and difficulties which have prevented the execution of those projects in the spring.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil has not confined himself to this. In taking all the other precautions which appeared to him practicable in order to provide for the security of all the Canadian frontiers, he has formed the project of attacking the English themselves in their establishment at Choueguen on Lake Ontario.

All the world knows that this establishment is an encroachment made by them in a time of profound peace. They contemplated, at first, only a simple trading post. It was with this sole view that they made the proposition in 1728, to the Iroquois Indians, who would not have looked quietly on if they saw, all at once, a fortification erected in the vicinity of their habitations. Their true design in that establishment was, however, perceived at the time in Canada; it was to put them in a position not only to usurp the commerce of the lakes which the French had never shared with any European Nation, but also to cut off, in the very centre of the Colony of Canada, the communication with the posts dependent thereon. Nevertheless, the French Governors contented themselves with protesting against that usurpation. The King caused complaints against it to be made, at the time, to the Court of England, where they have been constantly renewed on all occasions. But the English, not troubling themselves about the justice of these complaints, and always abusing the spirit of peace which has ever regulated the conduct of France, fortified themselves, by degrees, at Chouaguen; so that they had constructed three forts there, to wit:

1st Fort Ontario, situate on the right of the river in the centre of a very high plateau of land. It consisted of a square of thirty toises on each side, the faces of which, broken (brisées) in the centre, were flanked by a redent placed at the point of the brisure. It was constructed of pickets 18 inches in diameter, hewn on both sides, perfectly well joined the one to the other, and 8 to 9 feet out of the ground. The ditch that surrounded the fort was 18 feet wide and 8 deep. The excavated earth was thrown up as a glacis on the counterscarp, and as a very steep talus on the berm. Loop-holes and embrasures were cut in the pickets on a level with the earth thrown up on the berm, and a wooden scaffolding ran all around, so as to admit of firing over the top. There were 8 guns and 4 mortars for double grenades.

2<sup>d</sup> Old Fort Choueguen, situate on the left bank of the river, consisting of a house with machicoulis, and perforated on the ground floor and first story, the walls of which were 3 feet thick, and surrounded at a distance of three toises by another wall 4 feet thick and 10 high, perforated and flanked by two large square towers. There was likewise a raised work which protected the fort on the land side. Here the enemy had placed 18 pieces of cannon and 15 mortars and howitzers.

3<sup>d</sup> Fort George, situated 300 toises beyond Fort Choueguen, on a height by which the latter was commanded. It was of pickets, and very poorly intrenched with earth on two faces.

It was principally by means of the advantages this establishment afforded the English that they flattered themselves to invade Canada. Their design, at first, was to seize Forts Niagara and Frontenac. Masters of these two posts, they would have absolutely cut off the communication not only with the Upper countries, but also with Louisiana; they would have destroyed one of the principal branches of Canadian trade, and by depriving this Colony of a portion of its Indian allies, would be in a position to attack it in its establishments from all sides.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil was informed in the beginning of the winter that, in order to execute this project, the enemy were causing troops, with considerable supplies of all sorts of munitions, to be collected in the forts of Choueguen. He at first dispatched a detachment of Canadian troops and of Indians, under the command of Sieur de Léry, to attack a fort which was the principal entrepôt of these supplies. This fort was carried by assault in the month of March, and destroyed, with all the buildings dependent thereon; and all the stores, found there in great abundance, were carried off, burnt or thrown into the river. The Marquis de Vaudreuil sent out another detachment of 700 men, under the command of Sieur de Villiers, a Provincial Captain, to go and intercept the transports which were to pass by the Choueguen river; this detachment did, in fact, destroy there, in the forepart of July, a convoy of about 200 vessels, in which more than 500 English were killed or taken prisoners.

The success of these expeditions confirmed the Marquis de Vaudreuil in his design against Choueguen. He could succeed therein only so far as it should not be suspected by the enemy, and he would not afford them time to throw into that post the new succors they destined for the attack on the two French forts. Therefore, in the distribution he had made in the beginning of the spring, of the forces of the Colony for the defence of all his frontiers, he directed his principal attention towards Lake Ontario.

Under pretence of necessary reinforcements for the particular defence of Forts Niagara and Frontenac, he concentrated troops there and had conveyed artillery thither, with munitions of war and provisions. He reinforced Sieur de Villiers' detachment on the Choueguen river, and, after being assured of the actual condition of the English post and of the reunion of the troops he destined for the expedition, and of everything necessary for its execution, he recalled the Marquis de Montcalm from the frontier of Lake Champlain, for which he had destined him, as being the post where the most interesting operations were to take place, and made him set out immediately for Fort Frontenac, with the orders and instructions necessary for the expedition against Chouaguen, with which he was to be entrusted.

The Marquis de Montcalm, on arriving at Frontenac on the 29th of July, found all assembled with the exception of Sieur de Villiers' detachment, which the Marquis de Vaudreuil had reinforced, and the command of which had been taken by Sieur de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of Three Rivers. This detachment had already been as far as the Choueguen river and the Bay of Niaouré, which the Marquis de Vaudreuil had designated as the general rendezvous.

The troops destined for the expedition consisted of about 3,000 men, including the detachment commanded by Sieur de Rigaud, which was to act as the van-guard.

The Marquis de Montcalm did not lose any time in getting ready to set out from Fort Frontenac. After having made the necessary provision to secure a retreat, in case a superior force rendered that inevitable, he gave orders to two armed sloops on Lake Ontario, one of 12 and the other of 16 guns, to cruise off Choueguen; arranged a chain of scouts, Canadians and Indians, on the route between that place and the town of Albany, for the purpose of intercepting expresses, and embarked on the 4th of August with the first division of his troops, consisting of the battalion of La Sarre and that of Guyenne, with 4 pieces of cannon, and arrived on the 6th at the Bay of Niaouré, where the second division, composed of the battalion of Bearn, of Militia and the bateaux, with the artillery and provisions, arrived on the 8th.

On the same day, the Marquis de Montcalm sent off the van-guard, under the command of Sieur de Rigaud, to advance to a cove called L'anse aux cabannes, within three leagues of Choueguen. The first division having reached there at two o'clock of the morning of the 10th, the van-guard repaired by land and across the woods, four hours afterwards, to another cove situated within half a league of Choueguen, in order to cover the landing of the artillery and troops there. The first division reached this cove at midnight. The Marquis de Montcalm succeeded in posting immediately a battery on Lake Ontario, and the troops bivouacked during the night at the head of the bateaux.

On the 11th, at day-break, the Canadians and Indians advanced to within a quarter of a league of Fort Ontario, situated, as has been stated, on the right bank of the River Choueguen, and invested it. Sieur de Combes, the Engineer, who had been sent at three o'clock in the morning to determine this investment and the front of attack, was killed on returning from his scout, by one of our Indians who had escorted him, and who, in the dark, unfortunately mistook him for an Englishman. Sieur Desandrouins, another Engineer, laid out across the woods, partly through swamps, a road reconnoitred the evening before, for the passage of the artillery; and this road, begun on the morning of the 11th, was pushed on with so much zeal, that it was completed the next day. Meanwhile, the camp was laid out, the right resting on Lake Ontario, covered by the battery thrown up on the preceding evening, and which protected the bateaux from insult; the left rested on an impassable swamp.

The march of the French, which had up to that time been concealed from the enemy by the precaution of proceeding only by night, and of entering and halting in the rivers where they were hid, was announced to the English on the same day by the Indians who went up to the foot of the fort to fire. Three armed sloops went out of the Choueguen river at noon and came to cruise in front of the camp; they discharged some of their guns, but the fire from our battery forced them to move off.

The 12th, at the break of day, the Bearn battalion arrived with the bateaux of artillery and provisions, which were landed forthwith in presence of the English sloops that were cruising before the camp. The beach battery was increased; the park of artillery and the provision dépôt were arranged, and Captain Pouchot, of the regiment of Bearn, received orders to act as Engineer during the siege. Preparations were made to open the trench that very night.

The Marquis de Montcalm committed the superintendence of it to Sieur de Bourlamaque, Colonel of Infantry, and ordered out six pickets of workmen, of fifty men each, for that night, with two companies of grenadiers to support them.

The work at that trench, with all the diligence possible, could not be commenced before midnight. It was rather a parallel of about 100 toises front, opened within 90 toises of the ditch of the fort, in ground encumbered with abattis and trunks of trees. This parallel, completed at five o'clock in the morning, was perfected in daylight by the working parties, who constructed the zigzags and began forming batteries. The enemy's fire, which was very brisk since the break of day, ceased about six o'clock in the evening, and it was perceived that the garrison had evacuated Fort Ontario and passed to the other side of the river to Fort Choueguen. It abandoned on retiring eight pieces of artillery and four mortars.

The fort having been immediately occupied by the grenadiers of the trench, pioneers were commanded to continue the communication of the parallel to the river's side, where, at the setting in of night, a grand battery was commenced, so placed as not only to batter Fort Choueguen and the road between the latter and Fort St. George, but also to take in the rear the retrenchments which surrounded the first of these forts. Twenty pieces of cannon were conveyed on men's shoulders during the night, and this labor employed all the troops, with the exception of the pickets and guards of the camp.

On the 14th, at day-break, the Marquis de Montcalm ordered Sieur de Rigaud to wade across to the other side of the river with the Canadians and Indians, to gain the woods and harass the communication to Fort St. George, where the enemy appeared to be making great preparations. Sieur de Rigaud executed this order at once. Notwithstanding there was considerable water in that river and the current was very rapid, he plunged in, crossed over with the Canadians and Indians, some swimming, others wading up to the waist or neck, and reached his destination, without the enemy's fire being able to arrest one single Canadian or Indian.

At nine o'clock the besiegers had nine guns in a position to bear, and although the fire of the garrison was, then, superior, the white flag was hoisted at ten o'clock. Sieur de Rigaud forwarded to the Marquis de Montcalm two officers whom the Commandant of the fort had sent to him to demand a capitulation, which was concluded on the spot, and the conditions were: that the garrison should be prisoners of war and that the French troops should take immediate possession of the posts. It has been already stated that they had occupied that of Ontario the evening before. Sieur de Bourlamaque, appointed Commandant of Forts George and Choueguen, took possession of them with two companies of grenadiers and the pickets of the trench, and he was charged with the demolition of all the posts and the removal of the artillery and munitions of war, and provisions that were there.

The celerity of our works, in ground considered by the enemy impracticable; the rapid construction of our batteries; the idea those works conveyed of the number of the French troops; the death of Colonel Mercer, Commandant of Choueguen, who was killed at eight o'clock in the morning; and, still more than all, Sieur de Rigaud's bold manœuvre and the dread of the Canadians and Indians, who were already firing on the fort, doubtless determined the besieged not to make a protracted defence.

They have lost one hundred and fifty-two men, including some soldiers killed by the Indians in attempting to escape into the woods. The number of prisoners exceeded sixteen hundred, eighty of whom were officers. Seven vessels of war have also been taken, of which one carried fourteen, one ten, one eight guns; the other three carrying swivels; besides two hundred craft for transportation; and the officers and crews of these vessels have been included in the capitulation of the garrison, which consisted of two regiments of Regulars, Shirley's and Pepperel's, and Schuyler's regiment of Militia. The artillery captured consists of fifty-five cannon, fourteen mortars, five howitzers and forty-seven swivels, which have been removed, with a vast quantity of ball, shell, bullets and powder, and a considerable amount of provisions.

The Marquis de Montcalm has lost but three men, namely, one Canadian, one soldier and a gunner, exclusive of Sieur de Combes; and only about twenty have been wounded in the different corps of Regulars under his orders. All those wounds are very slight. Sieur de Bourlamaque, Captains Palmarol of the grenadiers, and Duparquet of the regiment of La Sarre, are of this number.

On the 21st of August, all the forts having been razed, the prisoners, artillery and provisions removed, the Marquis de Montcalm embarked with his troops and proceeded, in three divisions, to the Bay of Niaouré, whence the different corps repaired to the respective destinations indicated to them by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who has caused the four colors of Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments, and that of Schuyler's regiment of Militia to be deposited in the churches of Quebec and Three Rivers with the ordinary ceremonies.

The success of this expedition has diffused universal joy throughout the Colony, where all its advantages are better appreciated than anywhere else. Canada finds itself, thereby, relieved from well founded uneasiness caused by the establishment of Choueguen. It sees the communication with the Upper countries and all the Indian Nations, its allies, protected from the troubles to which such communication was exposed. The Colony has no longer any fear of being attacked from that quarter, at least with the superiority the English possessed by the establishment just wrested from them and which placed them in a position to dominate on the lakes, where they had already organized a navy. It is, henceforth, able to concentrate its forces for the defence of its frontiers, and has the satisfaction of being indebted for this happy change in its situation to the powerful succor the King has had the goodness to send it.

It has given expression to the most touching sentiments of respect and gratitude for these new marks of his Majesty's protection, and seconds, with all the zeal to be expected from a people, the most faithful and attached to their Prince, the indefatigable pains taken for its defence by the Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Marquis de Montcalm, and the other officers intrusted therewith under that Governor's orders.

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 28th August, 1756.

My Lord,

I communicated to you, in my preceding letters, the project of creating a diversion in the direction of Chouaguen, and the whole of the preparations to besiege that place, notwithstanding all the obstacles which naturally presented themselves. It is, perhaps, the first time that 3000 men and inferior artillery have besieged eighteen hundred who could be promptly reinforced by 2000 and could oppose our landing, having a superior navy on Lake Ontario. The success has been beyond all expectation, as you will see by the Journal I have the honor to transmit to you.<sup>1</sup> I will add, that the necessity of success demanded by the safety of the Colony, the honor of the King's arms and by myself, had determined me, and the principal officers of the two regular regiments concurred in the resolution, to go with all the Canadians and Indians, the grenadier companies and four pickets per battalion, to meet and give battle to the enemy at a portage three leagues from my camp; I had small scouting parties of Canadians and Indians continually out, but I was not put to that trouble. The precaution I had taken, before leaving the Bay of Niaouré, to make my intentions known to my friends, the Indians, with whom no one can stand better, to stop and intercept every letter, procured for me that Colonel Mercer, Commandant of Chouaguen, who had no idea until the 11th, that he was about to be besieged, should write on the 12th, at four o'clock in the morning, to divers English Generals, and his despatches were handed to me at ten o'clock by some Nepissings. My hopes were increased by the manner in which the Commandant expressed himself. Nevertheless, were it not that this Mercer had been killed, the capture of Chouaguen had been deferred a day or two at most. You will remark by the Journal I transmit to you, that I had thrown the Canadians and Indians across the river; that as early as the morning of the 14th I had nine guns in battery. My arrangements were made to have thirteen more on the 15th, with a battery of mortars and howitzers. I had issued my orders for the regiment of Béarn to proceed at nightfall, with three pieces of cannon, outside by the lake and land above Chouaguen at an anchorage I had had reconnoitred and sounded, for the purpose of making an attack in the direction of Fort George by communicating with M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, who was in command of the Canadians and Indians. My whole conduct on that occasion, and the arrangements I had concluded on, in the face of eighteen hundred men, are so utterly at variance with ordinary rules, that the audacity with which that expedition has been executed, must be considered rashness in Europe. Therefore, I beseech you, my Lord, as a particular favor, to assure his Majesty, should he ever, as I hope he will, employ me in his armies, that I shall conduct myself on different principles. You can even assure him that, at all events, I should have secured my retreat, saved his artillery and the honor of his arms, sacrificing, perhaps, two or three hundred men. The nature of the country, the weakness of the English troops, the dread they entertain of the Indians, made me certain of it. It is to be concluded that the English, when transplanted, are no longer like those in Europe. We must look at my Lord Loudon's Scotchmen, for it appears that General has arrived, according to the report of some prisoners from whose representation I should infer that Baron de Dieskau will be in a sad state during his whole life.

Our land forces acquitted themselves with incredible zeal, of all I required of them. Therefore, my Lord, I beseech you to grant me the favors I ask of you for them. I address you a Memoir on the subject, to which I have annexed a very long letter in order to detail, more fully, the special reasons for each favor.

I have one request to make in favor of Captain le Mercier, of the regiment of the old Marine, and brother of Captain le Mercier, of the Colonial troops, who commands the artillery. If it be possible for you, my Lord, to grant it on my recommendation, it will give me influence among the Colonial officers, who will believe that chance may sometimes enable me to procure favors for them. The Marquis de Brancas will present you a special letter on this occasion. I have usefully employed them and the Militia of the country, not, however, at any works exposed to the enemy's fire. 'Tis a troop knowing neither discipline nor subordination. Within six months I would make grenadiers of them, and now I would carefully abstain from placing as much dependence on them as the unfortunate M. de Dieskaw did, by having given too much ear to the confident talk of Canadians, who believe themselves, in all respects, the first nation in the world. And my respectable Governor-General is a native of the country; has married there, and is everywhere surrounded by relatives. To have ordered Canadians to be punished—to have proclamation made by beat of drum, on the day following the capture of Chouaguen, forbidding, on pain of death, the Canadians who brought up the bateaux for me, to return home, appeared very strange to the officers and even to M. de Rigaud. I must do the Marquis de Vaudreuil the justice to say that he approved my proceedings. The tone of firmness, which I knew how to accompany more than once with mildness and patience, has a good effect. The Indian is enraptured of me, and, learning that I return to the camp at Carillon, has induced them to march thither. The Canadians are satisfied with me; their officers esteem me, fear me, and would be well pleased could Frenchmen and their General be dispensed with, which would gratify me also. I have deemed it my duty to express myself pleased to the Keeper of the Seals, with all the Colonial troops, and not to appear dissatisfied with anything. The Missionaries of St. Sulpice, to the number of two, have always accompanied their Indians. Abbé Picquet, who had the honor, some years ago, to present three Indians to the King, came to Chouaguen to erect a cross there, to which has been affixed In hoc signo vincunt; and a pole on one side with the King's Arms, and the inscription + Manibus date lilia plenis.

I do not give you any description of the forts of Chouaguen. The Engineer's letter and plan supply that.

As for the rest, my Lord, the success of this expedition is decisive for the Colony. Chouaguen has been the apple of discord. Its position on Lake Ontario—the manner in which the English were fortifying themselves—the facility the Indians experienced at that place, to dispose of their peltries to much better advantage than in our forts; all these reasons created the apprehension that, sooner or later, England would possess the superiority in the trade of the Upper countries. The capture of Chouaguen destroys their projects in this regard. It is a loss to them of fifteen millions. The greatest joy I experience at having succeeded in this expedition, emanates from the circumstance that such success is due to a general officer, whose selection you alone have determined.

The Account I transmit to you has been submitted to the Marquis de Vaudreuil. He is of opinion, as I have mentioned to the Keeper of the Seals, that it would be proper for the government to have it printed, as it has done that of the events of the last campaign, in order to afford publicity in Europe to an event of the greatest brilliancy and most important consequences in North America, and for which the Marquis de Vaudreuil has deemed it a duty to order a Te Deum and public rejoicings.

I annex to this despatch copy of the articles of capitulation granted to M. de Lithleales, Shirley's Lieutenant-Colonel, who commanded on the death of Colonel Mercer. I beg you to observe that no inventory of the artillery has been made, which, at all events, will dispense with any restitution on our part. No capitulation will ever be so difficult to enforce. The Indians wished to violate it. I have put an end to that affair. It will cost the King from eight to ten thousand livres, which will preserve to us the affection of the Indian Nations more strongly than ever; and there is nothing that I would not have done rather than commit an act contrary to French good faith.

You will also find a return of the artillery, ammunition and provisions. I shall not conceal from you that there has been a little plunder, which it was even necessary to tolerate. We are not in Europe, and it is very difficult to prevent 300 Indians and 1500 Canadians regaling themselves (faire une curée). Moreover, this is the custom in the Colonies, on one side and the other, but the property of the English officers, as well as the munitions of war and provisions, have been saved.

M. Bigot, who concurred with the best grace in all I had proposed to him for the good of the service, had made arrangements for the payment, on my order, of all the extraordinary expenses I should deem proper. He had advanced me thirty thousand livres for that. As it was necessary to stimulate my little army, every sort of labor, either for the siege or for the demolition of the works, has been paid higher than in Europe, and this, joined to gratuities and considerable sums given to the Indians, amounts to eleven thousand eight hundred and sixty-two livres. The military chest captured at Chouaguen, and delivered, with a minute, to the Treasurer, contained the sum of eighteen thousand and some livres.

As soon as the evacuation of Chouaguen was completed, I hastened the march of the troops. I left nothing behind but Lieutenant-Colonel de l'hôpital, of the regiment of Bearn, whom I ordered to Frontenac with some pickets as a guard over six hundred prisoners removed thither in the sloops until they can be forwarded down here with a portion of our artillery.

The regiment of La Sarre is still at Niaouré, through want of bateaux, and for the purpose of evacuating the dépôt of provisions I had formed there under the supposition of a longer sojourn. Béarn is in full march hence to Carillon. Guyenne will leave in two days and I follow with the grenadier company and a picket of La Sarre. This will make an addition of nine hundred men for the defence of that frontier, which appears to be threatened; but the whole of this reinforcement cannot arrive there before the 12 to the 15th September, on account of difficulties in the matter of provisions, roads and transportation. All the Canadians are busy with their harvest. I make a halt here for a few days to expedite this movement, and desire the end of the campaign as much as any other person. My health no longer bears up against excessive fatigues and traveling three hundred leagues in two months.

Chevalier de Levis has rendered me a very precise report. He neglects nothing on his part. He is hastening the fortifications of Carillon; has detachments out continually against the enemy and they are making prisoners. His order of battle, in case of attack, ought to parry every expedition, so far as his force, which is inferior to that of the enemy, may permit, and facilitate my expedition just made. He has not neglected anything which could persuade the enemy that it was the camp of Carillon which would act offensively; [has sent out] scouts to discover any advanced march; and in order to consult them on his offensive project, held Councils with his Indians, among whom are always some who are sold to the English interest.

As soon as Chouaguen was taken, I communicated this intelligence to the Upper Nations and to the Five Iroquois Nations who entertain greater fear than love for us. It is more convenient for them to derive their supplies from the English. They sent the Marquis de Vaudreuil some ambassadors whom I met at La Présentation, as I was on my way to Frontenac. They were as much English spies as ambassadors. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, therefore, detained them, on divers pretexts, until the news of the capture of Chouaguen. The English, it must be expected, will make every effort to recover that place and build a better fort there than the one we have destroyed, and I expect to go there again early in the spring.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Letter from M. Désandrouins respecting an expedition against Fort Ontario, with a Narrative of the Campaign of 1756 in New France.

Montreal, 28th of August, 1756.

Sir,

We just return from an expedition still more successful and extraordinary than that of General Bradock last year.

M. Lombart decombes, Engineer, has been first to reconnoitre, in company with M. de Villiers, the forts and approaches of Chouaguen, on the 25th of July, and on the report he made of them the 29th to M. de Montcalm at Frontenac, operations were determined on and the necessary dispositions taken to lay siege to it at all events. The whole of the army arrived at 11 o'clock at night, on the 10th of August, at the place of landing which M. Mercier and I, with M. de Villiers, had been to select. M. de Combes and I were ordered to reconnoitre, at day-break, Fort Ontario, the place to be attacked, and the roads necessary to be cut across the woods to reach the rear of the traverse. For an escort we were furnished with the grenadier company of La Sarre, several Canadian officers, and some twenty trusty Indians, as guides and flankers to the right and left, to discover scouting parties from the garrison, which we had to fear. We advanced, across stumps of trees, to within 80 toises of the place; I was to the left, within twenty paces of M. de Combes, having left the grenadiers within a gun-shot in the rear. He had completed his reconnoissance before me, and as he was returning between three Colonial officers, a Nipissing Indian, who happened to be eight or ten paces behind, mistook him, in the twilight, for an English officer; his first intention was to take him prisoner, but as he saw him accompanied by others, he discharged a gun, loaded with a ball and a handful of buckshot at him, which prostrated him. The sentries of the fort, supposing themselves fired at, discharged their pieces at us, so that I thought a patrol had discovered M. de Combes, and I retired immediately through fear of being surprised. I was overwhelmed with grief on seeing this admirable officer speechless and insensible, and on learning the mistake. He expired half an hour afterwards in his tent. He was deeply regretted by the entire army. M. de Pouchot, fourth Captain<sup>1</sup> of the regiment of Bearn, an officer acknowledged to possess much taste for fortifications, and known by those he had had constructed at Niagara, received orders from the General to act as Engineer, and our success proves that he did not disappoint those who confided in him.

We have suffered considerably during this expedition, from at half-past four in the morning of the 12th up to 7 o'clock of the evening of the 14th, continually in such quick movement and dispatching such an amount of work, that the enemy was under the impression that we were six thousand effective Regulars, and we had not thirteen hundred.

I believe we are going to the Point, alias Fort St. Frederic to terminate the campaign. The English are, it must be confessed, a people that understand war very imperfectly; they surrendered themselves prisoners the very moment they were slaughtering us with their artillery. They did not offer even a show of opposition to M. de Rigaut's passage of the river; neither did they take the least precaution to traverse themselves in their intrenched camp, nor to properly turn their platform, inasmuch as we took them de revers; they were firing their cannon almost in an opposite direction, and were exposed down to their feet. Nothing remains for them but correctly to adjust balls and shells, and to keep up a brisk fire.

I do not make any mention of the horrors and cruelties of the Indians. The idea entertained thereof in France is very correct. It is a misfortune to make war with such people, especially when they are drunk—a condition in which nothing stays their fury. Nevertheless, the Indian who killed poor de Combes, was so afflicted that he urged his comrades to rid him of his existence, which, he said, was a burthen to him since he had the misfortune to kill a French chief of such great importance.

Adieu. I leave in a few days, with M. de Montcalm, for Lake St. Sacrament.

I am, &c.,

Campaign of 1756 in Canada.

Particulars of the Campaign of 1756 in New France, transmitted on the 25th of August of the same year.

The Marquis de Montcalm having safely arrived at Quebec in the month of May, with the convoy of troops and munitions sent from France, found the forces of the Colony already very judiciously distributed for its defence, viz: the battalions of La Reine and Languedoc, with a number of Canadians and Indians, forming a camp at Carillon, the most distant of our frontier forts in the direction of Lake St. Sacrament; Guienne at Frontenac and Bearn at Niagara. M. Dumas, Commandant at Fort du Quesne, had collected six or seven hundred Indians; M. de Villiers, with four hundred Indians, was posted at the Bay de Niaouré and seriously harassed the enemy's convoys to Chouagen, an important post, the reduction of which was meditated; and, finally, M. de Boishebert had gathered the few Acadians the English could not entrap and disperse in their Colonies like the rest, after the capture of Fort Beauséjour, and was maintaining himself with the Indians in the woods and making frequent incursions against the enemy.

On news that the enemy were making extensive preparations at Albany and at Forts Lydius and William Henry, the last of which places is situated at the head of Lake St. Sacrament, and that they were concentrating the greatest part of their forces, it was apprehended that they designed making an attempt on our frontier at Lake Champlain, for which reason the battalion of the Royal Roussillon, together with a reinforcement of Canadians and Regulars, was sent to the camp at Carillon shortly after our arrival, and Chevalier de Levis, Brigadier, proceeded to take command of that army, which amounted to three thousand and some hundred men.

From the other point, intelligence had been received that the enemy were building sloops at Chouaguen, in sufficient number to assume a decided superiority in Lake Ontario; that they were collecting a prodigious quantity of provisions there, and that, in fine, the strong garrison they had at that place could, in a short time, become an army capable of attacking Frontenac or Niagara, whenever they should think fit. La Sarre proceeded, in consequence, to join Guienne at Frontenac, under the orders of M. Boulamaque, and the two French Engineers were likewise sent thither to fortify them there. Béarn received orders, at the same time, to complete the fortifications of Niagara, which were commenced last year by Sieur Pouchot, one of the fourth Captains (premiers factionnaires) of that regiment.

These measures being adopted, the Marquis de Montcalm repaired to the camp at Carillon in the month of June, and after assuring himself of the dispositions of the enemy, who might number eight thousand men, arranged with Chevalier de Levis the principal manœuvres of an effective defence, and immediately left for Montreal with the design of trying to cut off the enemy in the direction of Chouaguen, unless they opposed some too serious obstacles thereto, by reducing their army at Lake St. Sacrament, in order to counteract our undertaking; this they could not effect without relieving Chevalier de Levis from uneasiness and embarrassment.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil highly approved of the Chouaguen expedition, which he and the Colony had much at heart, in consequence of the importance of that post, by means whereof the English were trading in every direction with the Indians, whom they attracted by rum, and the high price they have always paid for peltries. In addition to this, its situation at the mouth of the Odondaga river afforded them an easy communication with the Five Nations and with New-York, by means of the Hudson river, and placed them in a position to attack Frontenac and Niagara, by Lake Ontario.

The Intendant, coinciding with the Marquis de Vaudreuil's views and the Marquis de Montcalm's designs, issued effectual orders for supplying munitions of war and provisions. M. de Rigaud brought a reinforcement of seven to eight hundred Canadians to M. de Villiers' camp, the command of which he assumed. This officer had, some days before, thrown in great disorder a convoy of five hundred of the enemy's bateaux, which were returning from Chouaguen to Fort Bull, killed between fifty and sixty of their men, wounded a great number and took some prisoners, without any loss than one officer and three militiamen. He had been several times even under their cannon to kill their people and to make some prisoners, and afforded the means of reconnoitring them quite near.

The regiment of Béarn was ordered to return from Niagara, to leave only one picket there and to repair to Frontenac, where the Marquis de Montcalm, who arrived at that post on the 29th July, had just given the finishing stroke to the expeditious dispatch of provisions and warlike stores. At length, all being in readiness for the 5th of August, when the first division of the army took its departure with four pieces of cannon, the rest of the artillery, provisions and stores remained for the second division, which, escorted by Bearn, departed on the 7th. The two largest of our sloops were sent on the lake to protect our expedition.

The first division arrived before Chouaguen on the night of the 10th and 11th of August, without having been discovered by the enemy, owing to the precaution taken to advance only by night and to retire into the woods by day, drawing the bateaux ashore and covering them with thick foliage.

That very night the Marquis de Montcalm had his four pieces of cannon posted on the bank; they served, in fact, the next day, to keep off the sloops which the enemy sent to reconnoitre. At the dawn of day Fort Ontario, situated on this side of the river, was examined to determine the attack thereon. This reconnoissance cost the life of Sieur Lombard de Combes, chief of the two French Engineers. The whole of the army was deeply affected by this loss, in consequence of the confidence reposed in his capacity. Sieur de Pouchot received orders, next day, to act as Engineer.

12th Bearn arrived in the morning with its convoy. It was calculated that the army then amounted to 3,100 men; namely, 1,350 regular infantry; 1,500 Canadians or Colonial troops, and 250 Indians.

On the night of the 12th, everything being ready for opening the trench, 300 pioneers were detailed for that duty, and a parallel of 100 toises long was made, during the night, within 90 toises of Fort Ontario. This was a star fort of eight angles, which was certainly protected from all surprise by a grooved and tongued palisade composed of posts eighteen inches thick, a good ditch, cannon and a garrison of two or three hundred men, but the slope of the elevated plateau, in the middle of which it stood, afforded the facility of approaching it unseen to within 90 toises. At five o'clock of the evening of the 13th the enemy abandoned it and retired to Fort Chouaguen, on the other side of the river, whilst we were engaged in erecting a battery of six guns.

The night of the 13th and 14th was employed in extending the lines [to the river side] and in constructing a barbet battery of nine guns, which was erected on the edge of the declivity at this side of the river; it commanded with considerable advantage, and took de revers, all the enemy's retrenchments around Fort Chouaguen. They had no idea of being thus taken in the rear and had not dreamed of traversing themselves, nor of changing their platforms which were turned in a contrary direction. Therefore, as soon as they discovered, on the morning on the 14th, that M. de Rigaud had crossed the river with the Canadians and Indians in order to surround them, and that there was no part of their camp where they were not exposed, even to the buckle of their shoe, they hoisted the white flag and surrendered prisoners of war. They had abandoned, during the morning, a miserable little fort called Fort George, which they had on a hill beyond Chouaguen.

This siege has not cost us more than thirty men killed or wounded. They lost about one hundred and fifty men, among whom was Colonel Mercer, their Commander, who was killed by a cannon ball three hours before the capitulation.

The French troops served at this siege with so much zeal, and dispatched so much business in a brief space of time, that the enemy judged us to exceed six thousand men. The Canadians, likewise, evinced much good will and applied themselves with ardor to whatever was ordered them.

We found, in Chouagen, 1,658 prisoners, 7 brass cannon, 48 of iron, 14 mortars, 5 howitzers, 47 swivels, a quantity of warlike stores, provisions for two or three years, and in the port a bark of 18 guns, a brigantine of 14, a schooner of 8 guns, a sloop of 10, another of 4, and a boat of 12 swivels.

As soon as the enemy had left, we proceeded to evacuate the place, to raze its fortifications, to burn its stores and houses. The whole was finished by the 21st of August, when the three battalions took their departure. Guienne and Bearn had orders to proceed, with dispatch, to the camp at Carillon, where they arrived, as well as the Marquis de Montcalm, in the beginning of 7<sup>bre</sup>. La Sarre remained behind until the entire evacuation of the Bay of Niaouré, the principal dépôt of the effects captured at Chouaguen; the Canadians went to save their harvests and the Indians returned to their villages, as is their custom when they have struck a blow.

The Marquis de Montcalm found things in a very good condition at the camp at Carillon; the English did not make even a show of coming to attack Chevalier de Levis, and operations were confined, on the one side and the other, to some Indian forays. We had just recently lost Mess<sup>rs</sup> Biville and de Torsac, a Lieutenant in the regiment of La Reine, whom the Mohawks, an Indian Nation, had scalped whilst hunting, in fancied security, within a quarter of a league of the camp. We had ample revenge a few days afterwards; a large party of Canadians and Indians going to see whether the enemy was not forming a post in the islands of St. Sacrament, a hundred or a hundred and ten of the best and most alert among them were detached to strike a blow in the neighborhood of the enemy's camp. They met a detachment of fifty men, all of whom they either took or killed, with the exception of one or two who are supposed to have escaped. We lost two Indians on that occasion.

The season is now too far advanced for anything to occur for the remainder of the campaign except some unimportant forays. Besides, it appears that the number of enemies on one side and the other, the dread they entertain of us and our good arrangement, form obstacles to all expeditions whatsoever. It therefore remains for both sides to make, for the next campaign, the utmost efforts to gain advantage of each other's opponents.

The news from Fort Duquesne and Beautiful river are very favorable. M. Dumas has laid waste, with his Indians, a good part of Pennsylvania, Virginia and Maryland. In vain did these Provinces, which have no Indians to aid them, levy and pay a thousand men, at the opening of this campaign, who dressed and painted themselves in the Indian fashion; in vain did they send these to scour the woods; they have not been the less constrained to abandon more than sixty leagues of country together with the crops and cattle. The English have not abandoned Fort Cumberland, but communication with it has been attended with a thousand difficulties, and Chevalier Villiers, on the 2d of August, has been very successful in burning another called Fort Grandville,<sup>1</sup> sixty miles from Philadelphia.

Letters from that quarter of the 13th, mention that the prisoners state that the Province of Pennsylvania is making a levy of two thousand men, and Virginia and Maryland another of three thousand, to facilitate the saving of the harvest by the settlers. General Hauke is expected to command them. These preparations have not deterred the Delawares (Loups), Chamousanons and Illinois going in a body to burn the grain. M. Dumas, the same letters add, has formed the design of going to set fire to Fort Cumberland, with which view he has sent to have it reconnoitred. Finally, it does not appear that this news, whether true or false, excites much uneasiness at Fort Duquesne, and we learn, from all points, that the suffering throughout the whole of the English Colonies cannot be greater. The immense subsidies they have been forced to pay to maintain a force much more numerous than ours, far from having enabled them, up to the present time, to make any attack on us, has not even saved them from all the horrors of a cruel war, and the loss of the Port Mahon of North America ; I mean Chouagen.

One observation on the position of the camp of Carillon, five leagues above Fort St. Frederic or Crown Point, on the left shore of Lake Champlain. Our army is encamped on a Point called Carillon, at the junction of the two bays from which Lake Champlain derives its source. The largest of the two, which flows towards the southeast, is about seven to eight leagues deep. It was by this bay that Mr. Dieskaw passed last year, in going to the enemy. It receives Wood creek, with which the English can communicate from Fort Lydius by a road of three leagues.

The smallest of the two bays is only three-quarters of a league in depth towards the southwest. It receives at its head the Fall of Lake St. Sacrament. This fall is full half a league in length, and it is a very easy portage. Lake St. Sacrament lies nearly north and south, and is about twelve to thirteen leagues in length, by one at its widest part.

At the head of this Lake the English have a fort called Williams Henry, or Fort George, where their army has been encamped up to the present time. Another fort, called Lydius, is situated six or seven leagues from Williams Henry, and about ten from the head of the large bay. M. Dieskaw was proceeding against the latter fort, which he supposed to be still open on one side, but having learned from some prisoners that it was beyond insult, and that Colonel Johnson was beginning another at the head of Lake St. Sacrament, he altered his plan and marched against the latter, where he found the enemy in force and fortified. There is a highway between Fort Lydius and Fort Williams Henry, and the communication between Lydius and Albany is by way of the River Orange or Hudson, on which still stands Fort Sarasto.

The enemy was content, this year, with employing his army in perfecting Fort Williams Henry, having merely some strong guards and advanced posts along the shores and in the adjoining islands of Lake St. Sacrament. Our men have likewise been occupied, under the superintendence of our Engineer belonging to the country, in completing a fort commenced at Carillon last year, after the affair of M. Dieskaw, and in advancing two little intrenched camps at the head of the portage, and another camp, also intrenched, beyond the other two. These camps had strong guards and bivouacks in advance, in order to be seasonably advised of the enemy's march. Our design was to give them battle or to stop them at the portage of the Fall. The immense quantity of timber with which the whole of this country is covered, affords the Canadians and Indians the means of fighting with advantage. This circumstance would allow us to hazard a general engagement with the enemy, although in greater strength, had they come against us.

M. de Vaudreuil to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, the 20th August, 1756.

My Lord,

You are pleased that I leave everything relating to the incorporation of the recruits destined to complete the troops of the line, to the reports the Marquis de Montcalm and M. Doreil have the honor to make to you, regard being had to the number of the effective companies of each battalion. I have concurred in all the arrangements they have thought proper, and such incorporation has been in accordance with the King's intentions.

Therefore, my Lord, I might have referred to the special reports transmitted to you by the Marquis de Montcalm, of the different movements in which I have employed the land forces, but I could not refuse myself the satisfaction I feel in having the honor to address you on the subject.

I had the honor, in my letter of the 8th June, to advise you in advance of my views against Chouaguen, but that I would not decide upon putting them in execution unless circumstances would be so much in my favor as not to risk compromising the King's arms.

The detachment, consisting of about 900 Colonial troops, Canadians and Indians, which I had the honor to mention to you, stationed itself in a place adapted for continually sending parties out against Chouaguen. This detachment has made several successful expeditions. On the 3d July it attacked a convoy of 300 bateaux, defeated about 500 English, wounded several others and brought in a considerable number prisoners. Chevalier de Gannes was wounded in this action, and died of his wounds on the 6th. As for the rest, we had but two men killed and some wounded.

The Marquis de Montcalm was then at Carillon; I had given him the command of the army covering that frontier, as the English were disposed to direct thither forces against that quarter. I had two objects in view; first, to enable the Marquis de Montcalm to add an examination of the locality to the information I had given him of those parts; secondly, to mask my design against Chouaguen from the enemy, and for that purpose Chevalier de Levis followed in the same direction.

My preparations and arrangements at Frontenac were completed as far as related to provisions, warlike stores, troops and Militia to be employed in this expedition. The Marquis de Montcalm had asked of me only a force of 3,000 men, but I increased it to about 4,000.

He wrote me from Carillon, on the strength of the information he as well as I possessed of the situation of the enemy, that it was his opinion they would not be soon ready to appear in those parts. I sent an order to Chevalier de Levis to assume the command, agreeably to the instructions I had given the Marquis de Montcalm, whom I authorized to add a supplement thereto if the case required it. He thought that place would be safe with about 3,000 men, and I exceeded that number.

M. de Montcalm returned to this town on the 19th of July. I furnished him, on his arrival, with his instructions for the siege of the forts at Chouaguen and some reliable English deserters who volunteered to make the campaign and promised me to be very useful.

During that time M. de Combes, the Engineer, was, in consequence of an order I had given him, engaged, with four pickets of Regulars, a detachment of Canadians and Indians on the enemy's territory, in making a reconnoissance of the forts of Chouaguen and his observations on the siege of that place.

M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, who had proceeded to assume the command of the Camp of Observation in the vicinity of Chouaguen, in order to sustain the Indian tribes who did nothing but appear and disappear, arrived nearly about the same time as the Engineer at that camp, and although I was assured that the enemy would try in vain to dislodge us, I dispatched the battalion of La Sarre thither.

The Indians of the 5 Nations, whom I had justly suspected and with whom I had opened divers negotiations, left their village, not for the purpose of going to the English, whom they believed to be impregnable at Chouaguen, but of answering my messages. Some of these Nations were at Niagara; some came to Montreal. The latter having joined M. de Rigaud thought I had some object in view and would accompany him; but agreeably to my orders he closed that path on them and opened for them that of Montreal. The Five Nations were divided and in my power; the one at Niagara, the other at Montreal. By this policy I made sure that the remainder of the Nation would not join the English, whilst their people would be at my disposal.

Things were in this position when M. de Montcalm arrived at Frontenac. M. de Combles, the Engineer, first made a report to him of the reconnoissance of the forts at Chouaguen, and M. de Rigaud of the frequent scouts he had sent out to penetrate the situation of the enemy; of the information he had acquired as to the environs of Chouaguen, and of everything relating to the landing of the army and artillery.

M. de Montcalm, besides, found everything ready. It was not long before he was joined by the battalion of Bearn which I had ordered to Niagara in the double view of completing the works of that fort, and convincing the enemy that I had no other design than to act on the defensive.

The Marquis de Montcalm left Frontenac on the 5th of August and joined M. de Rigaud on the 6th. I will not follow, with minuteness, his march and manœuvre; the report thereof, which he has the honor to make you, will furnish you perfect information on those points. He cannot but be satisfied with the reports made him by M. de Rigaud and the confidence evinced in his expedition by the officers of the Colony, the Canadians and even the Indians. They removed all the obstacles which were created every instant.

In fine, my Lord, in spite of all the opposition offered to our landing by the English cruisers, we were, on the 13th of August, ready to place 6 guns in battery to bear against Fort Ontario. But the 300 men who were guarding it did not think proper to await their effect. They feared that their communication with the old fort would be cut off in the night by the Canadians and Indians, by whom they were invested, and that they would be precipitated into the river, which was unprovided with any bridge. Their retreat was first discovered by our Canadians. The Regulars did not find it out until near 5 o'clock in the evening by the cessation of the firing. An officer of the troops, detached from the Marine with some Canadians and Indians belonging to my brother's command, first entered that fort. They found only two sick men whom the English had not the courage to remove. The Infantry afterwards took possession of the place.

It was easy to infer, from this precipitate retreat, that the enemy's defence at the old fort would not be obstinate. Meanwhile, on the 14th, we had 9 pieces of cannon in readiness to bear, but my brother having offered to M. de Montcalm to cross the river with the Canadians and Indians, in order to complete the investment of the enemy, achieved that manœuvre with decisive boldness. There was considerable water in the river; he plunged in and crossed over with his detachment under the guns of the fort—some swimming, others in the water up to the waist or neck, and reached his destination.

Colonel Mercer had just been killed; this, joined to the fear of falling into the hands of our Indians, determined his successor to send a request to my brother to stop the fire of the Canadians and Indians; he had the two English deputies conducted to the Marquis de Montcalm, who had the Commandant informed that he could not receive them, except as prisoners of war, with the privilege of retaining only the property belonging to the officers, and gave them but one hour. The cries, threats and hideous howlings of our Canadians and Indians made them promptly decide. Nothing could exceed their haste to return to M. de Montcalm articles agreeable to the capitulation granted them, copy whereof is hereunto annexed.

The officers of each regiment also made their declaration not to serve directly nor indirectly until exchanged.

The prisoners number about 1,600 men.

The enemy's loss consists of 45 men killed; of these, 12 lost their lives in action; the remainder were killed in the woods by our Indians whilst trying to escape.

On our side, we have lost only 3 men in action, and two by accident, namely, M. de Combles, the Engineer, and a Canadian. We have also had some slightly wounded—Colonel de Bourlamaque, Captain de Palmarol of the grenadiers of the regiment of La Sarre, Captain du Parquet, of the same regiment, and 6 Canadians.

We have taken 6 fine cruizers, 121 pieces of artillery, with ammunition, utensils, &c., and a considerable quantity of provisions.

Chouaguen and all its magazines have been destroyed at a small expense. The land forces have displayed their wonted zeal, but the enemy did not afford them an opportunity for operating. The Marquis de Montcalm had, besides, made the most favorable arrangements for his expedition.

Our troops, the Canadians and Indians, fought with the courage natural to them. They have all signalized themselves. The good disposition of my brother and of the Colonial officers supplied them with resources to surmount, as I have had the honor to observe to you, all obstacles; they have contributed in no small degree to the most brilliant victory which we have achieved.

This fortunate event places the Colony at its ease. All that remains for me now is to cover the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament, which is menaced by an army of 10,000 men, under the command of General Loudon. The Marquis de Montcalm is to proceed thither in a few days. I supply him with the means of preventing the enemy making any progress, and if circumstances favor me, shall have them attacked. In this case I will provide for every contingency, so as not to run the risk of compromising the King's arms. Until then he will have it in his power seriously to annoy them. Exclusive of the 6 battalions and the greater portion of the Colonial troops, he will have with him 600 Indians and a considerable number of Canadians.

Although the reputation of Chevalier de Levis, at present in command of the army at Carillon, be the best established, I cannot deny him the justice he deserves in every regard. He is full of zeal, and has afforded me proofs of most consummate prudence and experience in the service.

In respect to Forts Frontenac and Niagara, they have nothing further to apprehend, and, instead of my being obliged to keep in each of these forts a body of Regulars, Canadians and Indians, which, in the whole, would equal the number that I employed to reduce the forts of Chouaguen, I will be able to provide for their security with 300 men and less.

Meanwhile, I have designed M. Pouchot to return to Niagara, in order to complete the fortifications of that place, which have been prodigiously forwarded since the last despatch I had the honor to write you. He is one of the best officers I know among the troops of the line. He rendered himself very useful, and particularly distinguished himself at Chouaguen. You will permit me, my Lord, in another despatch, to beg of you to procure for him the favors I shall have the honor to ask of you, in justice to him.

Had I deferred the Chouaguen expedition and permitted myself to be stopped by all the inconsiderate talk held on that subject, I should have been obliged to abandon it. The enemy managed matters in such a way as to make sure of the superiority on Lake Ontario, where they dictated the law to us from the beginning of last fall. They probably would have been less slow another year than this to profit by the advantage they possess over this Colony by the earliness of their navigation, and when I would be able to dispatch aid to Frontenac and Niagara, the former fort might be in their hands, after which that of Niagara, deprived of all succor, could not offer them any resistance; they would be masters of the Beautiful river, by degrees of Detroit and of all our posts in the Upper country.

The Indian Nations would then have been as anxious to carry out their views as they are now to mar them.

Such, my Lord, were the ambitious projects of the English, wherewith the Court of England hath, for some years, been occupying itself, but the utter failure of which it is now contemplating.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Articles of Capitulation granted to the English troops under the command of John Littlehales, Commander of said troops and of the forts of Chouaguen, by the Marquis de Montcalm, Marshal of the camps and of the armies of the King, General of his troops in New France.

ARTICLE 1st.

It has been agreed that the English troops will surrender themselves prisoners of war; that the officers and soldiers will be allowed to retain their effects.

That said fort will be delivered up at two o'clock of the afternoon, with, generally, all the property, munitions of war and provisions, barks, rigging and other articles in general whatsoever, without any injury being done to them by their troops.

ARTICLE 2nd.

That all their arms be placed in a store at the moment one-half the troops are embarked, to be conveyed across the river, and in the return boats a number of French troops are to be sent over to take possession of the fort when the remainder of the troops shall vacate the same.

The colors and drums will be likewise deposited in said stores, with the officers' arms.

There shall be made out a new verification of the effects in the stores and of the artillery, powder, ball, provisions, barks and rigging, agreeable to the returns which have been furnished to me.

The officers will, in passing, each remove his own property.

The 14th, at 11 o'clock in the morning.

(Signed), JOHN LITTLEHALES,
L<sup>t</sup> Colonel and Commandant.

Said Articles are granted in the name of his Most Christian Majesty, pursuant to the power I derive from the Marquis de Vaudreuil, his Governor and Lieutenant-General in New France.

From Ile Royale, 30th of August, 1756.

About the middle of the month of June, the enemy appearing to direct all their forces towards Lake St. Sacrament, the Marquis de Montcalm proposed to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to change our defensive into offensive by making a diversion in the direction of Chouaguen, which might relieve the frontier of Lake St. Sacrament, where Chevalier de Levis commanded, and at the same time to lay siege to that place if the enemy's inactivity or mistakes permitted. This project has been executed with so much celerity and success on our side that the Marquis de Montcalm, who left Montreal on the 21st July, arrived on the 29th at Frontenac, where Colonel de Bourlamaque was in command. This officer had already received orders to make preparations for the siege. The Marquis de Montcalm proceeded thence on the night of the 4th [of August] with Guyenne, La Sarre and the Militia. He reached the Bay of Niaouré on the 6th and dispatched thence, M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil composing the van-guard with Militia and Indians. We arrived on the 10th, at midnight, within half a league of Chouegen without being discovered. The landing was executed in order, and in the course of the night a battery of 4 twelve-pounders was erected on the beach, from which, next day, the English barks were cannonaded. The 11th and 12th were employed in constructing half a league of road through the woods, which was considered impracticable by the enemy; in making fascines, gabions and saucissons. In the night of the 11th and 12th, Bearn arrived with 80 bateaux loaded with artillery and ammunition. That night the trench was opened 80 toises from Fort Ontario. The enemy's fire was brisk, on the 13th, until 4 o'clock. At 5 o'clock 'twas perceived that the enemy had abandoned the fort, which was capable of holding out several days. The timidity of this manœuvre emboldened the Marquis de Montcalm to make his little army work through the whole night in constructing a battery and a road; in bringing cannon on men's shoulders in order to place 20 guns in battery, whereof 9 only were ready to fire on the morning of the 14th. At the break of day he caused M. Rigaud to cross the river under Chouegen, with the Canadians and Indians. The Marquis de Montcalm had sent to the anchorage ground to land, the following night, above Fort George, the regiment of Bearn, with 3 pieces of cannon, in order to deceive the enemy, an easy manœuvre in a wooded country. But this trouble was spared, the enemy having capitulated at noon, on the same day, the 14th. They surrendered prisoners of war to the number of 1,700, whereof 80 were officers, 2 regiments from Old England, with 5 standards, three military chests, 121 pieces of ordnance, including 45 swivels, a heap of provisions for 3,000 men for a year, six barks, armed and pierced, from 4 to 20 guns. These have been highly serviceable for the general clearing out; and as it was necessary to use the greatest diligence in this expedition to send the Canadians to save the harvest and to convey the troops back to another frontier.

From the 15th to the 21st, the Marquis de Montcalm caused the 3 forts and their storehouses to be razed or burnt, their artillery to be brought away, together with their barks, provisions and prisoners. The capture of Chouegen is an affair of 15 millions lost to England, and the most important that could be made in this Colony.

The Marquis de Montcalm has been prodigiously occupied since the 26th, having repaired, successively, to the two principal frontiers of Canada. The enemy have had 150 men killed or wounded, including those who, wishing to escape during the capitulation, have been massacred by the Indians. We have had 30 killed or wounded. Among the prisoners<sup>1</sup> is M. de Combes, the Engineer, who has been killed by one of our own Indians, who mistook him for an Englishman on coming to reconnoitre the ground. M. de Bourlamaque has been slightly wounded. Nothing can be added to the zeal with which the troops have equally exerted themselves to hasten the success of this expedition; the incredible diligence in the works; the demonstration of our troops in forming two attacks deceived the enemy and made them believe that we numbered 6,000 men whilst we had hardly 3,000. This, conjoined to the dread of the cruelties of the Indians and to the loss of the Commander, Colonel Mercer, has, doubtless, hastened the surrender of the forts much sooner than we ought to expect.

A squadron of 4 English ships, two of 64 guns and 2 of 40 @ 50, a frigate and a snow cruize off Scatari.

'Tis stated that L'arc-en-ciel, attacked by these vessels, has been captured, after an engagement of 8 hours.

M. de Beaussier sailed in the beginning of July with two ships, two frigates and 3 good merchantmen, well armed. He is to attack the English, who are blockading our ships in St. Anne.

As a trial, he went from his camp to make some feints in the vicinity of Fort Ontario, on the 10th of June, in order to endeavor to attract the enemy into some ambush. The Indians had promised him not to fire until they should see the enemy making a sortie and engaged; but they could not look at 8 men making a round without having a desire to scalp them; these were killed, and the English did not go out any more.

The parties sent from this camp to the portage where M. de Lery blew up Fort Bull, report that the English were constructing another and much stronger fort.

An English sloop with 8 barges, designed to make discoveries in the direction of Fort Frontenac, was perceived by some Indians landing at Ile au Galop, where they were to remain six days, who informed M. de Villiers, whose camp was opposite, but not known to the enemy. He immediately caused some people to embark, who attacked them as they were floating along the island on the opposite shore; 15 English were killed or captured; many were wounded who escaped to the sloop. The Captain of the party was taken prisoner.

M. de Villiers, who did not miss any opportunity to annoy the enemy, being encamped for that purpose at the Bay of Niaouré, which he left on the 28th of July, having learned from his scouts that the Chouaguen river, within the reach of which he was posted, was covered with bateaux, designed to wait for the enemy at a portage, which was the best place to prepare an ambush for and to defeat them; but a party of Indians did not give him time to do so; they fired; on seeing which, M. de Villiers ordered his Canadians to do the like. The enemy threw themselves with their bateaux on the opposite side of the river. So great was the impetuosity of the Indians, that 11 of them flung themselves in, swimming; they were on an island where they found themselves surrounded by the English. On learning this, M. de Villiers waded across with 50 men and some officers, and released the Indians. He sent word to the English to surrender, who preferred to throw themselves into their bateaux; our Indians and Frenchmen rushed into the water and each made prisoners. In this affair we have lost one officer and only one man, and have taken two prisoners.

The loss of the enemy, from data in our possession, amounts to 26 scalps and 30 prisoners. Deserters and prisoners report that we have defeated more than 400 of their men. That may allow of a margin, but they have lost a great many people; their detachment consisted of 12 @ 1,300 men on their return from victualing Chouaguen, and our detachment amounted to 400, including Canadians and Indians.

All these different advantages, joined to those of the Indians, who, during the winter, took many scalps from them, confined the English, of a necessity, to their fort.

From Frontenac.

Our little navy on Lake Ontario had distinguished itself in returning from Niagara, whither it had conveyed the battalion of Bearn. It met on the way the 5 English vessels which were waiting for it, but the confident air assumed by our marines (in accordance with what they considered their duty), who made towards the enemy with all sail set, made the latter lose their courage and take to flight. Being faster sailers they outstripped our vessels, that were able to overtake only one craft, carrying 12 swivels, which they captured.

Both the Engineers who arrived from France were sent to this fort, where the battalions of La Sarre and Guyenne were stationed. M. de Bourlamaque went to take the command, and had commenced to fortify this place, or had begun rather an intrenched camp, which was to cover it.

From Montreal.

The camp at the Bay of Niaouré [was] designed only to cut off the convoys of provisions which the enemy was receiving from Orange at Chouaguen. The report, by prisoners, of the condition of the latter place, which did not, in other respects, seem strongly fortified, determined M. de Vaudreuil to lay siege to it. Meanwhile, as all the intelligence which reached him from every quarter, advised him that a large body of troops was marching against The Point, he dispatched M. de Montcalm [with orders] to put everything in a state of defence; if the enemy was not making any considerable movement in that direction, to leave the command to M. de Levis with 3,000 men and to return in order to attempt the taking of Chouaguen. He returned to Montreal on the 19th of July and started on the 21st; arrived on the 29th at Frontenac, to which place the battalion, then at Niagara, had orders to repair.

After completing all the preparations for the siege, which is not a trifling business in that country, where one has never been made, M. de Montcalm left on the 4th of August with the battalions of La Sarre and Guyenne, and 4 pieces of artillery. He arrived, on the 6th, at the camp in the Bay of Niaouré, which, since a few days, M. de Rigaud commanded; this was the general rendezvous, and the 2nd division, composed of the battalion of Bearn, of the Militia, of the 80 artillery bateaux, and of those with provisions, arrived there on the 8th. The number of troops destined for the expedition was nearly 3,000 men; 1,300 of the three battalions and the remainder Canadians or Indians.

M. de Rigaud's corps, destined to compose the van-guard, marched the same day towards Chouaguen, and repaired to a cove within  $\frac{1}{2}$  a league of that place in order to favor the landing of the artillery and troops.

On the 11th, at break of day, the Canadians and Indians had advanced within a quarter of a league of Fort Ontario, which they invested. Sieur de Combes, the Engineer, who went there to regulate that investment and the front of attack, was killed by one of our Indians, who mistook him, in the twilight, for an Englishman; a misfortune which left only one Engineer. Fortunately, Sieur Pouchot performed these duties during the siege.

The road was made with surprising promptitude; each lent himself with zeal; a battery was set up in less than 36 hours, and the enemy had no knowledge of being besieged until the following day, the 12th, from the Indians who were going out to shoot; 3 armed barks sailed, at noon, from the River Chouaguen; they came cruising before the camp, fired some of their guns, but were obliged, by our fire, to retire to a distance.

12th The battalion of Béarn brought the bulk of the artillery in the bateaux, which were unloaded in presence of the English vessels. At midnight, that same night, the trench, which was rather a parallel of about 100 toises, was opened within 90 of the fort; 300 pioneers were employed on it. This parallel was finished at 5 o'clock in the morning. The enemy's fire, which had been very brisk during the whole day, slackened towards 6 o'clock in the evening, and it was perceived that the garrison had evacuated Fort Ontario and crossed over the river into that of Chouaguen. They abandoned, on retiring, 8 pieces of cannon and 4 mortars. The place was immediately seized, and that very night a grand battery was commenced; it was so located as to be able to batter Fort Chouaguen and to take the intrenched camp in the rear; 20 pieces of cannon were carried on men's shoulders.

14th At daylight the Marquis de Montcalm ordered Sieur de Rigaud to wade to the other side of the river with the Canadians and Indians in order to get into the woods and annoy the enemy in the direction of Fort George. At 6 o'clock 9 guns were ready to bear, although the enemy's fire had been superior to ours. At 10 o'clock the white flag was hoisted and two officers sent to ask a capitulation. The dread of the Canadians and Indians who crossed the river; the celerity of the works, which created the belief that the number of troops was large; the death of Colonel Mercer, the Commander, who was killed at 2 o'clock in the morning, determined the besieged to adopt this course, which could hardly be anticipated.

The Marquis de Montcalm sent Sieur de Bougainville, one of his Aids-de-Camp, to serve as a hostage and to propose the articles of capitulation, which were: that the garrison should surrender prisoners of war, and that the French troops would immediately proceed to take possession of the forts. These articles having been accepted by the Commander and returned to the Marquis de Montcalm, he sent 2 companies of grenadiers and the pickets of the trench with M. de Bourlamaque to take possession of the forts, who was instructed to raze said fort and to remove the artillery and warlike stores, and whatever was found there.

On our side we had only about 30 men killed or wounded, and the English, on theirs, about 150, including several soldiers, who, wishing to escape through the woods, fell under the hands of the Indians. The number of prisoners has been nearly 1,700 men, namely, Schirley and Peperell's regiments, which came from Old England, a detachment of Schuyller's regiment of Militia, about 80 officers, 2 of whom belong to the artillery, 2 engineers, 12 naval officers. We have likewise captured 7 vessels of war—1 of 18, 1 of 14, 1 of 10, 1 of 8 guns, 3 armed with swivels, 400 barges or bateaux, 7 brass pieces, 48 of iron, 14 mortars, 5 howitzers, 47 swivels, 1,800 muskets, ball, shell, bullets and powder in proportion, and a quantity of provisions, with the military chest, which contained 15,594<sup>lb</sup>.

21st All the forts being razed, the prisoners, artillery and provisions removed, the army was reëmbarked, in order to repair to the vicinity of Montreal; the 3 battalions are designed for Fort Carillon, with a view to oppose the progress of the English.

So vast an amount of warlike stores and provisions discovered at Chouaguen—the fleet which secured the English in the superiority of Lake Ontario—the new convoys they were expecting from day to day—all announced the approaching execution on their part of their designs against Forts Frontenac and Niagara, the prevention whereof is very fortunate for the Colony.

The Indians of the Five Nations whom M. de Vaudreuil had had invited to come to see him, arrived directly, whilst preparations were going on for the siege of Chouaguen. They were retained at Montreal all the time it lasted, and were greatly surprised at its surrender and destruction, which they did not expect. M. de Vaudreuil spoke to them in all the Councils much to the purpose, told them: By right of conquest, Chouaguen, which you have given to the English, belongs to me, but I will not invade your territory like the English; I give it back to you, but neither shall you suffer them to establish themselves again there, and you shall notify me if they desire to do so. I do not enage you to take up the hatchet against them, as the English persuade you to do against me. Remain quiet on your mats and do not meddle with anything.

The Indians of the Upper Countries appear glad that Chouaguen has fallen, but, at the bottom of their hearts, they are not satisfied. It was a place where they found as much Rum as they pleased, goods much cheaper than with us, and I am persuaded that the high prices of our merchandise will drive them to Orange to trade their peltries, which is a serious injury to the trade of this Colony. It would be an advantage necessary for one reason, were the Indians supplied with our goods at the same price as they are supplied by the English.

From Carillon.

The enemy have formed divers parties, Canadian fashion, in these parts, and have killed several and taken some prisoners. All intelligence from every quarter, from the Beautiful river, Acadia, &c., seems to agree in announcing to us that a powerful army is assembling to cut its way by this place. The report is 12 to 15,000 men, under the command of Lord Loudon, who has Regulars and Scotch Highlanders.

The fall of Chouaguen leaves us at liberty to direct our entire force against the enemy's enterprises.

From the Beautiful river.

The Indians of this quarter continue to make incursions into the Provinces of Pensilvania, Virginia and Mariland with considerable success; they attack small forts, which they reduce.

They have ravaged in those Provinces, 'tis asserted, more than 100 leagues of country by 50 in breadth. The Cherakis, or Flatheads, appear decided on waging vigorous war against the English.

From Montreal, the 12 September, 1756.

We have learned that a party of English Indians, having been discovered at Point Squesonton,<sup>1</sup> in Lake Champlain, was pursued; two Englishmen have been taken and conveyed to Carillon; the others escaped.

By the same opportunity we learn that two officers of the regiment of La Reine, being fishing on the other side of the river, opposite Carillon, have been killed. Their names are Lieutenant de Biville and Ensign Tersaque.

15th Chevalier de Ciloron, arrived from Fort Duquesne, informs us that Chevalier de Villiers, Captain at the Illinois, having gone from Fort Duquesne with 23 Frenchmen and 30 Indians, had, on the 14th August, made an attack on a fort<sup>2</sup> on the confines of Pennsylvania, in which were 2 cannon, 37 persons, including some women and children. The Commander of the place had left it some days previously with 40 men; that he summoned this fort to surrender, which having been refused he had spent 2 days firing musketry, whilst half his men were constructing faggots with which he had set fire to this fort an hour before day, and that part of the garrison had been put to the sword and the remainder taken prisoners. It contained six months' provisions for one hundred men, about 600 pounds of powder, some ball and bullets. We had one man slightly wounded.

200 Indians or French had left Fort Duquesne to burn 400 dwellings situate in a country belonging to Pennsylvania, which Province had suffered but little in consequence of the intrigues of the 5 Nations with the Taskororins, who are on its lands and allies of the 5 Nations, but who have now declared that they would aid the French and their brethren, the Delawares and Chaouanons; and many, in consequence, have taken sides with these, so that Pennsylvania will be ruined like Virginia and Carolina.

Our 6 regiments are at present arrived at Carillon with 1,000 to 1,200 Colonial troops, 300 Canadians and nearly 700 Indians, and should the enemy set out to attack us, 2,000 Regulars and Canadians will, on the first signal, be commanded to repair to St. John, where bateaux will be in readiness to transport them. Remark, that from St. John to Carillon will be 3 days' march; from St. John to Laprairie de la Madelaine is 5 leagues, and from this last to Montreal 3 leagues.

The transport of provisions, by the River Chambly, is not discontinued. 5 sloops left Montreal within 8 days fully laden, and it is calculated that Fort Chambly contains all that is requisite. From Fort Chambly the portage is made with carts about 30 arpents, and thence in bateaux to St. John, where there is a sloop and 40 bateaux, which carry 6,000 weight, and do nothing since spring but make voyages to and from Forts Frederic and Carillon, to supply them with stores so as to place them beyond the fear of falling short before July next.

Fort Carillon is completed; it is represented as a great affair and capable of being rendered bomb-proof; 'tis provided with 30 pieces of cannon and a year's provisions for a garrison of 1,000 men.

Niagara<sup>1</sup> is also well fortified. It had only 6 guns, but Chouaguén has furnished 24 of the largest calibre which are now mounted. People are busy supplying Forts Duquesne, on the Beautiful river, Niagara<sup>1</sup> and Frontenac, with provisions, in order to be no longer obliged to employ the best men at such work when they may be required elsewhere.

The greatest point is that the English keep on the defensive and do not come to attack us. M. de Montcalm writes that they will never be able to come at a more favorable time for us, holding, as we do, all the important posts.

The harvest in New England is said to be very bad, and all the prisoners assure us that if the English do not take Carillon and St. Frederic, this year, New England is swamped and unable, henceforth, to contribute anything.

'Tis likewise reported that sickness prevails at the English forts St. George, de Dieu,<sup>2</sup> etc.

From Louisbourg we learn that the English fort of Chibictou, and others in Acadia, are short of provisions.

M<sup>r</sup> de Léry, who left Montreal in the last days of February, with three thousand French and Indians, arrived on the 27th at noon, at an English fort situated on the portage between the Mohawk river and that of Chouaguén, and ten or twelve leagues distant from Fort Chouaguén, on Lake Ontario. On his arrival the garrison was summoned to surrender, and refusing, the place was carried by storm, and the garrison put to the sword. It consisted of sixty men and thirty-six prisoners; part of the latter were taken the preceding evening, whilst conveying provisions to Chouaguén in wagons and bateaux. The French lost only two men, and had three slightly wounded.

The stores consisted of three thousand weight of powder, clothing for six hundred men, one thousand blankets, supplies of pork, flour and biscuit; several wagons and bateaux have been burnt; three hundred balls have been thrown into the water in a swamp. One hundred horses have been killed, besides. During this expedition, different parties of our domiciliated Indians have brought in forty prisoners and ninety scalps.

From Fort Duquesne.

Letters of the 23rd March assure us that the French and Indians have, since Admiral Braddock's defeat, put hors du combat more than seven hundred persons, including the killed and prisoners, in the Provinces of Pennsylvania, Virginia and Carolina.

The Delawares and Chaouanons, Indian Nations on the Beautiful river, are in exceeding great rage, some of their Chiefs, who went on a sort of Embassy to the English, having been cruelly put to death by the latter. Were it not that the Commandants keep continually recommending them to commit as few murders as possible, not a prisoner would they take. Besides this, these two nations have not discontinued, since the close of the summer and since autumn, sending Belts to all the Tribes, inviting them to come and assist them in avenging the insult committed by the English. This invitation has been accepted, and occasioned the War song to be sung by all those nations during the entire of last winter. There were in April, throughout those territories, twenty parties of Delawares and Chaouanons, among whom were sixty Indians belonging to the Five Nations of Iroquois. Horrible ravages have been committed by these parties. As a last resource, the settlers have abandoned their dwellings and retired to the sea coast. Three forts have been burnt; among the rest, one with a garrison of forty-seven men, to which a party of forty Indians, commanded by M<sup>r</sup> Douville, a Colonial Cadet, laid siege. The garrison was summoned to surrender, and on refusing, the fort was fired during the night, and the garrison, attempting to escape, received no quarter from the Indians. Sieur Douville lost his life on this occasion.<sup>1</sup>

We have at present on the continent one thousand French, seven hundred Delawares and Chaouanons; besides that, a number of Illinois, as many as three hundred French and Indians, under the command of Chevalier de Villiers; about two hundred and fifty Miamis and Ouatanons, under the command of M<sup>r</sup> de Bellestre; three hundred from Detroit and seven hundred from Michelimakina, commanded by Chevalier de Repentigny, Danglade and Hébert, Junior, all amounting to three thousand two hundred and fifty men. People are waiting to learn whether M<sup>r</sup> Beaubassin, Commandant at La Pointe, will have brought the Sauteurs of his post; we shall learn before long the exploits of these Nations.

M. Dumas, a Colonial Captain, and Commandant of Fort Duquesne, was entertaining views against Fort Cumberland, which is a large entrepôt of the English to facilitate their approach to the Beautiful river; it lies at the foot of the mountains, about seventy leagues from the coast and eighty from Fort Duquesne.

From Lake St. Sacrament.

Divers small parties of French and Indians have brought us, up to the close of June, from the direction of Orange and Lake St. Sacrament, twenty-five prisoners and forty-five scalps; two of these were of officers.

In May, an English scouting party at the Lake St. Sacrament portage, killed a Frenchman and took Cadet Frontenelle, of this Colony, prisoner.

An English party at Otter Creek, six leagues this side of Fort St. Frederic, has destroyed on us two armed bateaux, having six men each, whom they have surprised.<sup>2</sup> Though these were destitute of powder and ball, the English were in such haste that they abandoned their own provisions, and did not lay a finger on the cargoes of these two bateaux, which consisted of oats, bran and meal. All the letters were found in a bag, and the appearance was, that only one man had been killed. We have learned from some English prisoners that eight prisoners had been carried to Orange.

Return of our Naval force on Lake Ontario.

La M<sup>re</sup> de Vaudreuil, Laforce, Commander, carrying eight eight-pounders, eight sixes and eight swivels of two pounds, a crew of thirty men, fifty marines and one officer.

Le Huron, Labroquerie, Commander, carrying eight sixes, four fours, and six swivels, a crew of eighty men, forty marines and one officer.

One schooner, carrying six four and three-pounders, with four swivels, a crew of six men, twenty-five marines and two sergeants.

1756. 30th June. These vessels, returning from Niagara, on their third voyage, met two English schooners, carrying each six guns, and another small craft carrying six swivels, which they chased to within view of Chouaguen without being able to overtake any but the small one, on board which were a crew of fifteen sailors, and one Captain to command a snow of eighteen guns on the stocks at Fort Chouaguen. The two first mentioned vessels escaped by dint of rowing, after having thrown overboard their boats and part of their baggage.

On the same day a boat arrived at Fort Frontenac with fifteen English deserters.

Some days previous, Captain de Villiers, having discovered an English bark and eight boats, with twenty men each, had his bateaux drawn into the woods ready for launching as soon as a favorable opportunity presented; the bark being out in the lake saw four of our bateaux coming, under sail, from Frontenac, which caused the Captain to signal his boats to return on board; on discovering which, M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers had eight bateaux immediately launched, and, notwithstanding all his precautions, succeeded in overtaking only one of those boats after having killed thirteen of its hands and taken the remainder prisoners.

1756. 2<sup>d</sup> July. M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers is now, with a flying camp of seven hundred men, at the Bay, distant fifteen or eighteen leagues from Frontenac, and fifteen from Chouaguin, to intercept the provisions of this last fort.

Sieur de Villiers being, on the second July, at the head of four hundred Frenchmen and some Indians, and M<sup>r</sup> Marin, Commandant at the Bay, with sixty Indians of his post, fell in with about five hundred bateaux and thirteen hundred English, on their return from carrying provisions to Chouaguin, whom he attacked so vigorously that he left four hundred and fifty of them dead and took forty prisoners; the remainder (the number wounded not known) threw themselves on the opposite side of the river, after having abandoned their bateaux, which have been burnt. We have lost six men and had two wounded in this affair.

14th July. M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil de Rigaud, Governor of Three Rivers, left to-day for M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers' flying camp, of which he will take the command. That camp will consist of two thousand men to serve for observation should the siege of Chouaguin be attempted.

21st ditto. M<sup>r</sup> de Montcalm went to Carillon on the 3<sup>d</sup> instant to hasten the fortifications of that post. Chevalier Lacorne and M. Contrecoeur have taken their departure at the head of a flying camp of 500 Canadians and two hundred Indians, to observe the enemy's movements whilst transporting their supplies from Orange to Fort Lidius and that of Lake St. Sacrament, called George.

This camp is about ten leagues from the Fort of Lake St. Sacrament and within fifteen or 16 from that of Lidius, and five leagues from Carillon. This last is five leagues from Fort St. Frederic. In addition, we have many other parties in the field, whereby the English are obliged to keep themselves so close that not a solitary person has been seen, for three weeks, around their forts. Attempts have been made to lure them out, but they were unwilling to expose themselves.

M<sup>r</sup> de Lévy has remained Commander-in-Chief at Carillon, where we have the regiments of La Reine, Languedoc and Royal Rousillon and some Colonial troops, amounting, it is computed, to five thousand men, including Canadians and Indians.

M<sup>r</sup> de Moncalm, who arrived at Montreal on the 18th, left to-day for Frontenac and thence for Chouaguin to lay siege to the latter place; the provisions, warlike stores and artillery have reached Frontenac with the regiments of Bearn, Guyenne and La Sarre, and about four hundred Colonial troops.

22nd ditto. The courier from Carillon informs us that M. St. Martin, an officer of the Colonial troops, who was in command of a party of Frenchmen and Indians, has killed fifty to sixty Englishmen and taken four prisoners in the vicinity of Fort George.

6th of August. The courier from Carillon has likewise informed us that Captain de la Colombière, at the head of sixty men, French and Indians, killed about twenty to twenty-five men and made four prisoners at the gate of Fort George. He was pursued for half an hour by a strong detachment, which he got rid of, without the loss of a man.

Montreal, 12th of August, 1756. About three o'clock in the afternoon a most violent northeast squall, mingled with hail, struck this island, commencing at the Sant au Récolet, and terminating at the Côte des Neiges, which makes two leagues, by about a league and a quarter in width, causing much damage on the upper part of Isle Jesus ; the grain, peas and oats in St. Laurent, Vertu, St. Catharine and Côte des Neiges (which places are in the vicinity of Montreal), are entirely destroyed, and several houses and barns thrown down ; the hail lay on the ground half a foot deep.

The last news from Fort Duquesne assure us of the destruction of Virginia, Carolina and part of New Georgia. The settlers of Pennsylvania, of the Quaker denomination, withdrew last year towards the coast. All these provinces are laid waste for forty leagues from the foot of the mountains, in the direction of the sea. The number of prisoners in these territories since last April, is estimated at about three thousand—men, women and children, in addition to thirteen hundred horses carried off to the River Oyo, or the Beautiful river ; the houses and barns that have been burnt, and the oxen and cows which have been killed wherever found, have not been counted.

Siege of Fort Chouaguin.

On the fifth of August, M<sup>r</sup> de Moncalm, the General of our armies, set out from Frontenac with six brass pieces, taken from Admiral Braddock, for the Bay of Niaouré, to join the regiments of La Sarre and Guyenne, which left for that place a few days previous. M<sup>r</sup> de Rigaud, who has assumed the command of M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers' camp, was also there with some Canadians and Indians.

On the 7th of August, the regiment of Bearn left Frontenac with twenty-two pieces of cannon and two mortars, and on the night of the 11th and morning of the 12th, the entire army reached within half a league of Fort Chouaguin, where the artillery was disembarked on the same day, the Canadians and Indians being then ashore, to cover our troops that were in bateaux.

At nine o'clock at night, the trench was opened before Fort Ontario, which is a star work, having a ditch twenty feet wide, by seventeen to eighteen deep, and the river between it and old Chouaguin. The trench was run two hundred paces.

On the morning of the 13th, the platforms were ready for the reception of guns to batter that fort, which was then found to be abandoned by four hundred men, who crossed the river to the old fort, after having kept up, during twenty-four hours, a brisk fire with their musketry and six pieces of cannon, which they spiked. They killed three, and wounded two, of our men.

As soon as this evacuation was perceived, a battery was raised in advance of that fort, which was ready at five o'clock of the morning of the 14th, to open a fire on the old fort, whilst on the other hand, the Canadians were crossing the river, to take up a position and prepare another battery there ; nothing could be more surprising than to behold, on the instant, the white flag hoisted, in order to capitulate. On the morning of the 15th, the capitulation was signed, and the garrison surrendered prisoners of war. It consisted of two battalions of Sirlhey's and Peperelle's regiments, which numbered eleven hundred men and six hundred Militia, workmen and sailors—in all, seventeen hundred. There were, besides, eighty-two women and girls, three of whom were wives of officers, and three or four of mechanics and soldiers ; moreover, two Lieutenants of the navy, and two Captains of flyboats.

There have been killed, the English Commandant, by a cannon ball ; also forty soldiers, exclusive of those scalped by Indians, who are estimated at about eighty.

In this action we have lost six men; among others, Mr de Comble, the Engineer-in-Chief, who has unfortunately been killed by one of our Epissingue Indians, having been mistaken for an Englishman, whilst occupied in drawing a plan of Fort Chouaguin.

Return of the effects found in the forts of Chouaguin, and forwarded to Frontenac by the sloops and bateaux, exclusive of the pillage, viz:

- 7 brass cannon, 19, 14 and 12-pounders.
- 48 iron cannon, 9, 6, 5, 3 and 2-pounders.
- 1 brass mortar, 9 inches, 4 lines.
- 13 brass mortars, of 6 and 3 inches.
- 5 brass howitzers, of 6 and 3 inches.
- 47 patereros.
- 23 thousand weight of powder.
- 8 thousand weight of lead in bullets and shot.
- 2950 balls.
- 150 9 inch shells.
- 300 6 inch ditto.
- 1476 grenades.
- 340 grapeshot.
- 12 pairs of iron wheels for marine carriages.

Vessels.

- 1 snow pierced for 18 guns.
- 1 brigantine pierced for 16 guns.
- 1 schooner pierced for 10 guns.
- 1 bateau pierced for 10 guns.
- 1 bateau pierced for 8 guns and two swivels.
- 1 skiff, carrying 8 swivels.
- 1 skiff on the stocks, which has burnt.
- 200 barges and bateaux.

Provisions.

- 352 two barrel casks, full of biscuit.
- 1386 tierces of salt pork and beef.
- 712 barrels of flour.
- 200 sacks of flour.
- 11 tierces of rice.
- 7 barrels of salt.
- 1 garret full of peas.
- 1 garret full of flour, piled in bags.
- 32 live oxen.
- 15 hogs.

A quantity of rum and Madeira wine, which the officers who made the capitulation were recommended to have staved, on account of the Indians, whom it was impossible to control.

The military chest and three boxes, containing only 18,000<sup>l</sup>, the troops having received nine months' pay eight days before the capture; besides, there is every appearance that the gold has been distributed among the English officers, each of whom was well supplied with it.

The five flags taken from them have been sent, viz: two to Quebec, one to Three Rivers, and the other two to Montreal.

27th August. After having razed Fort Chouaguin from cellar to rafter, and removed all the property found in it, the regiments which served at the siege proceeded direct to Laprairie de la Madelaine, to march, overland, to St. John, and to go thence in bateaux to Carillon, in order to obviate the attack meditated by the enemy, whom the English prisoners estimate at least at ten thousand men, divided between Fort George and Fort Lidius, exclusive of two flying camps, within three or six leagues of Orange. We are, at present, prepared to meet them and even to go and attack them.

It has been found necessary to send some men back from Frontenac to the Bay of Niaouré for the provisions we had forwarded thither for our army, as well as to get those brought in bateaux from Chouaguin. A portion of our army has been obliged to march by land as far as that bay; the barges and bateaux have been burnt, as those could only partially accommodate us for want of men to man them.

By letters of the 29th April, from M. Bellaitre, at the Beautiful river, we have learned that, having gone into the interior one hundred and fifty leagues below Fort Duquesne, with twenty Franchmen, one hundred and fifty Miamis, Ouïas and some Chaouanons as guides, he arrived at Carolina and marched about sixty leagues through settlements that have been abandoned, at the end of which time he fell in with a village of thirty or forty houses, which were taken and burnt; close by was a small wooden fort, that was summoned to surrender; on its refusing to comply, it was carried by assault and the garrison put to the sword. The killed and prisoners amounted to about three hundred; all the oxen and cows having been collected together were killed; a hundred and twenty horses, which they found, served to carry the large quantity of plunder the Indians got, and in returning they set fire to all the settlements they had left.

M<sup>r</sup> de Bellaitre has been slightly wounded in one arm and in the shoulder. We have lost five men and had five or six wounded.

The Flatheads, to the number of seventy villages, inhabiting Carolina and New Georgia, are coming, with the consent of all the interior tribes, to settle on the Beautiful river, on condition that they will make war on the English, which they have accepted and promised to do this fall after saving their harvests.

Several other parties from the Beautiful river, who have returned with English prisoners and a quantity of scalps, assure that, for sixty leagues below Fort Cumberland, towards the sea coast, the settlements have been abandoned and burnt, and that the greater part of the country remains unsown.

According to the report of the English prisoners from Chouaguin, they have lost twelve hundred men by disease, between the month of August, 1755, and the 15th of August, 1756, the date of the capture of that fort. Add to this the capture of the fort by M<sup>r</sup> de Léry, the blow struck by M<sup>r</sup> de Villiers and divers small parties, exclusive of the dead and prisoners at Fort Chouaguin.

12th September. We have learned that a party of Englishmen and Indians, having been discovered at Point a Squénonton,<sup>1</sup> in Lake Champlain, has been pursued; two of the English have been taken and carried to Carillon; the remainder escaped.

The same opportunity informs us that two officers belonging to La Reine, being fishing on the other side of the river, opposite Carillon, have been killed. Their names are de Biville and de Tersaqué, an Ensign.

15th September. Chevalier de Celoron, an officer, has arrived with a letter from Captain Dumas, commanding at Fort Duquesne, informing us that Captain de Villiers, of the Illinois, having left Fort Duquesne with twenty-three Frenchmen and thirty Indians, had, on the 15th of August, attacked a fort on the frontiers of Pennsylvania, in which were two pieces of cannon, thirty-three persons, including some women and children, the Commandant having left some days before with forty men as an escort, for a port near the sea, distant about thirty leagues; he had this fort summoned, and as it refused to surrender, he kept up a fire of musketry during two days, whilst one-half his men were making faggots of dry wood with which he set fire to that fort. An hour before day one part of the garrison was put to the sword and the other taken prisoners. This fort contained six months' provisions for one hundred men.

Two hundred Indians and French left Fort Duquesne to set fire to four hundred houses in a part of Pennsylvania. That Province has suffered but little in consequence of the intrigues of the Five Nations with the Taskarosins, a tribe on the lands of that Province and in alliance with the Five Nations. But, now, they have declared that they will assist their brethren, the Delawares and Chouanons, and consequently several have sided with them, so that the above Province will be laid waste the same as Virginia and Carolina.

This extract contains many clerical errors, both of diction and orthography; but he who sent it me, has assured me, in his letter which accompanied it, that it was substantially very correct.

Many accounts differ so much the one from the other, that 'tis impossible to determine which to credit. The main facts cannot be questioned, because all the officers who were in the various actions that have taken place, agree therein.

Camp at Carillon, 22 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1756.

My Lord,

In reporting to you in my last, all that concerned the expedition against Chouaguen, I had the honor to inform you of my return to the camp at Carillon, with the regiments of Guienne, Bearn and one hundred men belonging to that of La Sarre. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, who was justified in fearing the superiority of the enemy's forces in this quarter, has collected 600 Indians. As it is impossible to retain them as long as would be desirable, the season especially being so much advanced, I dispatched, a few days after my arrival, agreeably to the Marquis de Vaudreuil's instruction, a considerable detachment of our Indians, under the orders of Captain de la Perriere, of the Marine.

This detachment has accomplished many objects the Marquis de Vaudreuil had at heart; the mere movement of it has made the enemy precipitately abandon some islands in Lake St. Sacrament, where it was feared they would establish themselves. M. Mercier, Commander of the artillery, M. Desandrouins, Engineer, and M. de Bougainville, one of my Aids, have taken advantage of the circumstance of this detachment to push farther than we had yet done, our reconnoissances of the enemy's position and the different soundings of that lake.

Lieutenant Marin, of the Marine, having been detached with one hundred men to reconnoitre the enemy's camp, could induce only a party of 52 men, including 3 officers, to come out. One man of the party only escaped, to carry to my Lord Loudon the news of their defeat. We had but two Indians killed and three wounded. I had there, in addition to a number of Colonial officers, M. de la Roche Beaucourt, one of my Aids-de-Camp.

The majority of the Indians left me, according to their custom, after this expedition, but the Marquis de Vaudreuil is about to send me some others. It appears to me that we are about to remain on both sides on the defensive, and if the uniform report of prisoners is to be credited, the English, notwithstanding superior numbers, are thinking only of terminating their campaign without receiving any check. As for our part, with all the zeal possible, we can only occupy ourselves for the next month in hastening the fort commenced last year, which, without being completely finished, will be in a state of defence, and expediting the convoys which are victualing this frontier. I will, as much as lies in my power, keep up small parties to scatter consternation and the miseries of the war throughout the enemy's country. Previous to this detachment, the enemy were so bold as to send out some parties against us to take some of our scalps. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Biville and de Tarsac, who had wandered away hunting, notwithstanding Chevalier de Levis' reiterated prohibitions, had the misfortune to be killed some days before my arrival.

For the defence of this quarter and the distribution of the troops which I have brought along, I cannot do better than follow up Chevalier de Levis' arrangements. He has reported them to you, my Lord, and it appears to me that they need no addition.

I am, with respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp at Carillon, 26th 7<sup>ber</sup>, 1756.

My Lord,

I had the honor to write you on the 22nd, reporting my arrival at Carillon with the regiments of Guienne, Bearn, and one hundred men of La Sarre. The remainder of this regiment has remained in the vicinity of Frontenac, to bring away the artillery and prisoners, and will conclude its campaign by working at the road between Laprairie and St. John—a road in our rear, of the greatest consequence for our communications. In the same despatch I had the honor to report to you the deaths of Lieutenants de Bivelle and de Torsac of the regiment of La Reine, who have been killed before my arrival by the Indians attached to the English, in consequence of having gone out to hunt, notwithstanding Chevalier de Levis' reiterated prohibitions. I had likewise the honor of informing you of a strong detachment of Canadians and Indians which I had formed a few days after my arrival, for the purpose of reconnoitring the enemy's position and intimidating his outposts. On this movement, he abandoned the islands in Lake St. Sacrament, where he seemed desirous to take up a position, and a detachment of fifty-two men, including three officers sent to reconnoitre us, has been entirely defeated. One man only will have carried the news to my Lord Loudon. And I do not believe that this General will expose himself at the end of the campaign with us, although able to concentrate ten thousand men in twenty-four hours. I calculate to keep the field fully a month yet.

From letters written at Fort Duquesne the 13th of August, [I learn] that we continue to lay waste Pennsylvania and Virginia. The Chaouanons and Delawares have forced all the settlements to be abandoned. To make any forays they must go thirty leagues into the interior. Chevalier de Villiers, Lieutenant of the Colonial troops, with a detachment of 55 men, captured Fort Granville,<sup>1</sup> within 60 miles of Philadelphia. It was garrisoned by 35 men and provisioned for six months, and had two swivels. All have been burnt, killed or taken prisoners.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil and M. Bigot have communicated to me an order they have received from the Keeper of the Seals, whereby all the allowances granted to the officers for subsistence, even the wine, is to be cut off in the next campaign, and they are to be reduced, the same as the soldier, to the simple ration, leaving them at liberty to provide themselves with the surplus as they think proper. This article interests equally the officers of the Line and of the Marine. It is possible that they received too much last year, and that too much is to be deducted for the next. I have transmitted to the Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Intendant a Memoir on this subject, and shall concert with them respecting the representations they will consider it their duty to make to the Keeper of the Seals, and I shall act with as much circumspection as zeal for the King's interests.

You perceive, my Lord, that I have nothing very important to communicate in this letter; but I wish to inform you of everything relative to the troops, the command of which you have confided to me, and not allow a ship to sail without having the honor to write to you.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

M. de Montcalm to ———.

Camp at Carillon, 26th September, 1756.

I have returned to the camp at Carillon on the 10th with Guienne, Bearn and 100 men of La Sarre. Fears were seemingly entertained, in the Colony, that Lord Lowdon would collect all his forces together to attack us. Some small parties were so bold as to come around our camp; Lieutenants de Biville and de Torsac, of the regiment of La Reine, had been scalped in consequence of having gone hunting in spite of Chevalier de Levis' repeated interdictions. Some days after my arrival I formed a strong detachment of Canadians and Indians. Its movement caused the enemy to abandon some islands in Lake St. Sacrament, where they seemed desirous to establish themselves. Following this detachment I sent out Chevalier Mercier, Commander of the artillery, Sieur Desandrouins, Engineer, and Sieur de Bougainville, one of my Aids-de-Camp, to acquire information of that quarter, without compromising themselves. This detachment could not, by sending a small party close to the enemy's intrenchments, draw out more than a detachment of 52 men, including 3 officers, of which only one man escaped.

I intend to make my reviews for the close of the campaign about the 15th; to take back the 100 men belonging to La Sarre and to reach Montreal about the 20th in order to send off my last despatches. Chevalier de Levis, who is well acquainted with this frontier and who has made the best arrangements in the world, which I have followed, will call in the troops at the end of October or forepart of November. Lord Lowdon appears to me to be able to concentrate 10 thousand men on this frontier within 24 hours.

Our last news from the Beautiful river, of the 13th of August, are excellent. M. Dumas, a Colonial Captain, who commands there, continues to devastate Pennsylvania. Chevalier de Villiers, a Lieutenant, brother of M. de Jumonville, who was assassinated by the English, and of a Captain de Villiers, who made a most brilliant campaign this year in the direction of Lake Ontario; Chevalier de Villiers, I say, has, with 55 men, just burnt Fort Grandville,<sup>1</sup> in Pennsylvania, 60 miles from Philadelphia. It had two swivels, 6 months' provisions, and a garrison of 30 men, with Lieutenant Brafot, who has been killed.

Montreal, 1st November, 1756.

My Lord,

I had the honor, since the reduction of Chouaguen, of writing to you on the 22nd and 26th of September, and now transmit duplicates of my despatches. Nothing of interest has occurred since the strong detachment, whereof I have rendered you an account, which caused the enemy to abandon the advanced posts they had established in the Islands of Lake St. Sacrament, and killed three officers and fifty-two men they had sent out to fight. Neither side has done anything more than to send out small scouting parties. We have had two soldiers of Bearn killed. The enemy have lost some scalps and prisoners, whose report informs me that Lord Loudon has concentrated all his troops on my arrival, and after my detachment had marched. I considered this movement, on his part, rather defensive than offensive.

I quitted the army on the 27th of October, in consequence of being obliged to come to confer with the Marquis de Vaudreuil before the last fleet sailed. To Chevalier de Levis is left the duty of making the army file off to its different quarters, the return of which I have the honor to transmit you. He will not decamp with the battalions forming the rear-guard until between the 10th and 15th, when it is to be hoped that Fort Carillon, which was begun last year, will be safe from every insult and capable of receiving a garrison of three hundred and fifty men.

The arrangement of our quarters has been subjected to great variations. M. de Vaudreuil allowed me the choice of the battalions. After I left, he changed four battalions, either through ignorance, or to cause me disgust.

Chevalier de Levis has made himself very acceptable to the troops. He has a decidedly military tone in the routine of commanding; he is not surprised, and knows how to come to a decision; to be firm; to deviate from orders issued sixty leagues away, when he considers them contrary to what's right, in consequence of circumstances a General at a distance has not been able to foresee. He has made a good selection in Sieur de Fonbrune, a Lieutenant in the Marine grenadiers, whom you permitted him to bring over and have appointed a Seconded Captain. He is a soldier, possesses good sense, is laborious and very useful to Chev. de Levis.

The latter was destined to pass his winter at Quebec, but he will arrive too late to reach that place. I am very glad of it, for I shall spend my winter with him at Montreal, where our staff will be quartered.

M. de Bourlamaque, who was to leave the army with the first division yesterday, will repair to Quebec. He even wished it, on account of his bad health. There need be no fear on this point, which is not believed. He desired that I should write to you of him to prepare for the application of his

He does not as yet possess the tone of command; is too much addicted to minutiae, follows too literally orders issued eighty leagues off, by a General who knows not how to speak of war.

Chevalier de Levy, like me, receives orders and despatches written with inexcusable duplicity, yet exposing us to blame in case of failure. This is not by way of complaint, for I write nothing about it to M. de Machault, but communicate to you my critical position, which Chev. de Levis has mentioned particularly to his relatives.

I have the honor to transmit to you a plan of Fort Carillon, drawn by Captain Germain, of the regiment of La Reine, to be presented to you with his respects. That fort, full of defects, serves to enrich the Colonial Engineer, one of M. de Vaudreuil's relations. The enemy has always the advantage of a month in the field, during which we cannot afford it any assistance.

Our situation is critical; provisions are needed; the harvest has failed, and people are compelled to mix oats with the wheat. Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Vaudreuil and Bigot have written to M. Machault, reproaching him strongly for not having sent the provisions demanded last winter. Should supplies not be received early, it will be impossible to effect anything against the enemy.

I have drawn up with attention the review of our six battalions. I annex an extract thereof to this despatch, which will show you, my Lord, the number of recruits required. The

Marquis de Vaudreuil demands an augmentation of the troops of the Line, and as he is as yet undecided as to the number and form, I shall write you separately on these points.

He is very urgent, at the same time, for wherewith to feed them, and (states) that he is in want of provisions. He sends back six vessels; a number of the prisoners are conveyed to England and France on that account.

I have been pretty well satisfied with the steadiness of our six battalions; La Reine, Guyenne and Bearn are in the best order; the Languedoc battalion in the worst; its staff is good. The Royal Roussillon battalion is good; that of La Sarre better in Canada than in France. Its Commander pays attention to it.

M. de Montreuil is a brave man without any detail or talent for the position of Major-General.

M. de Bougainville regards you as his protector in war and his Mæcenas in the republic of letters; occupying himself considerably with his profession, he does not forget L'Academie des Sciences. He has seen, by the public news, that there was a vacancy in the place of Geometrician, to which he would have supposed he could aspire through your favor and his work, had he remained in France. Is his being in America temporarily and on the King's service to exclude him from it? Could it not be kept for him by leaving it vacant as you have the goodness to do in the case of the Lieutenant Colonelcies? I should be personally much obliged to you for so doing.

The English will possibly think of reëstablishing themselves at Fort Chouaguen. I had made a proposition to employ, in the spring, a zebec with four hundred Canadians, a great many Indians and our armed sloops. The Marquis de Vaudreuil says, that the English have burnt Fort Bull, which is of no account in that quarter on one side or the other.

Towards Fort Duquesne the English will not be as strong as we, in consequence of the Indians. The English all turned to one point — Lake St. Sacrament. M. de Vaudreuil wishes to besiege Fort George; difficult; that of Fort Lidius, impossible. An attempt has been made at Quebec to place cannon on two bateaux joined together.

My plan would be an attempt on Acadia, were France willing to send a fleet with some troops; but provisions are needed most of all. A thousand picked Indians could be furnished here; we have also fifteen hundred Acadians. That would create a diversion. I would take charge of it even though a General officer would be sent with troops from France.

The English may make an expedition at Gaspé and cut off all reinforcements. France ought to reflect on sending a fleet. The English have ships that winter at Halifax.

Should peace be concluded this winter, the Marquis de Vaudreuil asks, I believe, that two battalions be left to labor on the roads and public works. Should this be determined on, 'twould, no doubt, be the two last arrived, the Commanders of which would, it appears to me, suffice. 'Twould be an affair of a year or eighteen months.

We have here the hostages given for the execution of the capitulation of Fort Necessity. You have seen, by the papers taken from General Braddock, that Captain Robert Stobo, one of the two, was sending plans. Preparations are making for their trial by the King's order; execution of the judgment will be suspended. M. de Vaudreuil, with some of the Colonial officers, will hold the court by which they are to be tried.

Should a little live Beaver, that I have intrusted to Chevalier de la Rigaudiere, Lieutenant in the Navy, commanding the frigate La Licorne, arrive alive, it will be presented to you from me, with a letter.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

I have the honor to address you a copy of the Memoir I transmit to the Keeper of the Seals on the retrenchment which M. Bigot had ordered for the officers during the course of the campaign.

---

M. de Lotbinière to the Minister.

My Lord,

I sent you, last year, a tolerably succinct detail of the operations of the campaign, which has been much more flattering to us than appearances promised, since, without entertaining the least suspicion of such a thing, the enemy was preparing to invade all our frontiers; it terminated, on our side, in the loss of Beausejour, on the frontier of Acadia, which we could never preserve for the reasons I have had the honor to detail to you in 1754, and which, sooner or later, will be the ruin of Canada if people are as infatuated about it as in times gone by; in the defeat of General Braddock, with his entire army, whilst approaching Fort Duquesne to lay siege to it, and which he would have undoubtedly reduced had he reached it, as 'tis very feebly defended; in attacking the enemy, who was beginning a post on the border of Lake Saint Sacrament, wherein our only disadvantage was the loss of our General; in other respects, less real losses, by half, than the enemy; and this march, although a piece of bravado, made sufficient impression on the enemy to arrest his progress, which, according to his plans, was to be directed against St. Frederic and induced us to build a fort at Carillon, situate, as I have observed to you, at the head of the navigation of Lake St. Sacrament, and is the surest place to check the enemy, whether he make his appearance from Lake St. Sacrament or approach by Wood creek, or the head of South bay, as all these waters unite at Carillon point. The fort is, at present, in a very good condition and capable of sustaining a siege. Next campaign will render it respectable, in consequence of the augmentations to be made to it; and after a serious and very deliberate examination I fear not to assert, that it is, for us, the post the most essential to be preserved in order to prevent the enemy penetrating, by this frontier, which is, in reality, the easiest and most certain route to enter into the interior of the country. I remained there up to the 10th of February in order to place it beyond a coup de main, and came, at the end of April, to resume this work in order to conduct it to the point which it has now reached. I have long intended sending you, my Lord, a particular map of the country which would have demonstrated to you all the advantage of this place, but I have been so much occupied by details pushed to minuteness here, where, despite of himself, a man must work at all trades, possessing no means of relief, that I have found it impossible for me to execute my observations. As I shall, according to every appearance, have the winter to myself, I will make it my first business.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil had projected the siege of Chouaguen as early as the beginning of last year. He was diverted from his design by the dangers menacing this frontier, to which he had conveyed the reinforcements necessary for its protection. He contented himself, at that time, with covering Niagara and Frontenac by aid of two battalions.

In execution of his original plan, he dispatched, in the month of February, Lieutenant de Lery, of the Marines, at the head of a detachment of 300 and odd men, to reduce a fort which served as an entrepôt for Chouaguen. After inexpressible difficulties, having marched, overland, more than 120 leagues through the woods to reach the place, that detachment succeeded in reducing it. They found in the fort more than twenty bateau loads of provisions, nearly forty thousand weight of powder and a quantity of ball, shell and grenades, which were thrown into the river; and whilst the powder was being carried there also, a barrack in the fort caught fire which communicated, in a very short time, to the powder magazine. This catching, blew up everything in the fort, which also was demolished by the shock. Within three-quarters of a league of this fort was another entrepôt, but 'twas impossible to attack it, as it was garrisoned by more than 200 men, who were very well advised of all that was going on. Wherefore, the detachment set out on its return to Montreal, where it arrived somewhat late in April.

On the opening of spring, M. de Vaudreuil sent a detachment of 4 to 500 Canadians to hang around Chouaguen in order to cut off the communication between the entrepôts and that fort. This detachment has had occasion to harass the enemy, who, at the close of June, were attacked on their way by water, though numbering nearly 2 thousand. They lost 400 men and we not more than 4 or 5; one an officer of our Regulars. This affair decided the siege of Chouaguen. M. de Vaudreuil, in consequence, wrote to Mr. de Montcalm, who was, at the time, in this fort, which, 'twas reported, would be attacked, but had already begun to assume a somewhat promising appearance. That General, with three battalions, and others amounting to 3,000 and odd men, including Marines and Canadians, succeeded, in three days, in obliging the enemy, numbering nearly 1,800, to surrender prisoners of war. This appears fabulous, yet the thing is exactly so. 'Tis true that the landing was easy in consequence of our detachment of Canadians and Indians, who had been, for some time preceding, masters of the field. Besides, we considered this position much stronger than it really was. Old Chouaguen was nothing more than a house 60 feet long by 24 in width, with loop-holes and machicolises, and some pieces of cannon in that story. It was surrounded by an enceinte, having the form of a country church flanked by two chapels; last year an addition was made to it of a raised earth-work having one of the two chapels on one corner and the lake on the other; but as all that ground was sloping and [commanded] by an adjoining hill on the right bank of the river, whence the rear of the raised work was visible, they had erected on this hill a star fort having strong oak stockades and a ditch, six to eight feet wide all around; all who have been at that siege agree that this work was the best of all those at Chouaguen. The trench was opened before this fort which the enemy abandoned on the evening of the following day, before a single gun could be discharged against it. Some officers of our troops, perceiving that the fire of this fort had wholly ceased, concluded, with reason, that the enemy had abandoned it; they approached and finally scaled it and gave notice that no one was in it. The guns were brought nearer in the course of the night; batteries were prepared which, at day light, were only knee high. They were made use of in that state to batter old Chouaguen. The commander was killed which caused trouble in the garrison. In the evening the Canadian troop was ordered to cross towards the fort with the Canadians and Indians, which so terrified the enemy that he that very instant beat a parley. Thus you perceive, my Lord, that this siege has not cost us much. We found some vessels there, one of which is a frigate of 20 @ 24 guns; in all, a hundred and I know not how many more pieces of ordnance, a quantity of provisions and munitions of war, a military chest. As soon as the place was surrendered, Fort Ontario (that with stockades) was demolished. The house was filled with condemned pork and afterwards set on fire, and then the troops retired with the artillery and ships. 'Tis a pity that they had not filled-in the harbor before they withdrew. By that means the enemy, who needs a navy to sustain himself on Lake Ontario, would have been obliged to think of getting out some other way; he would require to have new entrepôts; to cut new roads, and whatever movement he might make in that direction next year was not to be feared, and we should have then but a single point of view, which is this quarter, whilst having left the port open, the enemy is free to bethink himself of occupying it; the entrepôts already established will be of use to him, and if we see him take that route in the spring, we shall be obliged to divide our force to prevent Chouaguen being reestablished; consequently we shall be unable to attack, and obliged to confine ourselves to the defensive. Besides, I think it had been better to leave a battalion that would have destroyed the entire establishment from top to bottom, and we should be much more certain of the demolition than by leaving to the flames the work of reducing all the stores of the building to powder, so as to render them unserviceable hereafter. It is pretty doubtful that the fire had kept long enough in all those pork barrels. Moreover, it is well established that the fire, after having consumed everything, reduces the walls to the point of being no longer serviceable, or at least, that the materials cannot be used. I fear new sprouts in that quarter.

Many persons thought that it would have been better to fortify it well and garrison it, saying that were Chouaguen ours, we might dispense with Niagara and Frontenac. A false conclusion, and I prove it thus: If the enemy had no other outlet than the Chouaguen river, to make his appearance on Lake Ontario, 'tis certain that, by holding the mouth of that river, we should block his passage, and then Niagara and Frontenac ought not be regarded, except as entrepôts, without thinking of fortifying them with much care; but as he can penetrate by the Bay of the Cayugas, or the river Kaskonchiagon<sup>1</sup> and even elsewhere, it follows that Chouaguen would be of no use to us, should the enemy decide on the one or the other. I will say more, which is that the enemy, I think, would have reason to demand it back at the peace; for although it be on our soil, it has been left to him long enough to authorize him to say that such possession on his part was never questioned; consequently, that the place was regarded as belonging to him. Therefore, in every point of view, nothing better could be done than to destroy it; but the question was to effect that in such a way as to deprive the enemy of all desire to come and establish himself there. Had he then attempted it, or any other establishment, he could be opposed from Niagara or Frontenac, as our navy, which is increased more than half on the lake, furnishes us sure means of conveying artillery and men to resist his efforts.

I am much deceived if the reduction of Acadia has not been proposed to the Court. Should forces be sent from France in sufficient number, well; but I should consider it dangerous to divide the forces in Canada for the purpose of transporting them so far in a time when it appears that the enemy is directing his efforts against the upper part of the country. Besides, attention is to be directed to the fact, that the absolute conquest of this country is meditated; and not to Beausejour which will be always a burthen to us, and which we shall never be able to retain so long as we shall possess it alone. The English have deprived us of a great advantage by removing the French families that were settled there on their different plantations; thus we would have to make new settlements.

I flatter myself, my Lord, that you will be pleased out of consideration for the little leisure I have at my disposal, to excuse the want of connection in my letter. As I am aware that you take an interest in the country, I endeavor to pass in review before you the different objects which have appeared to me deserving of attention, and thereby I believe I do my country an essential service.

We have this year lost M. de Lery, Engineer-in-Chief of the Colony. I might hope to succeed him were I to rely on what has been promised me when I was in France. If I dared flatter myself that you would condescend to interest yourself to procure me that situation, as well as the company which I, as it were, touch by the seniority of my rank, it would be an obligation I should unite to those I already owe you, for which I will retain an eternal gratitude.

I am with the most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Carillon, this 2 November, 1756.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

My Lord,

Montreal, 6 November.

I have had the honor of rendering you a very exact account of every occurrence of interest in this Colony. I shall be much flattered, my Lord, if my conduct deserve the King's and your approbation. I hope his Majesty will not refuse it me, if you, my Lord, will have the goodness to remind him:

1st. In what Condition the Colony was turned over to me.

2nd. Of the obstacles I had to surmount in consequence of the unfortunate events of Baron de Dieskaw's campaign.

3rd. The breaking out of the small-pox, which made terrible ravages.

4th. The scarcity of provisions and the unsteadiness of the winter season.

5th. My expedition against the English fort at the Choueguen carrying place which was the enemy's principal depôt of provisions and ammunitions, and which I had carried by assault

6th. My activity in taking the field and anticipating the enemy.

7th. My policy in having sent the Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis to Carillon in order to make the enemy believe that my principal object was to offer resistance at that point.

8th. My manœuvre to harass the English at Chouaguen, and the gradual establishment of a camp within reach of intercepting all their supplies.

9th. My success in the expedition against these three forts, notwithstanding the difficulties that existed.

10th. The prompt reunion of my forces at Carillon where I kept General Loudon in check, though he had at his disposal an army of about 20,000 men.

11th. The two forts I caused to be taken from the enemy in the direction of Virginia and Pennsylvania by small detachments of our Canadians and Indians; their incursions into the settlements of these two Provinces, and those of Maryland and Philadelphia.

12th. The district of Acadia, where I have constantly maintained myself, and where the enemy has been constantly harassed by my attention to setting the Acadians and Indians in motion.

13th. My foresight for the safety of Gaspé where the enemy made two fruitless attempts to land for the purpose of establishing himself there.

14th. The three remaining forts belonging to the enemy at the Choueguen portage, which I made him abandon and burn without striking a blow, by making use of the 5 Nations, and getting them to act in correspondence with my views.

It appears from all this, my Lord, that I not only kept the English in check, but seriously humbled them at the moment they justly imagined themselves best able to satisfy their ambitious designs, without it being possible for me to offer any proper resistance, in consequence of the superiority of their forces on Lake Ontario, as well as on Lake St. Sacrament.

I beg you, my Lord, to be pleased to assure his Majesty that I am employing every means at this moment, to be in a position to gratify, during the ensuing campaign, the zeal which has ever animated me for his service.

I am morally certain that all the forces of New England will be directed against Carillon. I shall oppose to General Loudon all those at my disposal; but whether I confine myself to the defensive, or whether circumstances will permit me to decide on the offensive, I shall not be able to undertake anything, my Lord, unless you have the goodness to order the supplies we require to be forwarded to us in season.

The 1,500 barrels of flour Mr. Bigot requires of you by way of Rochefort, are, I assure you my Lord, absolutely necessary to enable us to take the field; it is even proper that this first shipment be 2,000 barrels; which will be by no means too much. You will be pleased, my Lord, to facilitate the privateers that are to have the provisions on board, so that they may sail in February.

We are thus reduced to such straits that M. Bigot will not be able to avoid mixing oats in the bread, and ordering the wheat to be threshed whilst green. This, added to its bad quality, will be the cause of our losing more than the half of it; but 'tis our only remaining resource.

This will enable you, my Lord, to judge whether 'twill be possible for me to make any movement this winter. I was, nevertheless, disposed to overwhelm the enemy by blows from our Indians, so as to afford myself more facilities in my spring operations.

Had we received the eight thousand barrels of flour Mr. Bigot had had the honor to request of you, I should not be straitened.

What could I have done, had it not been for the success of my expedition against the three Chouaguen forts and the small quantity of provisions that fortunate event procured me? Could I have furnished subsistence to a corps of troops at Frontenac and Niagara, and victualled the posts on the Beautiful river? Our critical situation proves but too conclusively, that I would not have been able to do so, and in such a conjuncture, what would have become of Frontenac, Niagara and the Beautiful river?

I rely, my Lord, on your having the goodness to respect my representations and to issue your orders for the despatch of the provisions. There cannot be too much of them, and it would be very unfortunate were the Colony endangered for want of that foresight. All my operations are subordinate to the condition I shall find myself in, as regards provisions, and should these fail, I shall not be able to undertake anything.

Should we not receive supplies early, so far from being able to offer any resistance to the enemy, I shall, on the contrary, be obliged to distribute the troops throughout the rural districts to get them supported as well as may be, and if, unfortunately, I am reduced to this hard necessity, will any situation be more favorable than that of General Loudon? It would be very difficult for me to avoid his knowing ours, and what will he not do then?

But at the same time, if these provisions reach us I shall unite to the Colonial forces all the Indian Nations, who will consume a large quantity of provisions, but we shall be compensated therefor by the ravages in the enemy's country.

It is equally essential, my Lord, that the munitions of war reach me at the same time as the provisions; for, should circumstances permit, I shall proceed offensively.

The article of goods requires not less attention. We cannot have too large a supply of them in the King's stores in order to be able to provide for the wants of the Indians, principally the 5 Nations, whom I must treat well to prevent any of them joining the English.

It only remains for me, my Lord, to propose to you:

1st To form the eight companies which have been taken from the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc, without affecting those within reach of the enemy. By such augmentation these two battalions would be equal to the other four, and we might organize a grenadier company in each.

2<sup>o</sup> To put the 72 ordinary companies of the six battalions at 45 men, like those of the grenadiers.

3<sup>o</sup> To increase each ordinary company, and those of grenadiers, five men, whereby the battalions would be each 650 men. The three augmentations form an object of 1,080 men and are equal to two battalions, without obliging his Majesty to risk entire corps or to send too large a number of officers, who increase expenses and are a charge on the Colony for lodgings and provisions.

4<sup>o</sup> To send 300 men to complete the French battalions, having regard to the number wanting in each, and to the probable number of deaths this winter, in order that these soldiers may be in a condition to enter the field on the moment of their arrival and to support the fatigue. The King might direct one man to be taken per each infantry battalion in France.

5<sup>o</sup> To order to the Colony 200 Highland (de Montagne) Rousillon Fusileers. They will be very useful, if it were only to respond to the dispatch of the Scotch Highlanders by the English, and to excite the vanity of our Indians, who certainly will do their utmost to prove to these Fusileers that no light infantry can equal them.

6th To increase the company of Bombardiers according to the proposal I have had the honor to submit to you on the subject in my private despatch of same date.

7<sup>o</sup> Two able and experienced Engineers.

8<sup>o</sup> The augmentation of the ten companies in the detached troops of the Marine, at the rate of 65 men per company, is the most essential object.

9<sup>o</sup> Provisions in proportion to this increase of troops.

I suppose, in these propositions, that the Court of England will not send over additional forces to New England. Should it decide upon sending any, you will no doubt know it, and in such case I beg you to be pleased to add to my requisitions a second complement of troops in proportion to that which will be sent by the English.

If all these reinforcements, my Lord, reach me as safely and as early as I desire, I have the honor to assure you that the English will not make any progress in the next campaign.

I am with the most profound respect,

Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 10 November, 1756.

My Lord,

In conforming myself to his Majesty's intentions, I have made arrangements to proceed with the trial of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Stobo and Wambrant, English officers, who were delivered up to M. de Villiers as security for the articles of capitulation he granted to Major Wachenston.

I have the honor to annex hereunto copy in form of the judgment of the court martial and of the procedure whereupon it has been rendered. You will perceive, my Lord, that Mr. Stobo has been charged and convicted of the crime of High Treason, and that he has been accordingly condemned to be beheaded. In regard to Mr. Wambrant, he has been acquitted. You will, also, observe, my Lord, by the proceedings, that Mr. Stobo, at first, would not admit any fact, but when in presence of the court, he acknowledged his letter and avowed his crime. I suspend the execution of this sentence agreeably to the King's orders.

I hope, my Lord, that you will find this trial regular. I omitted nothing in that regard. I have consulted all the authorities which treat of similar crimes, and do not believe that I have omitted any of the formalities prescribed by the ordinances.

I am, with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Conferences between M. de Vaudreuil and the Indians.

In the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, and on the thirteenth of December, at nine o'clock in the forenoon, before us Pierre Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor, Lieutenant-

General for the King in all New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, appeared in our Castle of Montreal, one hundred Indians accompanied by Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter of the Iroquois language, who stated to us that the Indians at whose head he is, are Cayugas, Onondagas, Oneidas, Tuskarorins, Canaoneuska, Totierono,<sup>1</sup> Senecas, Skaniatarationo,<sup>2</sup> who come as a deputation in the name of their Nation; whereupon we have sent notice to M. Bigot, Councillor of the King in his councils, Intendant of Justice, Police, Finance and Marine throughout all New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana, and having sent for Chevalier de Lévy, Brigadier of the King's armies, Mr. Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of the town and district of Three Rivers, at present in this city, Mr. Dailleboust, Knight of the Military Order of St. Louis, the King's Lieutenant in the town and government of Montreal, Mr. de Noyan, also Knight of St. Louis, the King's Lieutenant of the said town and government of Three Rivers, likewise present in this city of Montreal, Mr. Duplessy Fabert, likewise Knight of St. Louis, Major of the troops and town of Montreal, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de la Valterie, de Sabrevois, de Contreccœur and Dumas, also Knights of St. Louis, Captains of a company of the troops belonging to the detachment of the Marine; and also having invited the principal Indians, chiefs of the Iroquois of the Sault St. Louis and of the Lake of the Two Mountains, Sieur Le Cavalier, Interpreter of the Iroquois language, the principal Indian chiefs and men of influence among the Nepissingues and Algonkins of the Lake of the Two Mountains, Sieur de Lacorne St. Luc, Captain of the troops of the detachment of the Marine, speaking the language of said Algonkins and Nepissingues, whom we have requested to act as their Interpreters, the principal chiefs and men of influence of the Outaouacs of Detroit and of the Pouteouatamis of Missilimakinac and Sieur St. Jean, Interpreter of their tongue, all which Indians are now in this town.

Which above named gentlemen and said Indians having forthwith appeared, after having explained to them, and caused to be explained to the Indians by their Interpreters, the subject for which we have made them come, and each having at the same time taken his place in the Council Chamber according to rank, Chinoniata, an Onondaga chief, rose up and, according as said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, hath explained the same, said to us :

By two Belts of Wampum.

Father. Here are the Five Nations who are about to express their sentiments and to testify to you the difficulty they experienced to quit the darkness in order to come to you.

We shall begin with the most serious affair. We request you, Father, to hear us, as well as our relatives, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan, Joncaire, Lachauvignerie, and all the chiefs here present. We have covered Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Senior and Junior at Niagara, and in your presence, but we did it imperfectly. The troubles that have occurred have been the sole cause of our not having acquitted ourselves of that ceremony as we ought.

As we could not sufficiently cover the death of Mr. de Longueuil, Senior, who was our child, eight Nations cover it by one of the two Belts. The Onondagas, particularly, cover the death of Mr. de Longueuil, Junior, who watched the Tree of Peace, and who was killed last year. We are delighted that all his relatives hear us. The other Belt is from the Taskarorins for the same purpose.

<sup>2</sup> Skaniadaradichroones (VL, 964, 977.)

By a Belt.

Father. Here is a message which comes from the Onondagas, though on the behalf of the Five Nations. By this Belt we collect together the bones of all your warriors, which we cover, in order that you may hear us without having anything to trouble you.

We love all your children belonging to the Nations near you. We cover the dead of all those who have been in like manner killed.

By a Belt.

Father. By half this Belt we kindle a new fire to work at good business; by the other half, we request Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil and Noyan to forget the losses they have met and to assist us in laboring at good business.

By a Belt.

Father. We will say to you by half this Belt, that Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan and others, our children, raise up again Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, their brothers; and by the other half, we request you, when we shall speak to you on business, to assist us the same as those of the Sault and all your other children.

By a Belt.

Father. By half this Belt we drive away the clouds that conceal the Sun from us; by the other half, we set up another Sun in order that all your children may have light and may labor at good business.

We have not as much sense as our ancients. You can see in their messages the speeches they made you. We, from our hearts, say the same thing to you.

By a Belt.

Father. This Belt is a phial of liquor which we present you in order that you may reject whatever badness may be in your heart, so that you may speak plainly to us. This is a custom of the Five Nations which we shall always observe.

By a Belt and some Strings.

Father. This Belt is a tobacco pouch of which our Fathers made use when they perceived anything bad; they placed it on the shoulder and labored at good business. We renew the tobacco pouch. As we are short of Wampum we add to it some strings, in order that this tobacco pouch may be always full of tobacco.

By a Belt.

Father. 'Tis not [improbable] that there is some filth in this hall since we have not come to Council; by this Belt we clean it; we have cleaned our cabins, they contain no more dirt; we request you to believe that we speak to you from our hearts.

By some Strings.

Father. You told us last year that you desired the renewal of the ancient Councils. We are come for that purpose.

Our ancestors, in your Father's time, pulled up a Pine and made a hole to bury bad business therein; we have renewed that pit, and cast into it all that is past, in order that it be no more mentioned.

By a Belt.

Father. We are eight Nations who speak to you by this Belt. You wish to renew the ancient Councils. Here is the Tree of Peace; it begins to be old; we renew the three roots that sustain it, which shoot out towards the North, the South and West. It is beneath this Tree that we shall retire when any business arises.

The Delawares have united in this Belt. We speak for them and they will not delay to speak themselves.

By a Belt.

Father. The leaves of the Tree of Peace whereof we have just spoken, are dry; we were not at liberty to speak to you. Brethren, listen. By this Belt we restore the leaves to this Tree, in order that we may talk in the shade on good business.

By three Strings.

Father. Here are three strings of Wampum which have been given us by your late Father to unite all his children in one dish, wherein he put a beaver's tail with a small plug of tobacco for each, so that from friends we have become brethren, by the marriage of several women, Outaouacs, Pouteoutamis, etc. We renew this message in order that we might all work anew at good business.

By a Belt.

Father. Here is a Belt which has been given us by your late Father when he arranged all the Councils.

As he saw we could not remain at peace, by half this Belt he told us to go and make war and gave us a rod to strike the Flatheads and the Chicachas, whom he did not know.

By the other half of the Belt, he placed roots on the Tree of Peace; he said whoso would touch these roots, all the Nations should reunite. A Frenchman and an Indian having been killed on the Ohio river by the Chicachas and Flatheads, we made use of that rod to punish them.

We ask your permission to strike all those Nations; a portion of them desires to make peace, but as regards the others, we still strike them.

By a Belt.

Father. When we perceived that the English were threatening you, it made an impression on us; he has come near unto our village, we have been astonished at his scowling look; we turned towards you and saw you disposed to resist him; but always hold fast to your end of the Belt of peace; we have done likewise.

You have invited us to work at good business; we have been equally balanced, we could not take any side. Listen to us, Brethren here present; that is the sole cause of our inactivity.

Father. Had it been possible for us to make representations to you respecting your contest with the English, we should have done it.

We are very glad that you are quiet on your mat.

By a Belt.

Father. Permit us to express to you how glad we are to see the son of Mr. de Vaudreuil who gave us the messages of which we make use. By this Belt we request you to work as he did at good business and to engage all your children to unite with you.

We are very much obliged to you for having removed the barrier at Chouaguen which prevented our coming to see you in order to work at good business and to supply our wants. Leave that communication always open to us; we thank you for having left that path free.

By some Strings.

By these two Strings we inform you that Catarakouis was formerly a post to work at good business and to supply our wants; by one String we confirm that fort, and by the other we request you to have our necessities supplied there at a cheap rate, for the English will not furnish us the smallest article.

By the other two strings we also beg you to have our wants supplied at Niagara.

Formerly, when we were coming from war we had the Niagara portage; 'twas promised us that we should always possess it; 'tis now made by horses; we beg you to preserve that resource to us.

Father. This is what we have to say to you; we have nothing more at present; we request you to work at good business and we recommend Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan, Joncaire, Lachauvignerie and others, our relations, to unite with you for that purpose.

We tell our brethren of the Sault and of the Lake to report to their people, on returning home, everything we have just said to you.

And the said M. Perthuis, the Interpreter, hath signed with us.

Done the day and year above mentioned. Thus signed in the original.

And on the fourteenth of the said month of December, at three o'clock in the afternoon, We, the Governor-General aforesaid, accompanied, as before stated; the said Cayuga, Onondaga, Oneida, Tuscarora, Canaoneuska, Totierono, Seneca, Skanatiarationo, assisted by said S<sup>r</sup> Perthuis, Interpreter, being in said Council chamber, the chief, Chinoniata, arose, and, according as Sieur Perthuis hath explained to us, said:

Father. We have received all the messages you have sent us; we have kept them most carefully; to remove all your doubts we present them to you, and here is all that you were so good as to say to us.

[They repeat the words of each Belt or of each String of Wampum.]

We complied as best we could with everything you have asked of us.

By a Belt.

Father. When we Oneidas learned that you crossed the seas to come and govern this country, we felt a thrill of joy to see again the son of Mr. de Vaudreuil, our Father, who ruled over us with so much wisdom and kindness, but when we were assured of your sentiments by the conduct you have observed towards all your children, we have not hesitated any longer to come and greet you, in order to learn of ourselves whether everything that had been represented to us was true, and we are so pleased at it, that we promise you by this Belt never to estrange ourselves from your pleasure, requesting you to regard us as true children, who never refuse the obedience which is due you.

'Tis true, Father, that since the death of Tharca, one of our chiefs, who was wisely directing us, we have found ourselves in darkness, whereby we went astray, but we assure you that henceforth we shall do nothing capable of displeasing you, and we beg you to be so assured.

We seem to behold your late Father who, although in time of war, received with the same kindness as you do, two of our chiefs who came to speak to him.

By some Strings.

Father. Whilst we Oneidas were deliberating on coming to see you, the Taskarorins, who were attending the council, said to us: Brethren, we agree with you in sentiment; add this little message to your Belt, meanwhile we shall accompany you down to Montreal to assure our Father, from our own lips, that we will always be his faithful children.

And said Mr. Perthuis, the Interpreter, hath signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And on the twenty-first of December, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, at eight o'clock in the forenoon, We, the Governor-General aforesaid, accompanied, as above stated; the said Cayuga, Onondaga, Oneida, Taskarorins, Canaoneuska, Totierono, Seneca, Skaniatarationo Deputies, assisted by the said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, being in the Council chamber; caused said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, to explain to those Indians our answer to their speeches, and our address to those Indians, as follows:

By two Belts of Wampum.

Children. I am pleased to see you, the Five Nations, and the other three nations who have joined you.

I have heard all you have said; the chiefs and your relations here present have also paid attention to it.

I am aware that at Niagara and also in my presence, you have covered the deaths of Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, father and son; I thank you for ratifying that ceremony by the Belt you have given me in the name of the eight Nations, and by another Belt from the Taskarorins; you could not acquit yourself of that duty too well in regard to Mr. de Longueuil, Junior, of whose [death] you must admit yourselves to be the authors; by this Belt I thank you, children of the eight Nations, and by this other Belt I thank you also, in particular, my Taskarorin children.

By a Belt.

You have gathered up and covered the bones of my warriors as well as those of my children of all the Nations which have been afflicted. By this Belt I collect also the bones of all the chiefs and warriors whom you have lost, and cover them in like manner.

By a Belt.

Children. I am delighted that you are kindling a new fire to work at good business. You know I have always occupied myself thereat. By half this Belt I assure you that I shall continue to assist you to feed this new fire, and by the other half that I shall always receive whatever Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan, and your other children will advise me for your good.

By a Belt.

You could not do better than to nominate Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan and others to replace Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, and to request them and those of the Sault and all my other children, to assist you when you will have to address me on business. By this Belt I signify to you the satisfaction that affords me.

By a Belt.

By this Belt I perform the like ceremony to yours. I set up a new Sun to give you light and enable you to labor at good business. 'Twould be too long to relate exactly to you what your ancients were accustomed to say on this subject; sufficient for me that you have retained some of that word.

By a Belt.

I have received the medicine you have given me, though you have experienced more than once that I have no need of it and that my heart is sound. By this Belt I administer a medicine to you to cleanse your breast of whatever badness it may now contain, and that your words may be true and not false as they have hitherto been.

By some Belts and Strings.

Children. You have been very tardy in renewing the tobacco pouch of which your ancients made use. By this Belt I exhort you not to abandon it and to make use of it to work at good business. I attach to it some strings of Wampum, in order that it may be always full of tobacco.

By a Belt.

I wish to believe that you have swept all filth from your cabins, and hope that there will be no more of it. By this Belt I assure you that this chamber is and always will be clean, and that I shall never cease to speak honestly to you.

By some Strings.

You cannot afford me greater pleasure than by renewing ancient Councils.

You have done well to reopen the pit your ancients had made in my late Father's time and to hurl all bad business into it. By these strings I cast into that pit whatever of bad has occurred, in order not to think any more about it.

By a Belt.

You do very well to renew the roots of the Tree of Peace; 'twas under it your ancients retired and I exhort you to do so likewise whenever something occurs to you.

I doubt not but the Delawares have already requested you to incorporate them among your number. They have already had a talk at Fort Duquêne and Niagara. I am advised of their good dispositions and have recently learned that they were coming with the Iroquois on an embassy to Niagara.

By a Belt.

The leaves of the Tree of Peace could not but be dry; you had neglected it too much; 'twas time you clothed it with other foliage. By this Belt I recommend you to take greater care of it in order that you and your brethren may always speak with me, under its shade, of good affairs.

By three Strings.

I see, with pleasure, that you have preserved the three strings of Wampum my late Father gave you; receive those I present you to reunite all my children before the same dish, into which I throw a beaver's tail and a small plug of tobacco for each of you, in order that you may have only one heart and one mind with your brethren, my other children, who are your allies, and that you may work always with them and like them, at good business.

By a Belt.

Children. You have brought me back a Belt which was given you by my late Father.

By half this Belt he told you to go and wage war against the Flatheads and Chicachas, because you could not remain at peace, and they were not then at war.

By the other half of this Belt he fixed roots to the Tree of Peace and you agreed with him that the Nations would unite together to punish whoever would touch those roots.

I might have a great deal to say to you on all that you have done since that time, but I forget it. We reopened the pit your ancients had dug, and have thrown everything into it, so as to think no more about them.

You may be aware that the Flatheads have sent a request to me by the Chaouannons and Hurons, to consent to their alliance with me and all my children. No sooner did they learn that I was willing to receive them than, following the example of my faithful children, they have, of their own accord, struck the English and killed many of them. By that brave act they become from enemies, brethren of all my children, and oblige themselves to aid each other mutually; this induces me to invite you to live with them as true brethren, provided they always act with the same zeal.

As for the Chicachas, they are our enemies; I am not opposed to your waging war against them.

By a Belt.

Children. You could not but be aware that the English were threatening me, inasmuch as you have been witnesses of their preparations to surprise, in time of peace, Forts Duquène, Niagara, Catarakouy and La Pointe, and as many among you had facilitated and even aided the transportation of their provisions and munitions of war.

Had any impression been made on you by the conduct of the English, so contrary to the union I wished to maintain with them, at least you would have come to notify me thereof; but you have observed silence, which would, with reason, make you suspected by me and all my children.

Are you aware that I prepared to defend myself only at the moment the English fancied they would certainly accomplish their ambitious designs?

The territory on which the English were making all their movements, belongs to the King, my master; I loved it, because there you have your abode; therefore, I have constantly held on to my end of the Belt of peace, and exhorted you to imitate me; I will readily believe that you, and to speak more correctly, many among you have done so, in order not to recall to my mind bad affairs.

You congratulate me on the tranquillity I enjoy on my mat; by this Belt I thank you, and assure you that I will always hold on to my end of the Belt of peace, but with more reliance and firmness in your sentiments than in times past.

By a Belt.

Children. I am quite sensible of the joy you feel at seeing me; mine is no less great.

I am highly flattered by your remembrance of my late Father, since you no longer have your ancients among you, you have forgotten the kindness and friendship he felt towards you;

therefore, have you not been at peace. By this Belt I assure you that I will follow in his trail, and, like him, will labor at good business and to make you happy.

I am disposed to believe that there are among you some who are well pleased that Chouaguen is no more, but I know there are others who are in secret sorry for it. I have already told you that communication between us would always be open. I repeat to you that it is for you to see to it and to prevent the forming any establishment at the upper or lower end of the Chouaguen river or even elsewhere, within reach of your villages.

By some Strings.

Catarakoui has been from all time an entrepôt for good business. You know that the Commandant of that post has been ever ready to receive you, yet have you beheld the English marching to take it, and, far from preserving it, you did not make your appearance there, except to report to the English its situation and what was doing there; some among you, whom I am acquainted with, have even embarked to pilot their vessels. I tell you this without any anger. By these two Strings of Wampum you will find what you require at Catarakoui, and by the other two, that the same will be the case at Niagara.

Children. I admit that your ancients formerly made the portage of Niagara,<sup>1</sup> by order of my Father. But you ought to recollect that that portage has often occasioned much derangement in consequence both of drunkenness and theft; that even the English came to trade there, accompanied by Mohawks. These are the sole reasons which led my predecessors to cause that portage to be made by teams, which has not prevented the employment of such of your people as were willing to make it. I have always feared that that portage would cause some quarrel between my warriors and you. Children, I shall be delighted if it be a benefit to you, and such is my intention provided that you will have some chiefs there to restrain your young men and to prevent any disorder or robbery.

Children. These are my answers to your speech. You perceive that I entertain towards you the sentiments of a father who is full of kindness. I recommend you to labor always, like me, at good business. You should not doubt but Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan, Joncaire, Lachauvignerie and your other relatives, will unite with me when your interests are in question. I shall employ them whenever 'twill be necessary to communicate my intentions to you. I reckon on your receiving them as you would receive me, and that at all times the path will be open to them.

Your brethren of the Sault will not fail to communicate to their people everything you have said to me. I am well assured they will also carry back to them the answers I have just given you, and all that I am about to say to you.

Children. You afford me pleasure by repeating the messages you have received from me at different times. I had confided them to too trusty hands to admit of their punctual delivery to you being endangered. To the bearers of them I repeat my gratitude for their exactitude.

You must have remarked in those messages that past occurrences have not been capable of lessening my tenderness towards you. I am glad you have profited by the good advice I have given you for your sole good. I shall never give you any other, and you can hope to be happy only in as far as you will put them in practice.

By a Belt.

Children of the Oneidas. I am much flattered by the joy you feel at seeing me.

I will follow in the trail of my Father and, like him, will always work at good business.

I am particularly pleased with you, Oneidas; you have recently furnished me proofs of the correctness of your sentiments, and I cannot sufficiently testify to you the satisfaction they afford me.

I forget all that has occurred since the death of Tharia. I hope that whosoever will replace him will do as well as he.

You must have recognized in me the same goodness as in my late Father, since by his example I have received, in time of war, four Mohawks, who reported they had come to work at good business. Through the kindness natural to me, I looked on them as my children, although I saw clearly that they were talking to me only with the tips of their lips and not from their hearts. They remained here as long as they pleased; when they departed I clothed them and gave them whatever they asked.

Could I afford you a stronger proof of my following in the trail of my late Father? By this Belt I assure you that I shall never stray from it.

By some Strings.

I entertain towards the Taskarorins the same sentiments and the same kindness as for you, my children of the Oneidas. I always knew them to be at a distance from bad business; they have done well to unite with you. By these three Strings of Wampum I assure them I shall never cease to love them and to treat them as my true friends.

By a Belt.

Children. You ought to be satisfied with my answers to your speech and to have recognized in it the same kindness that my late Father entertained for you. Nothing can change my sentiments towards you, therefore do I feel assured that my answers will have penetrated, and renewed in, your hearts, the attachment of your ancestors for my late Father.

Here is a word I give you to tell you naturally all I think.

Listen, then, Children, the Eight Nations, and let my word be indelible in your memory and in that of your children. I invite your brethren here present, my other children, to give it also their attention.

The only question now is to work at good business; to adopt this day good measures among us, so that everything bad that has occurred be eternally buried in the pit.

As a good father I must speak to you of your backsliding. You know that I have followed your trail and that I have been present at all your actions. I check myself; I should say too much on that subject. Those who are capable ought here to acknowledge their fault and seriously reflect. It is for their own interest to observe better behavior in future.

Let those who have strayed from their attachment to the French, recollect the tricks to which the English have had recourse to estrange you from me; were it not for those intrigues I readily believe, Children, that you would have come to hear my word.

Children. Consider, on the one hand, the promises of the English to induce you to steep your hands in French blood; their lies, to persuade you that they would become master of Ports Duquène, Niagara, Catarakoui and the Point.

Children. Consider, also, on the other hand, my kindness in exhorting you to remain quiet on your mats, lest my blows should fall on you as on the English, and for fear of seeing your blood spilt. How many English have been humbled last year at the Beautiful river by the massacre of General Braddock's army and of that at Chouaguen, which place I reduced to ashes. Add to that, the immediate advantages of the warriors of the King, my master, and of my children of every Nation.

Children. Let you, yourselves, now decide whether the English or the French be the more reliable and on which ought you to rely.

The English have built several forts in the most of your villages; you ought not to forget that to shut you up and to prevent all communication with your Father, they began by building a little beaver trap at Chouaguen.

Depend upon it, the English have no other object than to surround you and keep you in irons.

As you wish to occupy yourself with good business only, you ought not to nourish a serpent in your bosom. I would easily destroy those forts, but 'tis for you, children, to determine on the part you have to adopt to be rid of the English. The Master of Life has been kindly pleased to make use of me to remove the bandage from your eyes. I hope he will give you light.

You must have observed nothing but deceit and treachery in the conduct of the English.

What have they not done to the Delawares, your nephews? Have you not been, yourselves, to Niagara, saying that they inhumanly surprised and destroyed a Delaware village? Have they treated yourselves any better? Did you not inform me that they lately put one of your brethren to death and were detaining another in prison?

Do not these instances convince you that the English are your enemies? you ought to have perceived it long ago.

Wherefore have they as heretofore, scattered messages and belts by your warriors among all the Nations, my children, to induce them to side neither with the English nor French, if not in order to estrange these Nations from your interests and that the English should see themselves in a position to look on you as their slaves.

Wherefore did you, yourselves, send around secretly and <sup>1</sup>a message and a tomahawk among all the Nations, if not to swell your party? did you then desire to work at good business?

My children are too strongly attached to me to retain these messages, which they have sovereignly despised, and, in brief, sent down to me.

I content myself with furnishing you a single proof of this, by exhibiting to you the Belts you have carried throughout all the Nations with the little sticks you yourselves attached thereto, for the purpose of debauching those of Detroit.

My domiciliated children and those of the different tribes are incorruptible; they proved themselves such at the Beautiful river, at Chouaguen and in my other expeditions where they signalized themselves. They wait not my call; they fly to my assistance, and were it not through fear of the small-pox, would have guarded all the rivers by which the English pass, thoroughly resolved to give no quarter to any found among them. They will be all here at the breaking up of the ice; they wish to serve as a rampart to their Father.

I shall always remember that the Senecas have, of their own good will, taken up my hatchet at the Beautiful river and killed a great many of the English; they also fought successfully on Lake St. Sacrament, and many of them are still at Carillon. In fine, recently, at Niagara, they have agreed with the Delawares to go together to fight the English. This is the most convincing proof children can give their father of their attachment, since they strike his enemies; let those who love me follow the example of the Senecas; I shall then ever acknowledge them my true children.

Children. I'm certain the majority of you speak sincerely to me, but it may be that among you there are some who have come here only with a design to see and to listen in order to report the matter immediately to your brethren, the English; but I fear nothing, as I'm honest.

You do not see me puffed up by the advantages I possess over the English; I thank the Master of Life for them; he is aware of the justice of our cause and protects it.

I recommend you not to be afraid of the English, however they may threaten you; remain on your mats; I shall maintain you thereon, and all my children of the Nations will if necessary unite with you, to assist you in ridding yourselves of the English.

All my Praying children are enjoying peace; you may possess the same repose. The Master of Life has created you like us; many among you, perhaps, would make good Christians, like a number of your ancestors who, in my Father's time, embraced the true religion; they had a Missionary who wrote in most flattering terms of those ancients. I remember, also, having seen some of them. It will depend on your good conduct only for me to send you some missionaries to instruct you; you cannot expect so great an advantage from your brethren, the English.

You have, on the contrary, experienced that they have never made any effort, save to render you as unfortunate as themselves.

Children. I wish to afford you a more complete proof of my goodness.

The ill conduct of your brethren, the Mohawks, affects me; they are of the same blood as you, and I always regard them as my children; they have dwindled down to a small number, and 'tis certain that there will not, in a short time, be a solitary one of them remaining on the face of the earth, if they continue with the English. Go, tell them that we have buried, in the pit, all the bad business, so as not to talk of it any more; assure them that I am a good father; that I have arms open to receive them on the lands they will be willing to occupy, and that if they will return to me in good faith, and coöperate with me in the good work, they shall experience my kindness. I exhort you, even to oblige them, absolutely to abandon the English; you are not ignorant that they have already debauched your young men; this might happen again, and from children you would become your Father's enemies.

Children. I give you this Belt to confirm all I have just said to you; open, then, your eyes; defer no longer to follow the good advice of a Father who loves you tenderly. My father had your interests ever at heart; 'tis his son who addresses you. I have traversed the ocean to come to the aid of my children who have gone astray, and to gather them under my wings.

I give you warning, that should we ever quarrel, 'twill not be I who shall commence. But at the same time, be careful that your young people do not commit any bad acts. 'Twill be a pity to see our blood shed on both sides.

Children. By this same Belt I wish to provide against all the difficulties that might arise between us. For that purpose you must promise me, sincerely, to inform me, exactly, of the movements of the English, either in your neighborhood or elsewhere, as soon as you will learn them. 'Tis your interest as well as mine.

I notify you, also, that I will hit the English wherever they be, and I require of you, that in case my warriors and Indian children are obliged to pass through your villages, that you aid them every way in your power, to accomplish my intentions.

And said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, hath signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And, at the same instant, the Iroquois of the Sault St. Louis and of the Lake of the Two Mountains, the Nepissingues and Algonkins of said Lake of the Two Mountains, the Outaouacs of Detroit, and the Pouteouatamis of Michillimakinac have spoken to the said Deputies of the Eight Nations, as the same has been explained by the Interpreters named above, and in like manner by the said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter to the said Deputies of the Eight Nations, as follows :

By a Belt.

Brethren. We are much rejoiced to see you working at good affairs. You have done well to recollect our Father, the late Mr. de Vaudreuil's words to your ancients. Remember how wise he was ; it depends on yourselves alone to revive his words by listening to the address of our Father who is Mr. de Vaudreuil's son. No nation will forget the love he bore his children. Brethren, you perceive he is not less benevolent than his Father ; therefore, follow his advice. We say this to you for your own advantage.

We are ever ready to sacrifice ourselves in our Father's defence ; we constitute only the smallest portion of his children ; he has a great many more whom you know in the Upper countries, whose numbers increase daily by a vast many Nations whom you do not know.

You have observed with what kindness our Father has spoken to us ; engrave, then, his last speech in your memory and in your hearts ; imitate us ; labor at good business.

Lose no time in withdrawing the Mohawks from the English ; let them remember the bloody battle fought last year on Lake Saint Sacrament ; the manner in which they and we were treated, ought to induce you to make every effort to induce them to abandon the English. Warn them that if they persist in their obstinacy, they will no longer be able to be restored to favor, because not a single one of them will escape us. You are right in thinking that blood will be spilled next spring. Let them take care not to be in our path. We, Iroquois and all our Father's children, will be united together and serve him as ramparts.

The Nepissings and Algonkins.

By a Belt.

Brethren. There are no orators in our village ; nevertheless, I address you in the name of the Nepissings and Algonkins.

We are the first who have inhabited this land ; we saw a White—he was a Frenchman ; we ran to him ; he caressed us, and we have adopted him as a Father. You, the Five Nations, came afterwards ; the French welcomed you also, and you declared yourselves their children.

As your seniors, we are obliged to exhort you to follow the advice and will of our Father ; do not depart from it, for we shall hit all those who will not follow his good counsels.

His other children will be of the same sentiments as we, and we will perish before the least evil overtake him.

Brethren. Believe what we say ; take pity on your wives and children if you can feel none for yourselves ; on the least word from our Father, we shall sacrifice our lives.

This Brethren chanted the war song and said : Father, I hate the English ; I wish to strike them.

Brethren. I have another word to say to you from my nephews, the Outaouacs here present ; they are young ; they have engaged me to address you.

Take care that none of your people be in the neighborhood of the Point, and do not think of ever going to scout in any direction for the English. You might meet us, and we should kill each other.

The Outaouacs and Poutéouatamis.

Have each by a Belt expressed the same words as the Iroquois and the Nepissings ; they, too, have chanted the war song, saying : Father, we are famished ; give us fresh meat ; we wish to eat the English ; dispatch us quickly.

And said Sieurs Lacorne St. Luc, Lecavelier, St. Jean and Perthuis, Interpreters, have signed with us.

Done on the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And at the same moment the Deputies of the Eight Nations already have answered the speech of the Iroquois, Nepissings, Algonkins, Outaouacs and Poutéouatamis, as explained by said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, and also by Sieur de Saint Luc, Lecavelier and Saint Jean, Interpreters to the Iroquois, Nepissings, Algonkins, Outaouacs and Poutéouatamis, as follows :

By a Belt for each Nation.

Brethren. You have been witnesses of our address to our Father ; you have been also present when we answered the speech he delivered by his last Belt ; you consequently know our sentiments.

By the Belts we present you, we assure you that our sentiments will ever be the same, and that we appreciate truly the good advice you give us.

You Outaouacs, you say that you are young, yet you look far ahead ; we thank you for your advice ; we shall attend to it, but remember what you recommend to us, and conform thereunto yourselves.

And the said Sieurs Perthuis, de La Corne St Luc, Lecavelier and Saint Jean, Interpreters, have signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And on the three and twentieth of the said month of December, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, at three o'clock in the forenoon, We, the Governor-General aforesaid, accompanied as already stated ; the Deputies of the before named Eight Nations, assisted by the said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, being in the said Council Chamber, Koués, an Oneida chief, arose and, according to the explanation of Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, said to us :

Father. We have listened attentively to your answers to our address ; we are very grateful for it and thank you.

We are also much obliged for the talk you have made us by your last Belt; we have not lost a single word of it; we are ready to repeat to you all that you said to us; 'tis the very truth, and we have nothing to reply thereto. We assure you that we will always conform ourselves to your good advice and counsels.

We shall not permit the English to forestall the territory we inhabit; we shall not afford him any assistance and will always hold ourselves ready to defend ourselves against him. 'Twill not be very hard for us to stop him because he does not know how to travel in the woods.

We shall not lose any time in communicating to the Mohawk that you are willing to pardon him. We shall show him your Belt and will add a word from ourselves to it in order to give him sense and to invite him to withdraw from the English. We shall even do our best to oblige him to work at good business.

Father. We conclude by telling you that we grow young on experiencing, at your hands, the same kindness and the same heart as your late Father, Mr. de Vaudreuil, evinced towards us. We shall occupy ourselves henceforth only with good business and shall never depart from your will.

And said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, hath signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And at the same moment Kouée, an Oneida chief, rose up and, according to the explanation of Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, said to us:

By a Belt.

Father. We have listened attentively to your answer to our address; all that you have said by your last Belt has made great impression on us; we have no reply to offer to the reproaches you have made us; every word you said to us is true; our heart is penetrated and we thank you therefor. By this Belt we assure you that we shall never have any will but yours, and that we will always work at good business.

In delivering up the two English medals:

Father. We cannot retain two medals which we have formerly had the folly to accept from our brethren, the English, as a mark of distinction.

We acknowledge that these medals have been the true cause of our error and that they have plunged us into bad business.

We strip ourselves of them; we cast them from us, in order not to think any more of the English.

By a Belt.

Father. We inform you of a message given us by a Nation which is neither French nor English, nor Indian, and inhabits the lands round about us. Some of those people were at Chouaguen when it was razed by your warriors.

We tell you by this Belt that that Nation has informed us that it would no longer support the continual vexations of the English, who not only ravage their lands and destroy their animals, but also incessantly maltreat themselves.

That Nation has proposed to annex us to itself in order to afford each other mutual help and defence against the English. We have not given our answer.

As we have not any other will than yours, we request you, Father, to tell us what you think is proper for us to do.

And the said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, hath signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And on the twenty-fourth of the said month of December, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, at eight o'clock in the forenoon, We, the Governor General aforesaid, accompanied as already stated; the Deputies of the Eight beforenamed Nations, assisted by Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, being in the said Council Chamber, have caused said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, to explain to the Oneidas our answer to their speech as follows:

By a Belt.

Children. I am delighted that my answer to your address, and what I have said by my last Belt have made an impression on you. I have spoken to you as a good father, and told you nothing but what was true.

My domiciliated children, and those of the Upper countries, must have fortified you in your good sentiments by their talk. I wish you to imitate them, and let your Brethren, the Mohawks, profit by the pardon I have granted them.

By this Belt I repeat to you, that so long as you will work, in earnest, at good business, I shall take care of you and render you happy.

Children. I perceive, with pleasure, that you admit, yourselves, that the English have plunged you into all sorts of bad business that the torrent has brought along.

You strip yourselves of the medal; you could not retain it and work at good business.

I doubt not but those among you who may possess marks of distinction from the English will follow your example and cast them away. I shall thereby know that they are really willing to work at good affairs.

I am greatly disposed to reward those of my children of the Eight Nations who will signalize their zeal for good business.

By a Belt.

Children. You have afforded me pleasure in communicating to me the message sent you by a Nation which is neither French, nor English, nor Indians, whose settlements are round about you. I think I know that Nation. There is reason to believe that they are Palatines, a branch of a Nation belonging to the other side of the Great Lake, at present in alliance with the great Onontio.

I am not surprised that they could not accustom themselves to the harsh government of the English, and that they are grievously ill treated by it.

I have no doubt even that there are many malcontents in New England who would desire a favorable occasion of coming over to the French.

The proposal which that Nation made you, to unite with, and to afford, you mutual aid to defend you against the English, ought to teach you that 'tis time for you to declare against them and drive him from the territory inhabited by you and that Nation.

If the message of that Nation be sincere, I consent that you sustain it, and as soon as it will join you, Children, I shall protect it the same as you, and guard it against all insults; if it will retire close to me, I shall receive it and furnish it with lands.

But notify that Nation that in case it has given you this message with a view only to guarantee its settlements and itself against the incursions of my warriors and children, its trick will avail it nothing; for whensoever I shall think proper, I will dispatch my warriors to Corlac and wherever else any English will be found.

And said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, has signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And on the twenty-ninth of the said month of December, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, at eight o'clock in the forenoon, We, the Governor-General aforesaid, accompanied as already stated; the said Deputies of the beforenamed Eight Nations, assisted by said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, being in the said Council Chamber, Chinoniata, chief of the Onondagas, rose up and, according to the explanation of said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, said to us:

By a Belt.

Father. We have agreed not to keep anything secret. We yet have this word to speak to you.

We wish not to have any other will than yours, nor to form but one mind and one heart with you.

You have leveled the path from our villages to you; we do not wish it to present the least obstruction, and in order that the road which our children, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan, etc., have been accustomed to travel, may be always open, we have resolved to burn the forts the English have erected in our villages, should they be not thrown down before our arrival.

We shall repeat to you that we will not permit the English to come among us, and that we will always be faithful to our Father, Mr. de Vaudreuil.

Father. Catarakouy will be the place to which we shall repair to communicate to you whatever bad news we shall learn.

We are well disposed to assist, by all means in our power, your warriors and children of the Nations, whenever they will pass through the country we inhabit on their way to strike the English.

By some Strings of Wampum.

Father. We pray you by these Strings of Wampum to be so good as to give us our son, Mr. de Noyan, as Commander of Fort Frontenac. He loves us; we, therefore, prefer applying to him rather than to any other, to supply our wants. We shall also be glad to address him whenever we shall have anything of interest to communicate to you.

And said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, hath signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And We, the Governor-General aforesaid, accompanied as before stated, immediately caused Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, to explain to the Deputies of the Eight beforenamed Nations our answer to their address this day, as follows:

By a Belt.

Children. I am delighted that you observe the promise you have given me, not to keep anything secret; and assure me that you would have no other will than mine, and form but one mind and one heart with me.

Your resolution to burn the posts erected by the English in your villages affords me pleasure. I recommend you to put it in execution as soon as you reach home, should these forts not be razed by the English. You admit, yourselves, that they would be an obstruction in the path our children, Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Longueuil, Noyan, etc., have been in the habit of traveling to reach your villages.

Children. Adhere to your present resolution never to permit the English to come among you, and be always faithful to me.

You will do very well to go, according to the custom of your ancients, to Catarakoui to communicate to me whatever bad news you learn. Never forget your promise to me to aid in every way possible my warriors and my children of the Nations, whenever they will pass through the country you inhabit on their way to strike the English. 'Tis for your own interest.

By some Strings of Wampum.

The confidence you place in your child, Mr. de Noyan, affords me pleasure; he loves you, and you could not have a better friend near me. By these Belts of Wampum, I assure you that the officer whom I shall send to command at Fort Frontenac, will be known and loved by you; he will watch over your interests, and the friendship you will feel for him will induce you even to inform him exactly of every matter of interest which may come to your ears.

And said Sieur Perthuis hath signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And on the thirtieth of the said month of December, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, at three o'clock in the afternoon, We, the Governor-General aforesaid, accompanied as before stated; the said Deputies of the Eight beforenamed Nations, assisted by said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, being in the said Council Chamber, Koé, an Oneida chief, arose, and, according to the explanation of said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, said to us:

Father. 'Twas I, who am nobody, that you employed to convey your message to the Five Nations, to whom I have made three journeys to gain over to you your children, particularly the Oneidas. God, who rules all things, has accorded you complete success. To effect that, required nothing less than you, Father, who are generally known and beloved by all the Nations, out of respect for that great man, M<sup>r</sup> de Vaudreuil, your Father, who came to this country to rescue the Five Nations from their error.

Father. You see the Five Nations disposed to do whatever you please. I speak not for myself; the Nations approve with all their hearts what I say to you on their behalf.

Father. Courage; comfort the children who wish not to be separated from you, and to form but one with you so long as they live; they are in hopes of eventually professing the same religion.

By a Belt.

Father: Devourer of villages. We have learned that you leave to-morrow for Quebec. We wish you a safe and prosperous voyage.

Six Oneidas of us are here, who wish to tell you our sentiments.

We are penetrated by the goodness with which you have received us; your words make all the impression you can desire; we shall never depart from them.

All our brethren who, like us, have heard your words, cease not to say that you have told truth; have asserted nothing which cannot be proved. None of the Five Nations could make any reply to it, and all of one common accord say, that there is nothing better for them to do than to labor, like us, at good business. Such, Father, are the promises which we have jointly made.

Father. The Oneidas speak to you, and by this Belt assure you that they seriously and inviolably adhere to their Father, Mr. de Vaudreuil, and renounce the English from this day forward.

We do not utter vain words; we beg you to accept the proof we offer of our sincerity. For this purpose, we leave seventeen of our people to pass the winter with you; six of these are warriors, and will do their utmost whenever the opportunity occurs, to show you what they can do, and hope that the conduct which they will observe will render them distinguished among the number of your most attached children.

And said Sieur Perthuis, the Interpreter, has signed with us.

Done the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

And thereupon We, the Governor-General aforesaid, accompanied as above mentioned, have caused said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, to explain to the Deputies of the beforenamed Eight Nations our answer to their speech this day, as follows:

Son. I repeat the satisfaction I entertain for your zeal and the proofs you have afforded me of your attachment. I thank the Master of Life for having been pleased to crown with success my efforts to bring closer to me my children of the Five Nations, who, up to this time, have been intractable. This success affords me the more joy, inasmuch as I am fully persuaded that the recollection they possess of my late Father's kindnesses, has not a little contributed to that event. I am confident the Five Nations sincerely desire to do my will, and that they will perform their promises.

I shall ever love my children, the Five Nations; let them take courage themselves; let them be inseparable from me, and, by their good conduct, render themselves worthy the happiness enjoyed by my Praying children. I shall spare no pains to procure for them the like advantage.

By a Belt.

Children. It affords me much pleasure to see you before I leave for Quebec. I am much obliged for the wishes you make for my safe voyage.

I am delighted to hear your last sentiments; my words could not fail to make an impression on your minds. Be firm in your resolution to conform yourselves thereto. I am pleased to see that the Five Nations have no reply to make to my words; I shall always speak the truth, and whilst the Five Nations will work, like you, at good business, they will be happy.

I am well assured of your sentiments; you are, from this very moment, among the number of my most faithful children. By this Belt I exhort you to persevere and to totally forget the English.

You leave seventeen of your people here; I shall take care of them and profit by the good disposition of your warriors. I know them to be brave, and am well assured that they will distinguish themselves on the first opportunity.

And the said Sieur Perthuis, Interpreter, hath signed with us.

Done on the day and year aforesaid. Thus signed in the original.

We, Pierre Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil, Commander of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King throughout all New France, the territories and countries of Louisiana,

Do certify that this present copy agrees with the original remaining in our Secretary's office.

In testimony whereof have We signed these presents, caused the seal of our arms to be affixed thereunto and our Secretary to countersign the same.

Done at Montreal, the fifteenth of February, One thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight.

Abstract of Despatches received from Canada.

Besides the letters M. de Vaudreuil, the Governor-General, has written respecting the Choueguen expedition, he has sent, by the same opportunity, an account of what transpired on the other frontiers of the Colony, since reporting particulars in the beginning of June.

Nothing very interesting occurred in the direction of Fort Duquesne. Sieur Dumas, who is in command there, has contrived to send out detachments of soldiers, Canadians and Indians to the frontiers of the English Colonies, both to harass them and to obtain information of any movements against him. All these detachments have been successful, notwithstanding they found the English frontiers pretty bare. According to their reports, the English do not appear disposed to make any attempt this year against Fort Duquesne. Their preparations had no other object than to protect their frontiers and their farm work. Several months even had passed at the close of June, without a wagon or bateau having arrived at Fort Cumberland, whose garrison had been greatly diminished by sickness, and was complaining that it had not been paid; and Sieur Dumas had remarked to M. de Vaudreuil that the place would probably be abandoned. That officer, however, kept always on his guard, and was preparing to proceed against the enemy on the supposition that the latter might march against him; Sieur de Vaudreuil observes that Sieur Dumas will, in that case, be in a condition to offer an effectual resistance, the more especially as, in consequence of the destruction of Chouaguen, a detachment of Indians can be sent towards the Beautiful river who, otherwise must have been reserved for the defence of Forts Frontenac and Niagara.

M. de Vaudreuil was equally easy as regards the River St. John. Sieur Boishébert, commanding at that quarter, continued to maintain himself, and even to send out detachments to harass the English towards Acadia; he was well seconded by the Indians of those parts.

Despite the precautions unceasingly taken by the English to prevent the ancient French inhabitants of Acadia retiring to French territory, some families always escaped whom Sieur Boishébert sent to the most convenient places, agreeably to the orders he had received from the Marquis de Vaudreuil. His Majesty has been informed that the English government had, at the commencement of last winter, caused a somewhat considerable number of those ancient families to be seized, in order to be expatriated and distributed throughout the interior of Carolina. That cruel treatment has been very badly received even in that Colony, where the people have been much affected by the desolation of those wretched families, and have sent back several of them who have returned to the River St. John. Facilities have likewise been afforded for the embarkation of some others for the Windward Islands, whence they were to proceed to Canada. For the rest, all these migrations of the ancient French of Acadia occasion very considerable expense; but independent of motives of charity, which do not admit of their being abandoned in the poverty to which they are reduced solely in consequence of attachment to his Majesty's domination, 'tis of the greatest importance to preserve them for the purpose of strengthening the frontiers of Canada, Ile Royale, and the Island of St. John where they are settled. 'Twill be also in our power to employ them usefully, should circumstances permit anything to be undertaken against Acadia.

M. de Vaudreuil, then, was occupied since the success of the Chouaguen expedition, exclusively with the defence of Fort St. Frederic on Lake Champlain. The English seemed to be concentrating all their forces for an attack on that place. According to intelligence received in Canada, and which agrees with the news from England, Lord Loudon had, early in August, repaired to Orange to concert, with the other officers, the execution of that attack. The English had sent forward divers corps of Regulars towards Lake St. Sacrament; had caused different routes, both by land and water, to be reconnoitred; had even established various entrepôts and some forts, and everything was announcing, on their side, an early advance, with a considerable force. M. de Vaudreuil, on his side, was in a condition to direct against them the principal strength of the Colony, which embraced an army of three thousand men, including Regulars and Colonial troops, under the command of Chevalier de Levis, and Canadians and Indians, who were reinforced since the Choueguen expedition; so that there ought to be, in the fore part of September, more than six thousand men, whereof the six battalions of Regulars formed a part. Fort St. Frederic, and Fort Carillon which has been erected four leagues in advance towards Lake St. Sacrament, were both well provided. Flying camps were around the outlets of the latter lake. Messrs. de Vaudreuil and de Montcalm had agreed on all the arrangements which seemed to them the most suitable, not only to oppose a good defence to the enemy, but even for marching against them, according to circumstances. The Marquis de Montcalm left Montreal on the 4th of September to assume the command in that quarter. He has remarked, and M. de Vaudreuil has made the same observation, that if Lord Loudon did not make his appearance before the 20th of that month, he will probably be obliged to postpone his operations to the ensuing spring, which will afford time to adopt new precautions in the Colony.

The Intendant of that Colony transmits the detail of what has been found in the forts at Choueguen and on board the shipping which were taken in the course of the expedition, and observes, at the same time, that there was considerable pillage which was thrown on the shoulders of the Indians, although 'tis certain that they have had the smallest part of it.

This detail is included in the inventory of the artillery, arms and munitions of war and in that of the provisions. These two returns are annexed.

The Intendant remarks, among other proofs of pillage, that only seven hundred and thirty muskets are forthcoming, although, exclusive of the arms of the garrison, there ought to be a supply in reserve.

But it is particularly in the matter of provisions that great disorder prevailed. He was in hopes, however, that those placed in the store would be sufficient for victualling Forts Niagara and Frontenac during the winter.

He remarks that the stores of the Colony have been exhausted by that expedition and the immense consumptions attendant on the marching of the troops in the direction of Lake Champlain, and transmits estimates of merchandise of all sorts, such as cloth, linen, blankets, pots, &c., which it will be indispensable to forward in the spring to Quebec.

He requires, among other things, five hundred soldiers' tents for the Canadians and sixty tents for the Colonial officers. He had made a similar requisition last year and no attention was paid to it, because it had never been the practice to supply detachments in Canada with furniture of that description. But he represents that they are necessary in the present war; that neither the Canadians nor even the Colonial officers demand any for the ordinary forays in the forests, but when they encamp, as they have done this year, for seven months consecutively, they cannot be exposed to the rain, and that the want of tents has, in fact, occasioned considerable sickness among them.

The Intendant states, at the same time, that exclusive of the supplies to be sent from France, the expenses in the Colony will be immense, so long as it will be necessary to make as considerable armaments as those which circumstances have demanded up to the present time. He announces that the drafts to be drawn this year will amount to seven millions at least.

Therefore, it is to be expected that the payments from the Colonial chest next year, will considerably exceed the estimates in the Memoir presented on the condition of that chest; for, on the one hand, the drafts to arrive from the Colonies were estimated in it only at six millions, and on the other hand there will be an increase in the article of shipments to Canada.

The annexed return of the troops actually in Canada and of the recruits which it is resolved to send thither, shows that there are 4,520 Regulars, exclusive of the officers of the different corps composing them, and that if the reinforcements destined to make up the augmentation demanded by M. de Vaudreuil, Governor-General, arrive there without accident, these troops will amount to 6,600 men.

However considerable these forces may be relative to those maintained heretofore in that Colony, where there were up to 1750 only 800 Regulars, it would be desirable that additional reinforcements be sent thither. Nothing in fact is more important than to preserve the superiority we have derived from the success of the two last campaigns, since the issue of the present war must principally depend on it, and 'tis, at the same time, certain that the enemy are about to direct their most powerful efforts to that part of America. Public intelligence even leaves no doubt as to the views they entertain on that point.

Various considerations have prevented the proposal being submitted to his Majesty to forward more considerable reinforcements than those demanded by the Governor-General, and to proportion them to those sent by the enemy to the English Colonies on the same Continent.

It was first thought, and such appeared to be his Majesty's impression, that the greatest advantage that could be expected this year, was from a sound defensive policy; for, could the expeditions of the enemy be rendered useless, or at least prevented from being remarkably successful, it would be very difficult for him to make new efforts, and we on the contrary shall be able, in that case, to send an expedition in the spring of 1758 against Acadia, the conquest of which would secure his Majesty's possessions in that part of America.

'Tis in relation to that defensive policy that it was thought not sufficient to send troops to Canada, whilst we were uncertain of the real designs of the enemy, who could form several in order to recover the superiority, and to place himself in a condition to dictate the law to us.

It might be his intention to attack Louisbourg or Quebec; perhaps even both these places; for, 1st 'tis but natural that he should think of Louisbourg, which may be regarded as an equivalent and an exchange for Port Mahon; 2nd The port of Halifax on the coast of Acadia may serve for an entrepôt and afford great facilities for such an expedition; 3rd The train of artillery which, according to the public papers 'tis proposed to embark, can only be designed for some considerable siege, and there cannot be any such unless Louisbourg or Quebec be attacked. In fine, the season selected for the departure of the fleet renders it probable that the troops preparing in England are destined to operate in that quarter. Were they to be joined to the troops under General Loudon's orders for operations by land, they would naturally have been embarked as early as January or even December, to afford them time to recruit and to enter on the campaign as early as April; whilst if they are to be employed against Louisbourg or Quebec, they will, by sailing in March, arrive at Halifax which will probably be their rendezvous in sufficient season to act on sea in the month of May, when navigation begins to be practicable in those roadsteads. Now, in this supposition, if General Loudon is not to receive this reinforcement for the purpose of land operations, M. de Vaudreuil would have a force he has considered sufficient, relative to the enemy's situation.

Supposing that the English do, in fact, design the troops they are about to dispatch, to form a junction with those of General Loudon, and all their forces to be employed on the frontiers, as in the two last campaigns, 'tis probable that in such case they will have a new plan of operations.

In 1755 they attacked Canada at four points, on the frontiers of Acadia, Lake Champlain, Lake Ontario and the River Oyo.

In Acadia they succeeded in capturing Fort Beauséjour.

General Braddock's defeat, by bringing with it the failure of their expedition on the River Oyo, prevented the execution of their projects against Forts Niagara and Frontenac, on Lake Ontario.

And the same event likewise contributed to arrest Colonel Johnson's expedition against Fort St. Frederic on Lake Champlain, notwithstanding the check which M. Dieskaw received.

In 1756, the enemy threatened Canada in the direction of Lakes Ontario and Champlain only. The capture of their post at Choueguen incapacitated them from undertaking anything thereabout, and the force which M. de Vaudreuil was able to concentrate on Lake Champlain has arrested General Loudon, who was repairing with his army to that frontier.

The enemy will, in the next campaign, probably again direct all their efforts against that quarter. The loss of Choueguen renders it very difficult for them to attack our forts at Niagara and Frontenac, on account of the distance of their other posts. That loss also contributes considerably to the defence of our Fort Duquesne, on the River Oyo, because the forces we were obliged to divide between that river and the lakes, can in future be, for the most part, concentrated at Fort Duquesne. All these circumstances must induce the enemy to direct operations against Fort St. Frederic; the rather, as when master of Lake Champlain, in consequence of the capture of that fort, they would be at liberty to attack Montreal, and the communication of the Colony being thus intercepted, our posts on the lakes, on the River Oyo and throughout what's called the Upper countries, would fall of themselves, leaving out of consideration the risks which the lower part of the Colony likewise would run.

But on this second supposition, also, M. de Vaudreuil will be in a position to reunite, so to say, all the forces of Canada for the defence of whatever frontiers General Loudon will like to attack.

However that be, this uncertainty as to the enemy's designs, has been the first consideration that has determined the limitation of the reinforcements to be sent to Canada to those demanded by the Governor-General.

The second, is the difficulty of transportation. 'Tis not without difficulty that arrangements have been made in five different posts for the conveyance of the 2,000 men to be sent out. Had more been resolved on, especially entire regiments, it would hardly be possible to avoid fitting out some of the men-of-war, which 'twould be difficult to reconcile with the other armaments that have appeared indispensable.

The third, is the item of expense. The passage of the 2,000 men will alone cost about 600 m<sup>l</sup>. The regular augmentations for the troops of the Colony and the infantry battalions will form an item in the expenses of maintenance, i. e., in pay and garrison stores, exceeding 260,000<sup>l</sup>. Moreover, the extraordinaries of war in that country are immense. The officers and soldiers are supplied with an outfit and their subsistence in the field, without any deduction in their pay. The expenses of the Colony, which, in ordinary times, amount only to 1 million or 1,200 m<sup>l</sup> at most, have, since all these movements, exceeded 6, 7 and 8 millions. The only expenses incurred in 1756, for the six battalions of infantry, are stated to be about 1,600 m<sup>l</sup> and, in consequence of this excess of extraordinary expenses, the Colonial chest is found at the end of the year to be in debt about 14 millions, nearly 7 millions of which are in bills of exchange, payable in 1757.

And the last consideration, is the difficulty of subsistence. The last wheat harvest in Canada has not been near as abundant as had been expected. By the last ships from that country, we learn that they were not without apprehensions there as regards the subsistence of the inhabitants and troops. The Governor-General and Intendant had even been obliged to adopt precautions in the matter, and have demanded considerable quantities of flour in France, which have been ordered to be forwarded, and 'twould be necessary to increase them proportionably, had larger reinforcements than those demanded been sent forward.

'Tis on these several considerations, whilst confining ourselves to the forwarding of the increase of troops which M. de Vaudreuil demands for the purpose of opposing the attempts of the enemy on land, that attention has been directed to arrangements which have appeared adapted to insure the miscarriage of the projects that the English might attempt to execute on the sea-board against Louisbourg or Quebec. And his Majesty has ordered the execution of these arrangements, which will serve, besides, for the defence of Canada, in case the enemy should, with the view of creating a division in the forces of that Colony, make any demonstrations on the sea-board, without designing to make a false attack against Louisbourg or Quebec.

But 'tis not, however, that it were not desirable, as already observed, that Canada should possess a number of troops sufficient to secure superiority to us, even without taxing the Canadians too much, the employment of whom, in the movements of the war, inflicts serious injury on the agriculture of the country. 'Tis even certain that the more troops we shall have there, the more will we be able to rely on the Indians. But the difficulties and embarrassments have just been submitted, which have prevented anything being done beyond what has been resolved.

Should his Majesty think proper to add some new regiments thereto, the expense will increase in the ratio of the number of men composing them, and the allowance made for the officers and soldiers.

But 'twould, in all cases, be very difficult to dispatch them with the necessary provisions for the voyage and subsistence in the Colony, in sufficient season to allow them to take the ordinary course, and it would be necessary to wait for the season suitable to passing through the straits of Belle-île, by dispatching them only in the month of May.

No. 40 to 60 days
will be required.

Duke de Belleisle to M. de Moras.

I have two correspondents in England, one of whom is most thoroughly informed. Both of them confirm the resolution adopted by the new Ministry to put forth their main efforts in America. Mr. Pitt wishes, at any price, to regain the superiority there and to gratify the English faction interested in the American trade, which is to-day the most powerful, both in the city of London and the House of Commons. Consequently, there is to be dispatched thither, exclusive of the two regiments of Scotch Highlanders, each 1,800 men strong, nine regiments of infantry, the list whereof has been sent me, viz: Five from the Irish establishment, not counting the three regiments which sailed two months ago for New England. All these will form a body of more than 8 @ 10,000 Regulars. A large park of artillery is also sent forward at the same time, and every description of arms and munitions of war. Mr. Pitt has declared that if this considerable reinforcement be not sufficient, he will double and triple it.

Under these circumstances, I think that, as America is the principal and true cause of the war, our attention ought to be directed to that quarter of the globe. It is the good or bad condition wherein we shall happen to be, that will sooner or later determine the English Minister to make peace, and to render it either ruinous or of advantage to us. We shall never conclude a solid one if we cannot have Acadia.

I am, for several months, insisting that we should forward to America, independent of the necessary recruits to complete our Colonial troops and French regiments, Sieur Fischer's corps of 4,000 men, which is so composed as to form six large battalions, or to be divided into brigades or even companies. It has a distinguished set of officers, almost all gentlemen, the majority of whom, as well as their soldiers, propose never to return to Europe; they would greatly strengthen now and hereafter, those parts of these Colonies for which those troops will be designed.

The Keeper of the Seals<sup>1</sup> has informed me that M. de Vaudreuil demanded of him only 15 or 1,800 recruits; with these, he considered America sufficiently protected; but I answer that M. de Vaudreuil cannot have any knowledge of Mr. Pitt's project nor of the resolution to send thither such a large body of Regulars, a thing England has never done before. I think I cannot insist too strongly hereupon, so that we may not lose the opportunity of dispatching the 4,000 men to America. If it be neglected, 'twill be repented of perhaps too late, when a remedy no longer exists. I admit that the expense of transportation is excessively high, but I think 'twould be much better to have some vessels of the line less, and to secure ourselves in the preservation of our Colonies; and as we are approaching the time when those transports sail, and those troops have a great many days' march to make before they reach their places of embarkation, I represent to M. de Moras<sup>1</sup> that not a moment is to be lost in coming to a conclusion. That object has appeared to me so important for the King's service and so decisive for the good and success of the new administration confided to him, that I have considered it my duty to submit this Memoir to him, requesting him to be pleased to pay that attention to it which the matter in question merits.

M. Coquart to the Minister.

My Lord,

I take the liberty to send you copy of a Relation I have received from my brother, who has been eighteen years a Jesuit Missionary in Canada; although I am aware that your Grace is acquainted with everything that transpires there, I expect it will amuse you.

My Lord the Prince de Croy<sup>3</sup> is to see you in regard to Mr. Skelding, an Englishman, who has been taken on board a Dutchman of Rotterdam called La Luert, Captain William Ramsay, who is desirous of going, under my security, for a month to Holland, where he has business

<sup>1</sup> M. de Moras succeeded M. de Machault as Minister of the Colonies and Marine, 1st February, 1757. He had already been Comptroller-General and was quite inadequate to the duties of either office. Lacretelle.

<sup>2</sup> CHARLES LOUIS AUGUSTE FOUQUET, Marshal Duke de Belle-isle, was born at Villafranca, 22d September, 1684. He was appointed Colonel of Dragoons very early; was wounded at the siege of Lille, in 1708, when he was promoted to be Brigadier. In 1719, he served as Major-General in Spain, and after his return to France, was disgraced and sent to the Bastille, which he left, only to be exiled to his country seat. In 1732, he became Lieutenant-General, and distinguished himself in the campaign of 1734. At the peace of 1736, he was appointed Governor of Metz, and, at the breaking out of the war of 1741, had arrived at the grade of Marshal, and was sent to command in Germany, and after the fall of Prague, went Ambassador Extraordinary to Frankfort, where Charles VII. was elected Emperor. He next served in Bohemia, and afterwards executed the successful retreat from Prague, which is recorded as equivalent to a victory. Subsequently, he was arrested at a Hanoverian port and sent prisoner to England, where he was detained a year. He was created a Duke in 1748, admitted to the Academy in 1756, and in March, 1758, appointed Minister of War. Many useful reforms were introduced during his administration. Worn out by labor and age, he died 26th January, 1761, in his 77th year. As a General, Minister and father, his memory has secured glory, esteem and respect, though, like all great men, he has his calumniators. Biographie Universelle. Lacretelle calls him the most obstinate partisan of this war, which was so fatal to France. — Ed.

<sup>3</sup> EMMANUEL, Prince de Croy Sobre, was born on the 23d June, 1718, and was created Marshal of France 13th June, 1782. The restoration of the port of Dunkirk is due to his energy. He died in 1787. He published: I. Memoire sur le passage par le Nord, qui contient aussi des réflexions sur les glaces. Paris, 1782, 4to.; II. Maisons des Pays-Bas. Paris, 1765, 4to. Biographie Universelle.

of the utmost importance. I hope your Grace will be pleased to grant him permission, and to fix the amount of security for him.

I have the honor to be with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient Servant,

Mayor and Lieut-Gen. of Police.

My Dear Brother,

I communicated to you last fall the news from this country much abridged. I could have enlarged more on the victory we gained on the Ohio over General Bradok's army, but suffice it for you to know, that with his life he has lost more than 1,800 men and an immense booty with scarcely any loss on our side, except the Commander of our detachment, named M. de Beaujeu, an officer generally regretted.

General Jonckson's army on Lake St. Sacrament, which is called by our enemies Georges as well as the fort they have built near that we call Carillon, and which serves to defend Fort St. Frederic, otherwise called La Pointe à la Chevelure, amounting last fall to 4,500, is now reduced to 3,000 by desertion and the shock it received in the affair in which Baron de Dieskaw was wounded and taken prisoner. We lost on that occasion a brave officer, M. de St. Pierre, and had his advice as well as that of several other Canadian officers been followed, Jonckson was irretrievably destroyed, and we should have been spared the trouble we have had this year. If you were in a place where letters might reach you without risk and expense, I should send you my news in detail. Content yourself with what I am about to communicate of the occurrences since last fall.

You will learn, first, that our Indians have waged the most cruel war against the English; that they continued it throughout the spring and are still so exasperated as to be beyond control; Georgia, Carolina, Marrelande, Pensilvania, are wholly laid waste. The farmers have been forced to quit their abodes and to retire into the town. They have neither ploughed nor planted, and on their complaining of the circumstance to the Governor of Boston, he answered them, that people were ploughing and planting for them in Canada. The Indians do not make any prisoners; they kill all they meet, men, women and children. Every day they have some in their kettle, and after having abused the women and maidens, they slaughter or burn them.

On the 29th January, we received letters from M. Dumas, Commandant of Fort Duquesne, on the Ohio, stating that the Indians in December had more than 500 English scalps, and he more than 200 prisoners; that he learns that a great part[y] is forming in New England, which he is awaiting without fear; that his fort is well fortified, and that 2,000 Indians in cabins around that fort, were a strong defence which the English would not readily approach. In the month of February, 50 Acadian families being embarked aboard of an English vessel to be transported to Virginia, revolted and repaired to M. de Boishébert, who commands in Acadia, which the English call Nova Scotia; having removed whatever was best in the ship, they set it on fire. Sometime afterwards the Mikmak Indians, who are in Acadia, seized an English schooner, on her way from Boston, loaded with provisions and clothing for the garrison of Port Royal. In that vessel were found a quantity of papers, English gazettes, and among the rest a letter from Colonel Jonckson, wherein he states that General Bradok has been imprudent to go and attack the fort on the River Oyo; that he had lost 1,500 and 600 dead, and that he, Jonckson, was ordered to attack Fort St. Frederic with 4,500; that he had lost 900 men in the battle with the French in the month of October last; that the expenses of their campaign had amounted to more than 120 millions; that as for his part, he was resolved to ask for his discharge; that there were no means of fighting the Canadians; that the English were all panic-stricken which prevented them resisting, and in return for that expense, all they received was the unfortunate Baron de Dieskau, whom they would give for four sous. One of their gazettes says, they have taken an East India Company's ship, and two slavers with 400 negroes each.

Between the 15th of February and the end of April, all our Regulars, Militia and Indians had gone to Forts St. Frederic, Niagara and Frontenac, and as the English had built armed ships on Lake Ontario, between these two last forts, we did the like. Therefore, as I shall relate, Canada has seen, for the first time, a naval engagement on these lakes. In March, the Indians of the Five Nations who wished to observe neutrality, having gone to Philadelphia, the English proposed to them to take up the hatchet against the French. They answered, that they were neutral, and that if they raised the hatchet against the French, with whom all the Indians sided, they would all be soon destroyed. The Governor, dissatisfied with their answer, has ill treated them, who, on their return, fell on a small fort near that of Cumberland, killed the garrison, took 4 pieces of cannon, which they carried to Fort Duquesne.

26th of April. On being informed that the English had an entrepôt between Orange and Chouaguen, which is their strongest defence on Lake Ontario, our General detached M. de Lery, with 6 @ 700 men, to capture it. It was called Fort Bull. He was deceived by his Indian guides, who made him travel through the woods a greater distance than he ought; provisions became exhausted; they perceived the treachery, and having taken some Indians, belonging to the English, prisoners, induced them, on a promise of quarter, to conduct them to the fort and by the right road. He overtook ten wagons loaded with provisions, ten wagoners and one negro. This last man escaped and went to Colonel Jonckson, who, with 400 men, was within a day's journey of the place. M. de Lery, having left some people to guard the provisions and baggage, approached Fort Bull, about 11 o'clock in the forenoon, where there was a redoubt, an oak palisade of 14 feet high and a garrison of 200 men. He rushed with his men against the gate, cut it and a palisaded bridge in pieces with hatchets, in spite of the continual fire of the English from grenades and muskets; killed 80 and took 70 prisoners, went to the store and flung into the lake 35 thousand weight of powder, the barrels of pork, flour, biscuit, which were innumerable; also, the shot, bullets and other ammunitions destined for Fort Chouaguen and for besieging our fort at Niagara; set fire to a magazine containing 10 thousand weight of powder, whither the rest of the garrison had retired, which was blown up with the building. A post, blown to the distance of two arpents, wounded one of our soldiers. All was over at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The report of the magazine was so loud as to be heard at Chouaguen, 30 leagues, and we lost only one Indian. M. de Lery marched, on the same day, to attack the second magazine, called Fort Ouillame,<sup>1</sup> garrisoned by 200 men. He met Colonel Jonkson, with his 400 men, who quickly retreated into the fort, where it was deemed inadvisable to attack him, not having sufficient force to encounter a body of 600 within an intrenchment. I have learned these particulars from the second in command, who related them to me this spring at Quebec. The wife of the Commandant had remained in her room and had a very beautiful waist belt, with a rich buckle, which a soldier, on entering, wished to take from her. Supposing that he wanted to violate her person, she gave him a box. The soldier cut her throat with his bayonet.

On Easter Sunday there was a terrible squall at Quebec from the Northeast, which wrecked over 100 bateaux designed to convey our troops to the different camps. On the 19th of April was launched at Fort Frontenac, a schooner of 150 tons, 18 pieces of cannon and 30 swivels, to oppose the English Admiral of 24 guns, which was likewise built on Lake Ontario. Familiarize yourself with the names of our Indians. 40 Delawares cut off, in May, a large English detachment, not one of which was left alive. These same Delawares, on returning from their expedition, met 80 English who, on the approach of the Indians, had fortified themselves in a house, to which the latter set fire, and thus roasted all the English. The Flatheads and Cheraquis have laid waste Virginia and Carolina; the Illinois are ravaging Georgia; the Five Nations which are composed of the Indians generally known under the name of Iroquois, have remained neutral, except some who have made war in our favor. The English have taken one Delaware, a village chief, whom they have gouged. M. Dumas, Commandant of Fort du Quesne, has taken advantage of that act of cruelty, to represent to the Indians of that Nation what they might expect from our enemies. It has so infuriated them, that not a person falls into their hands who is not burnt. An Iroquois chief, attached to the English, has brought the medal he had received from them to our General and said to him: Henceforth be thou my Father; here's the medal of the English; I am going to work to deserve another from you.

The Iroquois of the Sault St. Louis being ashamed of having abandoned M. de Lery in the attack on Fort Bul, have been on a foray in the English territory, where they encountered a detachment, all the soldiers of which they have killed. They took prisoners only a Major and a Lieutenant, who were going to Lake George with three large packets, from which we have learned the designs of the English and their strength. We expect that they have about 9,000 men at Lake George. The English have erected two forts near the Oyo. Mr. Dumas sent thither Mess<sup>rs</sup> Corbière and Douville, who have burnt the two forts, and the English within them, and killed the remainder. Our killed amounted to 15 French and Indians, Sieur Douville included. The wife of the Commandant of one of the forts has been taken by the Indians, who had her tied to a stake in order to burn her. A soldier ransomed her with his share of the plunder, amounting to about 400<sup>li</sup>. This soldier writes to the General, that he has saved the most beautiful English woman ever seen; if he be returned his money, he will surrender her; otherwise he desires permission to marry her.

Our little fleet on Lake Ontario, in number about 5 vessels, having met the English fleet, amounting to 10, gave them battle. We have taken the English Admiral; afterwards put the others to flight, and obliged two to run ashore, with all sails set, near Fort Chouaguen. In the beginning of July, whilst M. de Villiers, a Canadian Captain, was lying in ambush, on the River Chouaguen, with a detachment of 800 men, our Indians fired too soon; the convoy amounted to 1,500, whom we have defeated, 800 were killed; about 500 bateaux and the provisions were taken and burned. The fight lasted about six hours. Our Canadians and Indians were so animated that the most of them flung themselves into the river in order to pursue the enemy. We lost 10 men, among whom is Chevalier de Ganne, who has died of his wounds. On the Lake George side, a small party of Iroquois, headed by a Canadian, stopped 16 English horsemen and have killed 9, taken 7 prisoners, and have brought horses and plunder to Carillon; 50 English have captured two French bateaux with 12 men on board; they were loaded with hay and oats; 4 killed, 8 prisoners. This is the sole advantage gained over us by the English up to the beginning of August. A Canadian officer having been on the scout near Fort George, at the end of July, met two English bateaux with 35 men; 30 killed, 5 prisoners. Six Cadets, belonging to our Regulars, fell in, on the 2d August, with 15 English, killed 13; 2 prisoners.

<sup>1</sup> This fort seems to have been called after Colonel Joseph Williams; for an account of whom, see Genealogy of the Williams Family, 294-296. It is now Rome, Oneida county, New-York. — Ed.

5th August. La Quesche, of Dunkirk, has arrived with the packets from the Court, and the Declaration of War by the King of England. On the 11th of August news arrived at Quebec that our little army of 5 @ 6,000 men had arrived at Fort Frontenac, 30 leagues above Montreal, which is 60 from Quebec, and that preparations were completed to attack Chouaguen. This fort, the rampart of the English, was built about 35 years ago to the shame of the Canadians, who were obliged to pass under its guns in order to go to the Upper country posts; 'twas regarded as impregnable, and the English considered themselves so sure of that fortress that they were incessantly taunting us. Timid minds wished the attack to be postponed, but our General and the Intendant decided that everything must be risked. Therefore, the regiments of Bearn and Rousillon, which had arrived this year, and Guienne were commanded with 3,000 Canadians and Canadian troops. The execution [of the undertaking] was confided to the Marquis de Montcalm, Major-General (Marechal de camp), Commander-in-Chief of the King's troops in this country, who had under him Colonel de Bourlamarc and some Indians.

Chouaguen is built on the shore of Lake Ontario, having, on the northeast, the river called Chouaguen which serves it as a rampart. To the northeast of that river, the English had constructed a second fort which they called Fort Ontario. On the 5th of August our troops left Fort Frontenac in bateaux and sloops and after having sailed two nights, landed without any opposition on the part of the English, who dispatched at first three sloops to annoy us and to burn our bateaux, but four pieces of cannon that had been furnished to the van-guard obliged them to retire. They fired a great deal, but their guns not being of a sufficient calibre, did not carry as far as the land. All that country is wooded; 'twas necessary to cut a road to the place where the trench was to be opened. The enemy fired considerably from their fort without killing any one; our Indians continually harassed them and did not leave them time to breathe; an accident occurred, however, on the 11th. M. de Comble, Engineer-in-Chief, who had set out, at the break of day, to reconnoitre Fort Choueguen, was mistaken for an Englishman by one of our Indians, who knocked him down with a blow of his gun. Nothing equalled the desolation of this poor man and his tribe, and M. de Montcalm found it necessary to use considerable effort in order to pacify and retain them; for their grief was so great that they were desirous of returning to their village. The trench was opened on the night of the 12th to the 13th; the pioneers were assisted by the Canadians.

On the morning of the 13th we had a battery in position to bear. The English opened from Fort Ontario a terrible fire of musketry, shell and shot, which did no harm because the great labor of the night afforded a cover. We had one commissary of stores killed by a cannon ball, and a grenadier received a slight wound in the head which did not prevent him continuing at his post. About three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, M. de Bourlamar received a ball which slightly wounded him in the head, but he did not abandon his post as Director of the siege. Shortly afterwards, the enemy's fire ceased; they were, 'twas thought, preparing to make a sortie, but information was received that they were crossing the river, abandoning tents and baggage and carrying with them only four mortars. Some Indians were sent out who reported the fort vacated. 15 Grenadiers of Guienne, and subsequently the entire company, scaled the fort and took possession of it. They were 350. A drunken Englishman was all that was found, and he was granted quarter. The English rendered us an essential service by abandoning this fort to us, which was very substantial and in a condition to resist us and to kill many men. In addition to the trench which was continued, a new work [was commenced.] 'Twas necessary to construct a road for the conveyance of the artillery to the abandoned fort; 450 men were employed on this service, and on the morning of the 14th a brisk cannonade was opened against Chouaguen which was also bombarded. On its side, it returned a very smart fire for some time. M. de Rigaud, our General's brother, who had by a ruse escaped last year from the prisons of England, placed himself at the head of 2,000 Canadians and Indians and crossed the river. They raised frightful yells, which the Indians call Salaquois. The English were so terribly panic-stricken that they hoisted the white flag. Firing ceased on both sides and a canoe was noticed making its appearance with some English officers on board, who came to propose a surrender provided a favorable capitulation was granted them; 1,800 belonging to the garrison, to be prisoners of war until exchanged. Six months' provisions for 4,000 men were found in the fort; 3 chests of gold and silver and 5 standards were taken; 121 pieces of artillery in the two forts, which have been razed. The English General is killed, and we have lost M. de Comble, one Canadian and a grenadier of Béarn, and 8 of our men, wounded. 3 sloops are captured, one of 24 guns, 10 small sloops of 25 tons, 200 bateaux and barges, and one vessel on the stocks, which the English carpenters are left to finish under a strong guard. When this advantage is taken in connection with the victory on the Oyo, 'tis the most remarkable affair that has happened since the founding of this Colony. Chouaguen fallen, or rather surrendered to the yells of the Canadians and Indians, recalls to my mind the fall of Jericho before the cries of the Israelites. The prisoners are to be sent to France.

The colors being arrived at Montreal, were loaned to the Indians, who made a sort of procession around the town, then went to the church, where, of themselves, they sung the Te Deum in their language, but left the colors at the door under a strong guard, saying they ought not be admitted into the church because they were not Christian; they meant to say that they were not Blessed.

All being arranged at Chouaguen, our regiments are to march direct to Fort St. Frederic and Carillon, where M. de Montcalm proceeded immediately to attempt an attack on Fort George. During his absence he left the command of this place to the Marquis de Levy, Brigadier. We expect news every day from that quarter, which is only 40 leagues from Montreal, and a good road.

4th October. It appears that neither we nor the English feel any desire to undertake anything this year in the direction of Lake St. Sacrament; nevertheless, our troops will not return into quarters before the 15th of November.

Since the capture of Chouaguen, one of our officers named M. Marin, utterly defeated, at the head of a hundred Indians, a small party of 52 English near Lake St. Sacrament, and M. de Villiers, an officer of New Orleans, seeking in Carolina, at the head of some Illinois Indians, whereby to signalize himself, has been to attack a fort; he collected some faggots which were in the neighborhood, and set the fort on fire. A party made a sortie to extinguish the flames, and has been killed. The remainder have been roasted or blown up with powder.

6th of October. We learn that on the Oyo a party of 300 English horsemen went to surprise or burn a Delaware village. The Indians ran to place their women and children in safety, whilst five Canadians, one of whom was a Cadet, were firing at and arresting the progress of the horsemen. The Indians having returned, took possession of the roads. The horsemen fled into the woods; 25 remained dead on the field, and 2 prisoners left the horses to the Indians, who went in pursuit of the others.

Letters from Louisbourg inform us that an officer of that canton, who was with some French and Indians in a small fort on Isle Royale, weary and tired of beholding English ships cruising at the mouth of their harbor, put four or five men in a little bateau. The wind was scant to go out; it was going broadside. The English detached 4 barges with 50 men, when the little vessel found herself pressed, she altered her tack and ran to a cape, according to orders. The barges pursued; when they were within a short gun-shot, the officer and his men fired and killed 30 of the enemy, wounded several, captured one barge and damaged two; the fourth, too happy at having escaped, took the two in tow, and returned to report its good luck to their people.

Robert Stobo and Vanban left eight days ago for Montreal, under an escort. I do not know what our General proposes to do with them. The English here say that if a Frenchman had played in their country the trick that Stobo has played here, he would have been hanged.

Versailles, 20th March, 1757.

Sir,

The King having accepted my uncle's resignation, I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letters addressed to him of the 8th and 15th of June, 30th of August, 18th of October, 1st, 5th, 6th and 7th of November, of the last year, as well as duplicates and triplicates of some of them.

I request you will receive my congratulations on the successful issue of the expedition against Chouegen, which you have so ably directed, and the fruits whereof are as advantageous to the King's service and to the good of the Colony, as they are injurious to our enemies.

I cannot thank you too much for the different details into which you are pleased to enter, both as regards the troops that have made the campaign and whom you have sent into winter quarters, and those who have remained in garrison; and generally respecting the situation and strength of those troops.

The King had observed, with pleasure, the harmony which exists between you and the Marquis de Montcalm, and that you have reason to be satisfied with Chevalier de Levis as well as with the other officers. I must do them, in turn, the justice to assure you that in the letters they have written hither, they are highly pleased with the kindness you show them. The first has not left us in ignorance of the distinguished part M. Rigaud de Vaudreuil has had in the expedition against Chouegen, and the resources realized in the Colonial troops.

His Majesty has approved your having permitted Lieutenant de Sudriac, of the regiment of Guyenne, to return to France in consequence of bad health.

I have not forgotten the favorable testimony you bear of Captain Pouchot, of the Regiment of Guyenne,<sup>2</sup> to whom you have entrusted the direction of the fortifications of Fort Niagara, and he will find some marks of his Majesty's satisfaction in the list of favors which will reach M. de Montcalm.

We have received news of the Baron de Dieskaw. He states, in a letter dated New-York, the 1st of October last, that his wounds were not healing as rapidly as he had been led to expect, and that he was going to solicit permission to return to Europe.

<sup>1</sup> ANTOINE RENÉ DE VOTER D'ARGENSON, Marquis de Paulmy, was born at Valenciennes, 22d November, 1722. He was educated to the profession of the law, and when the Count d'Argenson became Minister of War, he appointed his nephew, the Marquis de Paulmy, Commissary-General, who, in that capacity, accompanied the army in the campaigns of Flanders and Italy. In 1748 he was received member of the Academy, and in December following was sent Ambassador to Switzerland. In 1751 he was recalled on being appointed by his uncle General Secretary of the War Department, and spent the five following years in a thorough inspection of all the fortifications, arsenals, &c., of the kingdom. On the 2d February, 1757, he succeeded his uncle as Minister of War, and filled that office until March, 1758. He retained his seat at the Council, however, until 1762, when he was sent Ambassador to Poland, and in 1766, to Venice, whence he returned in 1770, after which he devoted himself to literature, especially to history and bibliography. His library was one of the most complete and select, and having arranged this magnificent collection, which amounted to one hundred thousand volumes, he prepared a catalogue of it. In 1755, he published the plan of the Bibliothèque Universelle des Romains, and next, the work entitled Mélanges d'une Grande Bibliothèque, which amounted, in less than eight years, to 65 volumes. After a life of much usefulness, he died on 13th August, 1787. His collection of books was purchased, in 1781, by the Count d'Artois, from whom it descended to Louis XVIII. It is called the Library of the Arsenal. Biographie Universelle. — Eo.

I am very glad that you are satisfied with M. Doreil. The King has been graciously pleased to give him an assistant without proposing it to you. With this view I send an order to Sieur de la Grive des Assises, who is at Louisbourg, to proceed to Canada on the first favorable occasion, after the arrival of Sieur Magalon, whom his Majesty has destined to replace him at Louisbourg.

I pray you, Sir, to be fully persuaded that I have the honor to be, with profound attachment,

M. de Paulmy to M. de Montcalm.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Versailles, 20th March, 1757.

Sir,

The King having accepted the resignation of my uncle, I have to acknowledge the receipt of the letters which you wrote between the 24th of May and the 8th of November of the last year, according to the annexed minute. I have also received those you did me the honor to write me on the 12th and 20th June, 30th of August and 1st of November last, and their duplicates.

I begin by presenting you my most sincere congratulations on the happy success of the expedition against Chouagen, which accompanied your letter of the 30th of August, and his Majesty has highly praised all your arrangements on that subject as well as the firmness and activity you applied thereto, and which have been so effectually seconded by the zeal and ardor of his troops. You will receive, with a private despatch, a list of the favors his Majesty has been pleased to accord to the officers who distinguished themselves in that campaign.

His Majesty is highly satisfied with the union which appears to exist between you and the Governor-General, and is persuaded that you will not neglect anything that will possibly maintain it.

I owe the Marquis de Vaudreuil the justice to assure you that he bestows the highest eulogiums on your military talents as well as on your personal qualities, and that he appears, in general, highly pleased with all the officers of our troops, being well satisfied with Chevalier de Levis, also.

I am very glad that you are pleased with the conduct of the latter at Carillon during the campaign. I feel all the delicacy of his position; he therefore seems highly flattered with the marks of confidence you bestow on him.

I cannot too warmly express my satisfaction for the different details you furnish me in your despatches, especially in regard to everything bearing on the situation of our troops before and after the campaign. They leave nothing to be desired, and I present you my thanks in return for them and also for what you communicate to me of the condition of the different forts of the country.

The representations which you have addressed to the Secretary of State for the Marine, on the subject of the proposed reduction of the allowance to the officers and soldiers during the campaign, cannot but be approved, and I doubt not but it has been attended to by M. de Moras, who has succeeded M. de Machault in that department, especially if the Governor-General and Intendant of the country agree with you on that subject.

My uncle has submitted to the King the private letter you wrote him, partly in cipher, on the 1st of November; likewise the accompanying plan of Fort Vaudreuil.<sup>1</sup> All that I can advise you on this point is, that he told me that his Majesty had attended to it.

I perceive from M. de St. Julien's letters that there had been few sick last year in the garrison of Louisbourg, and that in the month of December last, since the incorporation of the recruits, he was short only 6 men to complete the two battalions of Artois and Burgundy.

I see, Sir, by your despatch of the 1st of 9<sup>ber</sup>, that you consider it useless to send you a second Commissary, but that you demand a blank commission to fill it up when necessary. Your report to me on the 20th July respecting the frightful condition in which you found the hospitals and provisions at the camp at Carillon, induced the King to conclude that, as M. Doreil was obliged to remain at Montreal during the campaign, it became indispensable to have some one empowered to superintend the service in those places where the troops are obliged to assemble, and hence his Majesty decided to send to Canada Sieur de la Grive des Assises, now at Louisbourg, and I transmit him the order to leave that place at the earliest opportunity, after, however, the arrival of Sieur Magallon, who is to succeed him at Louisbourg.

As regards what is personal to yourself, Sir, his Majesty has instructed me to inform you that he will be always disposed to give you proofs of the particular satisfaction he entertains of your conduct, and to assure you that the new services he expects from you will only increase those dispositions on his part.

I am, with the most perfect attachment,

Sir,

Yours, etc.

Postscript.

To yours of the 3rd November, containing different questions relative to the service, I send an answer in a separate letter.

Baron de Dieskau to Count d'Argenson.

Falmouth, England, 7th April, 1757.

My Lord,

I have the honor to inform you that, agreeably to the advice of all the surgeons of New-York to drink the Bath waters in England, I embarked last month, and arrived here after a voyage of three weeks. Immediately upon my arrival I wrote to Lord Barrington,<sup>2</sup> Secretary of War, requesting him to obtain permission for me to go to those springs, and to proceed to London to have my wounds examined by surgeons of more skill than those in America, as I am certain that had I, in the first instance, fallen into skilful hands, I should now be cured. I am waiting for this Minister's answer, and an order to be removed to London by sea, as I am not yet capable of enduring a carriage.

<sup>2</sup> WILLIAM WILDMAN, 2d Viscount Barrington, on the Irish Peerage, was born in 1717, and represented Berwick in 1745; was appointed a Lord of the Admiralty in 1746; Master of the Wardrobe in 1754; Secretary at War in 1755; Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1761, for which he said he was as fit as for being head of the Church; Treasurer of the Navy in 1762, and Secretary at War again in 1765, at which time he represented Plymouth. He resigned office in 1778, and died 1st February, 1793. — Ed.

As regards my wounds, the principal one continues open, but the surgeons' assurances lead me to hope that I shall be entirely cured by the aid of the above waters.

I am, &c.,

M. de Paulmy to M. de Montcalm.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Versailles, 10th April, 1757.

Sir,

Being at present in sole charge of the War Department, it is with pleasure that I seize the earliest moment to have a private communication with you. I feel too much attachment for my uncle, and am too well persuaded of the solidity of his principles, not to confirm all the instructions he has already given you, and to request you to conform yourself thereunto with particular attention; I shall merely add a few reflections to them, vizt.: 'Tis very important that the officers of the Regular troops in Canada live in close union with those of the Colony. 'Tis to be feared that the former treat the Canadians with hauteur and harshness; above all things, it would be of the greatest consequence were the Indians not pleased with them. His majesty has instructed me to recommend to you to make use of every means that may depend on you, to establish, between the troops under your orders and the inhabitants of the country, sentiments of friendship and good understanding, without which it cannot be expected that they will concur with all desirable ardor in the success of the expeditions which you will have undertaken. As the example to be afforded by yourself is, plainly, the most powerful means you can employ to communicate to the one and the other the manner they ought to behave, you cannot exhibit too much graciousness and affability on all occasions, both to the Canadians and to the Indians. 'Tis particularly essential to manage the latter whose service is indispensably necessary to afford you information of the country, and advices of the enemy's march and dispositions; and they cannot be strongly attached except by showing that you value their bravery, whereof they are so jealous, by praising the guerilla war which is in use, accustoming our troops to practice it sometimes by intermingling some volunteers among them; in fine, rendering unto all the most scrupulous justice in regard to whatever will be promised, and avoiding, in the partition of booty, to give any preference that may create jealousies, and dissatisfy allies whose coöperation is indispensable to the Colony. I have observed you so full of these principles, when you set out to embark, that I doubt not they are confirmed in you, since you have of yourself acknowledged their truth and importance, and that you are freely inclined to fulfill his Majesty's intentions in this regard.

I hope you will be so good as to keep up, independent of your ordinary relations with the Minister of War, a personal and secret correspondence with me. My uncle has delivered to me an address and little cipher which will serve us in this particular. I hope you will add another portion of the confidence you reposed in my uncle, to that which I flatter myself I have already merited at your hands.

I have the honor to be with perfect attachment, Sir,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant.

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 19th April, 1757.

My Lord,

In the letter I had the honor to write you on the 11th of October of last year, to render you an account of the district of the Beautiful river, I did myself also the honor to observe that my negotiations with the Flatheads were more and more successful.

In effect, my Lord, a Canadian of Detroit who has since several years been adopted by that Nation, and to whom I had secretly transmitted a letter that he should endeavor, without too marked a zeal, to induce the Flatheads to unite with the French, wrote on the 20th of September to the Commandant of Fort Duquène, that the Flatheads had received my message with pleasure; that four of them were setting out to convey the message of the chiefs to the Hurons and to advise the Commandant of Fort Duquène of the intentions of their Nation. This Canadian added that he was himself going on the part of the Cherakis to carry their message to Mobile; that all the Indians were making arrangements to do well for the French; that the English were talking of attacking the Illinois; the chief who carried the messages wished to join the Hurons and other Nations to strike the English.

This letter was confided to the Chaouanon chief of Sonnioto by two Flatheads<sup>1</sup> who were desirous of going to see the Commandant of Fort Duquène, whilst the other Deputies would proceed on with a Chaouanon chief to convey to Detroit the Belt with which they were intrusted on the part of their chiefs.

Those of the Flatheads who were to go to Fort Duquène, turned back and took the same route as the others, at the solicitation of a Huron whom they met on the way.

The Flathead Deputies arrived at Detroit and held a grand Council with M. de Mury on the 10th of January.

They commenced by asking me for peace and testified to all the Indian Nations the desire they felt to be admitted into the number of the allies of the French; and so soon as they should learn my sentiments more positively than by the messages which had been transmitted to them in my name, they would return in greater numbers and with stronger messages.

They asked pardon for all their past faults, and said:

That they held on to the English by almost nothing, and that their hand would slip from his the moment I should protect them, and that all the Nations were desirous of living in peace with them.

That if I would promise to supply their wants as I did those of the other Nations, they would entirely abandon and strike the English.

The Chaouanons, who accompanied the Flatheads to Detroit, told them they had obeyed my message and had forthwith struck the English.

The Flatheads continued and made all their customary ceremonies, and said :

That they were only paying a visit to level the road, so that they may easily see the French and all the Indian Nations whom they were desirous to join in order to strike the English.

That it was the smallest village which is called Tsotis that was speaking.

That the chief's son headed the deputation ; they assured that the sentiments of nine villages, dependent on them, agreed with theirs, and that thirty other villages, also comprised under the name of Cherakis and Flatheads, were only waiting for their return to decide.

These Flatheads left a Belt with Mr. de Muy for the Outaouas and begged him to communicate it to them. By that Belt they engage them to let their tomahawk fall very heavily on the English and not to turn it against them (the Flatheads).

Mr. de Muy had this Council attended by a Huron chief, an Outaouas chief and two other influential members of that Nation, with some Pouteouatamis, and all seemed satisfied with the messages of the Flatheads.

M. de Muy received by these Deputies a letter dated the same day, 20 September, from a Canadian, who is also adopted in that tribe, wherein he informs him that the Cherakis and Flatheads are really desirous to wage war against the English.

I would have reason to believe that the Flatheads have already commenced hostilities, because the Acadians, who have deserted from Carolina, have assured me that the Cherakis and Chicachas, being gone to Virginia for their presents, had, on their return home, destroyed five hundred English habitations, which appears so little doubtful that these Acadians assert having seen some of those very English who had escaped from those Indians.

Mr. de Muy spoke to these Deputies agreeably to the orders I had given him. He disgusted them with the English and neglected nothing to induce them to strike, and to communicate to us intelligence of the enemy's movements, as soon as understood.

These Flatheads and the Chaouanons who accompanied them, were much pleased with the manner they had been received, and returned home.

My principal object is to prevent the Flatheads pronouncing against us ; I observe towards them the same policy I have observed towards the Five Nations, because if these Flatheads attacked the Nations of the Beautiful river, that would throw a damp on their ardor, and I even think that our other Nations would not go willingly to wage war against the English in those parts.

I should dare flatter myself that I would succeed in getting these Flatheads to strike, had I wherewithal to supply their wants ; this I could not do, so long as they will remain constantly in their villages, inasmuch as they will be always obliged to have recourse to the English, and 'tis not natural to suppose that they wish, by declaring war against those English, to expose themselves to want everything ; therefore, it is desirable that we could afford them an asylum. This is a matter of more urgency than is supposed. The English employ all their resources to induce those Nations to unite with them, and it would be highly dangerous should they succeed, for they have projected the erection of forts and the building of large bateaux in the villages of those Indians for the purpose of going by the Ouabache to attack the Illinois, or at least to surprise the Louisiana convoys.

It would therefore be indispensable to establish a post at the Falls on the Beautiful river,<sup>1</sup> to secure the communication of Canada with Louisiana. Although that post be not sufficiently near the Flatheads and Cherakis, nevertheless, the Traders whom I should send, might attract them thither or go with horses across the mountains into their villages.

The soil at these Falls invites settlements. If we could have some permanent ones, we should hold the Flatheads and Cherakis in check. These Nations bar the passage by the Mississippi and its tributaries; they facilitate parties that come down from different directions.

That post would be the principal key of Louisiana and Canada. All the rivers that fall into the Mississippi and the Beautiful river, both from the direction of the Missouri as well as from Canada, cannot descend to New Orleans without passing it.

I shall not lose any time in following up my negotiations with the Flatheads, and shall endeavor all in my power to gain some advantage therefrom.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Machault.

Montreal, 19th April, 1757.

My Lord,

I had not excepted New Jersey from the incursions of our Indians, but as that quarter is at a vast distance, I could employ only some Delawares who are at the other side of the mountains. They have carried out my intentions to the best of their ability; have burnt 40 English houses with the crops in their barns; have returned to Niagara with 6 scalps belonging to soldiers killed under a New Jersey fort, where they took a prisoner whom they left in their village to replace their chief.

As these Delawares speak English, they have themselves interrogated that prisoner, who told them that the English were to blockade the river and take Quebec.

These Delawares have boasted greatly of this blow; indeed, the long and fatiguing journey they have been obliged to make, I look upon as a very evident proof of their good will.

It will be impossible for me to continue to make incursions into New Jersey; 'tis beyond the reach of our posts. But 'tis certain that the English of that country who learned the incursions of our Indians only from the newspapers, will not fail to be greatly frightened, when experiencing themselves what our Indians are capable of, which probably will have made considerable impression on the people.

I am, with most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

M. de Vaudreuil to the Keeper of the Seals.<sup>1</sup>

Montreal, 22 April, 1757.

My Lord,

I had the honor to report to you, in my despatch of the 6th of November, that all the New England forces would direct their march against Carillon, but that it would be impossible for me to undertake anything, either offensive or defensive, until after the arrival of the reinforcements I had the honor to request.

Therefore as early as the end of the campaign, I formed the project of counteracting General Lawden's measures.

I saw clearly that I must do in a lump, what I performed in detail last year at the carrying place between Chouaguen and Corlac.

But this new expedition was infinitely more difficult, as it contemplated the utter ruin of General Lawden's preparations at Fort Georges,<sup>2</sup> inasmuch as all was under the protection of the cannon and even of the musketry of that fort.

I conclude, from the reports of the prisoners taken on the 21 January :

That General Lawden had committed the command of that fort to an officer of consummate experience in the art of war ;

That this Commandant was constantly on his guard ;

That he had a garrison of 500 men, exclusive of a troop of picked Rangers for scouts ;

That it was easy to increase his forces, either by bringing up some from Fort Lydius or other places in his neighborhood.

I entered alone into these calculations, and very far from letting them be known, I announced my expedition on the contrary in a manner to embolden the detachment for which I had designed it.

I made the success of this enterprise depend, with reason, on its execution at a time when the enemy could not fear, nor even think, the Canadians were on him.

With that view I dispatched only at the end of February, a detachment of 1,500 men, Regulars, Canadians and Indians, under the orders of M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil. Their good dispositions were on a par, and the Canadians and Indians who, by their experience, led the troops, overcame all obstacles, being induced, by inclination, to follow M. de Rigaud's example.

You will see, my Lord, by the annexed Relation, which has been drawn up by an officer of the Regulars, that in order to carry out my intentions, my brother was obliged to summon the enemy and, by his manœuvres, to persuade him that he was about to scale the fort. This ruse had wonderful success.

For although within pistol-shot of Fort Georges he succeeded in burning

1st Four cruisers, equal to those the English had on Lake Ontario ;

2<sup>d</sup> A number of 50-oar long-boats ;

3<sup>d</sup> About 350 bateaux for transportation ;

<sup>1</sup> In M. de Vaudreuil's despatch of June 1 (post), this letter is said to have been addressed to the Keeper of the Seals. M. de Machault held that office until 2d February, 1757. — Ed.

4th All the building materials on the ground for the construction of at least twice as many cruisers, long-boats and bateaux;

5th A quantity of campaign carriages;

6th A stockaded fort which surrounded the enemy's sheds containing at least 400 barrels of flour and provisions of all sorts in proportion, guns, sabres, clothing for the army, and generally all the material of the campaign;

7th A saw-mill;

8th The hospitals;

9th A number of buildings in the fort;

10th Other houses under Fort Georges, and which formed a sort of Lower town;

11th Lastly, all the firewood.

This fire would have inevitably reduced Fort Georges to ashes, had there been the slightest wind. Under this apprehension the enemy had unroofed all the buildings in the interior of the fort.

Fort Georges is actually isolated; its exterior establishments no longer exist, and General Lawden's beautiful and immense preparations have been calcined by the flames at a trifling expense, inasmuch as it cost us only 5 men, one of whom was crushed by a shell, and the other<sup>1</sup> taken off by a cannon ball.

The enemy's fire was very brisk, but neither his artillery nor musketry made any great impression. M. de Rigaud had placed a detachment of Canadians and Indians who picked off the gunners and killed them the moment they showed themselves. Many other Englishmen were killed also, as fast as they made their appearance, but 'tis impossible for me to state their number positively.

Thus, my Lord, M. de Rigaud accomplished the important mission I had confided to him. He left nothing for me to desire in what I had prescribed to him.

This event changes the situation of the Colony, and renders it, so to say, as advantageous as it was critical.

In fact I was positively aware that General Lawden was to collect an army, in the beginning of April, of 15 @ 20 thousand men, at Fort Georges, to lay siege to Fort Carillon on the 15th of the same month; what resistance could that fort offer him? its garrison was feeble in itself; besides, more than half of it was down sick.

The enemy might then have been in possession of Carillon, and successively of St. Frederic, before the opening of our navigation.

I would, in vain, have desired to dispatch forces thither, since we are without provisions. Our situation becomes, every day, more melancholy, as I had the honor to submit to you in my letter of the 6th of November.

I hope, my Lord, on the report you will be pleased to make to the King of this fortunate event, that his Majesty will be satisfied therewith, or at least admit therein the zeal of my brother de Rigaud and of myself for his service.

I am with the most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

VAUDREUIL.

Attack on Fort William Henry, 1757.

An Account of the advantages acquired by the King's arms over the English.

Exclusive of the parties of Canadians and of Indians which have been continually in the field during the winter, and which, in the incursions they have made against the enemy, have killed a great many people on them and spread alarm throughout the English Colonies, the Marquis de Vaudreuil has executed an expedition, the object whereof is very important.

He had been informed in the month of January, that the enemy had collected at Fort Georges, on Lake St. Sacrament, a very considerable quantity of stores of all sorts, and that they had had constructed, under the guns of that fort, a large number of barks, bateaux and other vessels, not only for the transport of these stores, but also to secure the navigation of that lake. Judging that all those preparations were destined for the enterprises which the enemy were proposing to execute in the spring, he formed the project of depriving them of the means to effect their purpose.

With this view, he formed a detachment of fifteen hundred men, composed of five pickets from the battalions of the troops of the Line, one of which was of grenadiers, three hundred soldiers of Colonial troops, six hundred and fifty Militia, one company of which consisted of Volunteers and three hundred Indians. This detachment having been promptly collected together at Fort St. John, Sieur de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of Three Rivers, who was in command, ordered it forward in four divisions.

The first marched on the 20th of February; 'twas composed of six companies of Regulars and Colonial Militia mixed, with some Abenaki Indians, and was commanded by Lieutenant St. Martin, of those troops. The second, commanded by Captain du Chat, of the regiment of Languedoc, was composed of two pickets of Regulars, three companies of Colonials, with some Indians, and marched on the 21st, followed next morning by the third, under the command of Captain de Coni, of the regiment of Royal Roussillon, and which was composed as the second. Sieur de Rigaud was to start on the 23rd with the Grenadier picket, the company of Canadian Volunteers and some Indians, which composed the fourth division, but he was delayed until the 25th, by the thaw. The four divisions having formed a junction at Fort Carillon, the entire troop marched thence on the 15th of March, the company of Canadian Volunteers leading the van, and arrived on the 17th at seven o'clock in the evening, within a league and a half of Fort Georges.

18th. Sieur de Rigaud detached Captain Poullariez, of the Royal Rousillon Grenadiers, with two other officers, to reconnoitre the fort, from a hill about a league off, by which it is commanded. Though the report of Sieur Poullariez left no doubt of the enemy having been informed of his march, Sieur de Rigaud made arrangements for the execution of the orders confided to him.

He put all his troops in motion on the fall of the night of the 18 @ 19. He detached Captain Dumas with two other officers and some grenadiers to reconnoitre the approaches of the fort. The noise they unavoidably made in marching on the ice, led to their early discovery, and they were obliged to rejoin the main body. Sieur de Rigaud meanwhile determined on setting fire to the bateaux beneath the fort, but only a small number of them was burnt. The enemy killed two men and wounded another.

On the 20th, Sieur de Rigaud invested the fort, in order to intimidate the garrison, which he was aware consisted of five or six hundred picked men, and detached a party of Indians on the road leading to Fort Lydius, to cut off the communication. He even had the Commandant<sup>1</sup> summoned, whereby the attention of the latter was fixed on the arrangements relative to the defence of the fort, so that on the night following, he fired only a few guns and some shells, which did not prevent the burning of a large quantity of property.

The fort continued invested on the 21st without the enemy daring to make a sortie. They remained equally quiet throughout the night, when so great a quantity of melted snow fell, that it was impossible to set anything on fire without. The weather was more favorable the next night, and advantage was taken of that circumstance to burn whatever was on the lake and in the vicinity of the fort, notwithstanding the fire of artillery and musketry kept up by the enemy, which killed three soldiers and wounded one officer.

The enemy lost by this conflagration, four brigantines of 10 @ 14 guns, two long-boats of fifty oars, which they designed for the navigation of the lakes; over three hundred and fifty transport bateaux; a considerable quantity of building timber, several campaign carriages, a saw-mill, the sheds and magazines which were inclosed by a stockaded fort, and finally all their supply of firewood. The fort remains isolated; 'twas saved from the flames only because no wind was blowing during the whole of the conflagration.

Throughout this expedition, which is one of the most important that could be undertaken in winter in Canada, there were only five Frenchmen killed, one officer and one Indian wounded, although it was executed under the fire of the artillery and musketry of Fort Georges. The number of the enemy's loss is unknown, but the Canadians and Indians had been placed in such a manner as by the fire of their musketry, to silence frequently that of the enemy.

That success is principally due to the wise arrangements made by Sieur de Rigaud, to the attention he paid to their execution and the constancy with which he has supported the excessive fatigues of the march at so rigorous a season. The different corps of Regulars and of Militia equally distinguished themselves in every respect, and Sieur de Rigaud had been extremely well pleased with the conduct of the Indians employed on the occasion.

As well in like manner, with the dispositions of all the Indian Nations of the Colony. Those who have from all time been our allies, furnish daily new proofs of their fidelity, and are out every day against the enemy.

There are, besides, some pretty numerous Nations, the Flatheads among the rest, who have recently entered into that alliance and who have taken a part in the war. The Five Iroquois Nations have sent one of the most solemn deputations to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to renew their ancient engagements with France. They have promised not only to renounce all commerce with the enemy, but in order to act against them, to unite even with the other Nations, friends of France.

The enemy, on their side, have attempted only one expedition during the winter. Having been informed that some provisions were to be conveyed from Fort St. Frederic to Fort Carillon, under an escort of a small detachment, they dispatched eighty men who cut off the foremost sleighs of this convoy and seven soldiers. But the Commandant of Fort St. Frederic sent out a fresh detachment to intercept that of the enemy on its way. The latter did in fact fall into the ambuscade. The fight was one of the briskest and most obstinate. Forty men, of whom three were officers, belonging to the enemy, remained on the field. Eight prisoners were taken and the remainder of the detachment escaped into the woods where they perished of their wounds, so that only three men returned to Fort Georges. The French had eleven killed and twenty-six wounded. They recovered the sleighs which the enemy had carried off, and in regard to the seven soldiers the enemy had taken, only three of them were found, the other four having been killed.

This engagement took place on the 21st of January.

Chevalier de Levis to M. de Paulmy.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 24 April, 1757.

My Lord,

I have the honor to report to you, by the first opportunity offering for France, my operations at the close of the last campaign. I did not quit the camp at Carillon, with the battalions of the Royal Rousillon and Languedoc, until the thirteenth of November, after I had been exactly informed by some prisoners and some detachments I had sent out, that my Lord Loudon had left Fort Lidieus, and that all the troops had dispersed and were gone into winter quarters in New England and New-York. I arranged the garrisons of Forts Carillon and St. Frederik, and left instructions in writing to Messrs de Lusignan<sup>1</sup> and de Gaspé, Captains in the Marines, destined to command these two forts, as to the conduct they were to observe during winter, for the security of those posts; the fighting parties they were to send out, and the preservation of the provisions.

I left, likewise, a private instruction to M. de Bassenrok, Captain in the regiment of Languedoc, who was the senior of our troops of the Line at Carillon, touching the conduct he was to observe towards M. de Lusignan, on all occasions that might occur.

After I had taken all the precautions I considered necessary, I broke up the camp at Carillon and called in all our posts from Lake St. Sacrament. The ground was already covered with a foot of snow; I made as much haste as possible for fear of being stopped by the ice on <sup>1</sup> PAUL LOUIS DAZEMARD, Sieur de Lusignan, son of Captain de Lusignan, was born in Canada, in 1691, and in 1722 was an Ensign in a company of the troops of the Marine. In 1733 he obtained the grant of a Seigniory in Mississikouy bay. He commanded at the River St. Joseph, in Illinois, in 1735, whence he returned to Canada in 1739. Lake Champlain, the shores of which were already frozen. I fortunately arrived at the government of Montreal without any accident. All the troops were in their quarters on the 20th of November.

The season was too far advanced to admit of my going down to Quebec, where I was to pass the winter. I preferred remaining at Montreal to be more convenient to the frontier, in case there were any movements during the winter.

Had M. de Vaudreuil thought proper to give me the detachment he has confided to his brother M. de Rigaud, for the expedition he has sent against Fort George on Lake St. Sacrament, I should have taken charge of it with pleasure, but I could not have done better than he has done. It has had all the success that could be expected.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil and the Marquis de Montcalm report to you, my Lord, what has occurred during the winter, and the situation of this Colony, for which reason I shall not enter into any detail on that head.

I flatter myself, if two corps of troops be operating during the campaign in two distinct places, that the Marquis de Vaudreuil will be pleased to confide the command of one of them to me. I shall always seek, with much ardor, every occasion wherein I shall be able to furnish proofs of my zeal for the King's service. I shall esteem myself very fortunate if it afford me an opportunity to deserve your favor and protection.

I have the honor to be, respectfully,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

Chev<sup>er</sup> DE LEVIS.

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 24th April, 1757.

My Lord,

No other change has occurred in the arrangement of the winter quarters, which I had the honor to report to you, than sending M. de Bourlamaque to Quebec in the place of Chevalier de Levis who could not proceed thither and has passed the winter, with me, at Montreal. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has made it his principal residence. We followed him to Quebec where he remained a month.

I had the honor to write you in my last despatch of the month of November, with some sort of uncertainty, that the English had destroyed their fortified magazines on the River Chouaguén, called Forts Bull and William. This news is certain.

We were not aware, and you, perhaps, have learned before us, by way of Isle Royale, that the English have, on the 12th of 8<sup>ber</sup>, burnt and evacuated Fort Gaspereaux, which they took from us in 1755, so as to retain only that of Beausejour, whose fortifications they are strengthening. Captain de Boishebert, of the Colonial troops, continues to maintain himself, in that quarter, with a few soldiers and fifteen hundred Acadians, who are dying, so to speak, of hunger. The news of him is dated the twelfth of January. He winters at Miramicui, and is greatly aided by Father Germain, a Jesuit.<sup>1</sup>

The Five Nations have sent one of the most memorable embassies seen for some time in Canada. I have drawn up an account thereof, which may afford an idea of these Indians and the manner in which they manage their political interests. I address it exclusively, my Lord, to you.

All the news from Detroit, Forts Duquesne and Niagara, assure us of the dispositions of the Indians of the Upper countries, which is principally owing to the fall of Choueguen.

Captain Pouchot, of the regiment of Bearn, who commands at Niagara, is wonderfully liked by the Indians, and conducts himself much to the satisfaction of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who has made considerable difficulty in granting that command to an officer of the troops of the Line.

We have, notwithstanding the winter, Indian parties continually out from Niagara and Fort Duquène to take some scalps from the English, who, on their side, have called on the Catabas, who are Indians settled near Carolina. These have scalped some Chouanons, near Fort Duquène, but one of our parties that went in pursuit killed several of them.

A detachment of 60 picked English soldiers, with 10 sergeants and 7 officers, in all 77 men, having set out to make some prisoners in the neighborhood of our forts, took, on the 21st January, 7 of our soldiers between Forts Carillon and St' Frederic. On news thereof reaching M. de Lusignan, a Colonial Captain, commanding at Fort Carillon, he detached 100 men under the orders of Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Basserode and de Lagrandville, Captains in the Languedoc and La Reine regiments, with some Indians and Canadians, who overtook the enemy about three o'clock in the afternoon and fell on their van-guard with fixed bayonets. As we had neglected to occupy a small height convenient to the road, the English retired thither and the firing continued until night. The enemy took advantage of the darkness to retire, leaving on the field of battle 42 men killed, 3 of whom were officers. We took eight prisoners and recovered our men. It has been since ascertained that of the 77 men composing that detachment, only three reëntered Fort George, the others having perished of cold, hunger and perhaps of their wounds. We have had nine men killed and 18 wounded, some of whom have died of their wounds. Captain de Basserode, who was in command, has been dangerously wounded. I cannot praise, too highly, the manner our officers and soldiers have conducted themselves in this action, which has been pretty brisk and fell, as it were, altogether on the regular troops, as only a solitary Ensign of the Colonials, with some Indians, were present. I flatter myself that if you have not this year found sufficient seniority of service in M. de Basserode to entitle him to the Cross of St. Louis, his action and wound will procure it for him next year. I shall have the honor to write to you on the subject at the end of the campaign, when submitting to you favors for our battalions.

On the 23rd of February, a strong detachment was sent off under the orders of M. de Rigaud de Vaudrenil, Governor of Three Rivers and brother of the Governor-General, and of M. de Longueuil, the King's Lieutenant at Quebec. This detachment consisted of 50 grenadiers and 200 volunteers drawn from the battalions of La Sarre, Royal Rousillon, Languedoc and Bearn, under the command of Captain Poulbariés of the Royal Rousillon grenadiers; 250

<sup>1</sup> Reverend CHARLES GERMAIN, S. Colonials and 600 Canadians and 300 Indians. It had to march 60 leagues on snow-shoes, carrying its provisions on sleds which may be drawn by dogs on good roads, and sleeping in the snow on a bear-skin under a simple sail to keep off the wind. In this way it crossed Lake Champlain and Lake St. Sacrament, and arrived on the 18th of March within a short league of Fort George, at the head of the latter lake. As it was impossible to attack that fort by main force the expedition contented itself with burning, during the nights of the 18th to the 19th, 19th to the 20th, 20th to the 21st, 21st to the 22<sup>d</sup>, everything outside the fort, over 300 bateaux, 4 sloops, one of which was pierced for 16 guns, a saw-mill, a great pile of building timber and fire-wood, two magazines full of provisions and military effects, a little stockaded fort containing a dozen of houses or barracks to lodge the troops and their sick. Notwithstanding the fire of musketry, some shells and cannon-shot, we lost only five soldiers in these different operations. We had six men slightly wounded, including two Indians. This success is of importance to the Colony. The enemy were in a condition to be beforehand with us in this part of the campaign. It is to be hoped that their operations will be retarded in consequence, and that the Canadians, who are here farmers and soldiers, will have time to plant their grain. This detachment had orders, likewise, to secure the position of Fort George.

Captain de Poulhariés of the grenadiers of the Royal Roussillon, behaved in the most gallant manner. He is an officer deserving of favors, on account of his services, his wounds and his industry. He possesses the stuff to make a good Lieutenant-Colonel of Infantry.

As we are not accustomed to such marches in Europe, and as the Canadians who are accustomed to brag, asserted that our troops could not support such fatigues, I paid particular attention carefully to select officers and soldiers qualified in every respect. Therefore were the Canadians forced to admit that we were not inferior to them in any point. To be six weeks on the march and to sleep, in a manner, continually on snow or ice, reduced to bread and pork, and often to drag or carry 15 days' provisions, will give you some idea of fatigue unknown in Europe; it was sustained with great gaiety without the slightest murmur. I postpone, until the end of the campaign, asking you for any favors for M. de Poulhariés and the other officers of this detachment who may be worthy of them.

Sieur Wolfs, a seconded Lieutenant after the affair of Bentheim, whom Baron de Dieskau brought with him last year, undertook, with the assistance of 20 of our soldiers, to burn a sloop pierced for 16 guns, which it was deemed proper not to touch, as it was within 15 paces of the fort, and under the protection of its cannon. He effected his purpose with the loss of two men and three wounded.

I consider it my duty to send you the names of the officers whom I had selected for this detachment. It is always flattering for them that the Minister should know the officers who have evinced considerable good will.

Among the various sufferings experienced by this detachment, there has occurred a singular accident, namely, total loss of sight from the reflection of the sun on the ice. One-third of the detachment has returned blind. Canadians, Indians and our men, to the number of fifteen score, had to be led by their comrades, but at the end of twice twenty-four hours, sight is restored with simple remedies.

This winter has been of the most severe character. The River St. Lawrence closed in the forepart of December, and is still firm enough for the passage of loaded sleighs on the 8th of April. The thermometer which, in France, in the year 1709, marked in the greatest cold only 15 degrees, has been several times at 27, often at 18 to 20, and almost always at 12 @ 15. A surprising quantity of snow fell. The campaign which had preceded this winter, has been very long; therefore, we have lost many more soldiers than we did last year, and much less than in Europe. The climate is very severe but very healthy.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM. ♦

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 24th April, 1757.

My Lord,

I have already had the honor of rendering you an account of the events which occurred from the close of our campaign to this date. This despatch is to inform you of some facts which have reference to discipline and of some particular circumstances.

I have found our officers inclined to contract bad marriages, which were not any more advantageous for the political interest of the Colony than for that of the King. M. de Vaudreuil appeared to me to favor them; he is encompassed by relatives of mean extraction. I have presented the Marquis de Vaudreuil on this occasion with a Memoir, copy whereof I annex hereunto. He appeared to coincide with my views. The difficulties I have interposed to the granting permissions, have prevented the marriages of two young Lieutenants, minors and under a father's control, who were consulting only their passion, and have put a stop to many similar projects. I have granted no permission except to M. de Parfourn, a Captain in the regiment of Languedoc, who has contracted a middling marriage, but which his father had authorized, and to Chevalier de Douglas, a Captain in the same regiment, who married a girl of respectability, very well connected in the Colony, having a handsome fortune.

Though believing that I have observed a proper conduct in this regard, as his Majesty has not explained himself regarding the marriages of officers, in the instruction handed to me, I would wish to be authorized by an answer written for exhibition.

If I have opposed, in any way, the marriages of the officers, I believed I could do nothing better for the interest of the Colony and kingdom, than to encourage those of the soldiers. Accordingly, in the winter of 1755, 1756, there had been only seven marriages of soldiers, and this year, eighty.

I take the liberty of representing to you that when the King will withdraw his troops from Canada, his Majesty ought to give a small gratuity to all his soldiers who would then desire to settle and die there. We would leave the greater part of them. They would make excellent colonists, brave defenders of New France, whereas a strict discipline and a diminution of pay will appear to them insupportable, on their return to the kingdom. The King will always find it easy to reorganize these battalions without such being expensive to him or to the Captains, by allowing them time, and the non-effective of the battalions will then be in proportion to their weakness.

I have found that our officers were inclined to games of hazard, I proposed to M. de Vaudreuil to prohibit them; I even placed an officer under arrest. There was no play either at Quebec or at Montreal, until M. de Vaudreuil's arrival at Quebec. M. Bigot loves to gamble. M. de Vaudreuil thought proper to permit a bank at M. Bigot's. I said what I considered my duty, but did not wish to forbid our officers playing at it; 'twas displeasing to M. de Vaudreuil and M. Bigot; the good of the service requires the contrary. Captain de Maron, of La Reine, has lost twelve thousand livres which have been paid, his Lieutenant-Colonel having lent them to him. This partiality in favor of M. Bigot's house would have caused gambling elsewhere, had I not placed the second Captain of one of our battalions under arrest. I write to M. de Machault on the subject of marriages. It concerns the Colony. I do not write anything to him concerning gaming; it would only serve to destroy the friendship between M. de Vaudreuil, M. Bigot and me. But I owe my Minister an account of my conduct.

You will be surprised that there was no superior officer of the Line with so strong a detachment.<sup>1</sup> Chevalier de Levy would have accepted the command. M. de Bourlamaque demanded it with much urgency. I supported him warmly, both in writing and verbally. But M. de Vaudreuil wished the expedition to be under M. Rigaud, his brother, and has reckoned on the intelligence of M. Dumas and M. Mercier, officers of the Colony, who are wanting neither in spirit nor in certain talents, nor in intrigue. M. de Dieskau, to his misfortune, reposed too much confidence in the latter. The same motive that caused M. de Vaudreuil's brother to march, sent forward fifteen hundred men. I submitted the plan of surprising Fort George, and burning, at least, the outer parts of the fort with eight hundred men, in a memoir communicated to M. de Vaudreuil on the thirteenth of January, with models of scaling ladders and of a bateau, carrying a twelve pounder. This bateau might have served this campaign on Lake St. Sacrament.

I believe that, had Chevalier de Levy or M. de Bourlamaque had charge of that expedition, the fort would have been better reconnoitred, and operations would have been carried out at the same time against Fort Lydius. These gentlemen have a good character, although their zeal hath suffered by the preference; they understand, as well as I do, the necessity of a spirit of conciliation. I have not ceased to communicate my reflections for the success of the expedition, to contribute to it by the selection of the detachment, and by the instructions which M. de Poulharies has closely followed. I continue to stand well with M. de Vaudreuil; I make representations to him but, at the same time, employ every means for the success of his projects, even when at variance from mine. You may assure the King of this, with whose service alone I occupy myself.

I cannot be otherwise than satisfied with Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque. They most ably second me. They live very respectably, a matter more indispensable in this Colony than in France, in order to obtain consideration with the Colonial troops. M. de Bourlamaque, during his sojourn at Quebec, won a great deal on the friendship and esteem of our troops. He had not the advantage, like Chevalier de Levis, of being an old acquaintance of theirs. I think that these gentlemen, as well as myself, would be glad to march a la paix, without being under any obligation. I enter into none of these details with M. de Machault, but write him enough to make him understand that Chevalier de Levis and M. de Bourlamaque would have taken charge of that expedition.

<sup>1</sup> These paragraphs seem to belong to, or be connected with, the preceding despatch and to refer to the expedition under M. de Rigaud. — En.

Some of our soldiers, four in number, have deserted in the Colony. 'Tis difficult to prevent them; we're not in France. I had them reported to the Court-Martial in order to have them outlawed. The Majors will transmit to you the sentences I have had read and published at the head of the regiments. I annex to this despatch the description of one of them, who, 'tis supposed, has gone back to France in a merchantman. He may fancy himself safe at home. His arrest there would be a good example and he could be sent back or tried at his first battalion.

The supplying of provisions and of the hospitals during the campaign has been hitherto in Canada in the hands of Commissaries (en regie). It has just been let out to contract as in France. Although 'tis the Commissaries who have become contractors, I think this last plan will be more advantageous to the King's service and more economical. We have lost one hundred men this winter; some were missing; we leave as many in the hospitals. We have one hundred and fifty at Niagara. Our six battalions will amount, at most, only to two thousand four hundred effective men, previous to the arrival of reinforcements. The battalion of La Reine and that of Languedoc consist of only nine companies.

Although I have to congratulate myself on the exactness of the Commandants of battalions and Adjutants, it is difficult to maintain strict discipline among the soldiers who are in separate quarters during the entire winter season, and, as it were, out of the officers' sight. None are together except the two battalions that are in garrison at Quebec and Montreal. Therefore, I shall have them all sent thither in rotation.

We cannot open the campaign before June, in consequence of want of provisions, and in order to wait for those from France. Operations on both sides will be in the direction of Lake St. Sacrament. The English may be delayed by the burning of their sloops and bateaux, but not so much as M. de Vaudreuil thinks. No apprehensions are entertained for Fort Duquesne; should many Indians come from the Upper country we shall be able to make a diversion by way of the River Chouaguen to lay waste the neighborhood of Corlac. 'Twill be an expedition for the Canadians; 'tis my advice. The fortifications of Carillon and Niagara will be continued; finally, the little Fort St. John, on Lake Champlain, which is the depôt of our provisions, will be placed beyond a coup de main. The English could burn it. I have written to that effect since the month of June, but we have a large extent of country to defend, much work to perform and but few men. Prisoners speak vaguely of an attack on Louisbourg. M. de Boishebert, who commands in the direction of the River St. John, has orders to proceed thither with the Acadians whenever the Governor of Louisbourg will call on him.

I am, with respect,

My Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. We have just received letters, my Lord, from Louisbourg dated the 3<sup>d</sup> February. Our battalions there are in good condition. They may be considered complete. Sieur de la Grive, Commissary of War, is on duty there, the English having sent him from Halifax in exchange for the one I had taken at Choueguen. He has some difficulty with M. Prevot, Commissaire Ordonnateur of the Marine. I hope the letters which M. Bigot, M. Doreil and I are writing in concert, on this occasion, will remove all the difficulties. We learn that since the declaration of War, some small privateers, belonging to Louisbourg, have brought prizes in there to the value of a hundred thousand écus.

Although the want of provisions obliges us to postpone taking the field until the month of June, M. de Bourlamaque is going to occupy the camp at Carillon with the battalions of the Royal Rousillon and of Bearn in the forepart of May; the battalion of La Sarre is at St. John, the battalion of Guienne at St. Thérèse, on Lake Champlain, to work at a fort and on a road, and to be ready to march to Carillon. Four hundred Canadians are going to Fort Duquesne.

M. de Montcalm to M. de Paulmy.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 21th April, 1757.

My Lord,

At the close of the campaign we were uncertain whether the English had destroyed their fortified storehouses called Forts Bull and William, on the River Chouaguen. We cannot doubt it, and the Indians of the Five Nations have assured us that they had been evacuated and burnt.

The Five Nations (the Iroquois are so named) have sent an embassy composed of 180 persons, including women and children, to Montreal in the beginning of winter. There had been some grand Councils on that occasion, to speak in the language of the country, that is to say, a species of Congress was held at Montreal, at which the domiciliated Iroquois, the Nepissings, the Algonkins, the Poteotamis and the Outaouais, Indian Nations attached to France, have assisted by Deputies. This embassy is the most memorable that ever had been in Canada, as well in regard to the number of the ambassadors and the nature of the objects discussed, as the good dispositions evinced by the Five Nations. There is reason to expect the most exact neutrality on their part. 'Tis even to be hoped, although these Nations are unwilling to take up the hatchet against the English, that many of their young men will follow us to the war. This is all that can be reasonably exacted from a people wedged in almost in the midst of English settlements.

Our domiciliated Indians have spoken to the Five Nations at these Councils menacingly and haughtily. The Marquis de Vaudreuil has promised them to forget their past conduct and to provide for all their wants, on condition that they remain faithful to their promises. These Indians have brought in and trampled under foot the medals of the English. Nevertheless, they did not conceal from us that they had deputies at Orange also. In fact, we learned, at the close of March, that the deputies had withdrawn from the English without being willing to enter into any engagement. This species of Congress has lasted all the month of December.

According to the information we receive from Fort Duquêne, Detroit and from Captain Pouchot, of the regiment of Bearn, Commandant of Fort Niagara, all the Indians of the Upper country are most strongly attached to us; that is owing principally to the fall of Choueguen. Parties have been out continually [despite of] the winter, to take some scalps from the English, who also sent for some Catabas, Indians, dwelling near Carolina, who have taken some scalps near Fort Duquène from the Chaounons, our allies; but one of our parties has killed several of them.

A detachment of 60 picked men of the English troops, with 10 sergeants and 7 officers, consisting in all of 77 men, set out to take some prisoners near our forts; captured 7 of our soldiers on the 21st January, between Fort Carillon and St. Frederic. On receipt of the news, M. de Lusignan, a Colonial Captain, commanding at Fort Carillon, detached 100 men under the orders of Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Basserode and de la Grandville, Captains in the regiments of Languedoc and La Reine, with some Indians and Canadians. This detachment came up with that of the enemy at three o'clock in the afternoon, and fell on their van-guard with fixed bayonets. As we had neglected to occupy a small hill near the road, the English retired thither, and the firing continued until nightfall. The enemy took advantage of the obscurity to retire, leaving on the field of battle 42 dead, 3 of whom were officers. We took 8 prisoners and recovered our men. It has since been ascertained that, of the 77 men composing this detachment, only three reentered Fort George, the others having perished of cold and hunger, and perhaps of their wounds. We have had 9 men killed and 18 wounded, some of whom have died of their wounds. Captain de Basserode, who commanded, has been dangerously wounded. I cannot too highly praise the manner our officers and soldiers behaved in this engagement, which has been pretty sharp, and devolved almost solely on the troops of the Line, as there was only one solitary Colonial Ensign in it.

On the 23<sup>d</sup> of February a strong detachment was sent out under the orders of M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of Three Rivers and brother of the Governor-General and of M. de Longueuil, the King's Lieutenant at Quebec. This detachment consisted of 50 grenadiers and 200 volunteers from the battalions of La Sarre, Royal Rousillon, Languedoc and Bearn, commanded by Captain de Poulharis of the grenadiers of the Royal Rousillon; of 259 Colonial troops, 600 Canadians and 300 Indians. It had to march 60 leagues on snow-shoes, having its provisions on sleds which can be drawn, in good roads, by dogs; sleeping on the snow on a bear's skin, with a simple sail which served as a protection against the wind. It crossed, in this way, Lake Champlain and Lake St. Sacrament, and arrived, on the 18th of March, within a short league of Fort George, situate at the head of the last mentioned lake. As it has not been possible to attack this fort by main force, operations were confined to burning, during the nights of the 15th and 19th; 19th and 20th; 20th and 21st; 21st and 22<sup>d</sup>, whatever was outside the fort, more than 300 bateaux, 4 sloops, one of which was pierced for 16 guns, a saw-mill, a large pile of building-timber and fire-wood; two storehouses full of articles for the troops, and provisions; a little stockade work containing a dozen houses and barracks to lodge the troops and their sick. Despite the fire of musketry, some shells and cannon-shot which they discharged, we lost, in these different operations, only five soldiers. We had six men slightly wounded, including two Indians. This success is the more important for the Colony, inasmuch as the enemy were in a condition to take the field, in that quarter, earlier than we. 'Tis to be hoped that their operations will be thereby retarded, and that the Canadians, who are here both farmers and soldiers, will have time to sow their grain. This detachment has, moreover, served to make itself certain of the exact position of Fort George.

The Canadians have been astonished to see that our officers and soldiers have yielded to them in nothing in this sort of march to which they were not so much accustomed. It must, in fact, be admitted, that no idea can be formed in Europe of the fatigue in which one is obliged, for weeks, to march and sleep almost continually on the snow and on the ice; to be reduced to bread and pork, and often to dragging or carrying provisions for fifteen days. Our troops bore it with much gaiety, and without the smallest murmur. I cannot speak too highly of M. de Paulharies, who commanded our detachment. He is an officer of high distinction.

Do not, my Lord, suspect the zeal of the superior officers belonging to the Line. Chevalier de Levis would have accepted the command of that detachment; M. de Bourlamaque had urgently demanded it, and I too had offered to manage this business, which might, according to circumstances, be of the greatest importance. For I had submitted on the 13th January a Memoir containing a plan of surprise, and for the execution, at least, of what has been effected; and I required only eight hundred men for that purpose. But the Marquis de Vaudreuil wished to entrust that operation to his brother.

We are led to hope that the hospitals attached to our camps and in the forts will be better managed than last year. This department and that of provisions, which up to the present time, had been in Canada, in the hands of Commissaries (en régie), have just been put out to contract, as in France.

The winter has been of the most severe character. The river St. Lawrence has been frozen since the forepart of December and still remains closed this 8th of April so as to admit of the passage of sleighs over it. The thermometer, which in the year 1709, in France, marked in the greatest cold only 15 degrees, has been repeatedly at 27, often 18 @ 20, and almost continually 12 @ 15. A great quantity of snow has fallen.

I am with respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

P. S. We have just received a letter from Louisbourg, dated the 3rd February. Our battalions may be considered complete, according to the statements sent me. I observe by the letters of M de Drencourt, Governor of Isle Royale, that there is no more trouble with the battalions, but M. de la Grive, the Commissary, whom the English had taken and sent back to Halifax in exchange for the one taken at Chouaguen, has some difficulty with M. Prévôt, Commissaire Ordonnateur of the Marine. I flatter myself that the letters M. Bigot, the Intendant of Canada, M. Doreil and I write on this occasion will communicate a spirit of conciliation which is highly necessary.

Since the declaration of War, some small armed vessels have gone from Louisbourg, which have not failed to bring in prizes amounting to one hundred thousand écus, according to what the Governor of Isle Royale writes.

An Account of the Embassy of the Five Nations, annexed to M. de Montcalm's letter of 24th April, 1757.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

The success of the last campaign had determined the Five Nations (A.) to send an embassy to Montreal. Some of their Ambassadors, 40 in number, with about 60 women and children,

(A.) The Five Nations, or Confederates, or Iroquois, a species of League or Association, formed by five peoples who, Iroquois by origin, compose only one single house, which is called the Iroquois Cabin, or the Grand Village. These peoples are the Senecas, Cayugas, Onontagués, Mohawks and Oneidas. They speak as many different dialects of one language, and arrived there on the night of the 27th of 9<sup>ber</sup>, and demanded an audience for the 28th. The Marquis de Montcalm and Chevalier de Levis were invited to this audience. When all were assembled, a Cayuga arose and, after a moment's meditation and silence, said: that as yet they were only Onondagas and Cayugas, that they were accompanied by some Cherakis, a Nation bordering on Carolina, which has been conquered and since adopted by them; that their brethren, the Senecas and Oneidas, would come immediately, after whose arrival they would speak of good affairs.

He then expressed the customary compliments, and concluded by recalling a message which had been given them with two strings of Wampum (B.) by the Commandant of Catarakoui. (C.) He demanded a private audience for the 29th in order to explain at it their answers on the subject of their Strings. The speaker adroitly insinuated, into his harangue, that they had been surprised that no person had come to meet them, and that they had not been received with the usual ceremonies. (D.)

The Marquis de Vaudreuil answered by compliments, assurances of protection and kindness; and in regard to the ceremony, of the omission of which they complained, he told them that they had arrived late and unexpectedly in Montreal.

The audience granted for the 29th was postponed to the 30th. The speaker, after having repeated the usual compliments and asking provisions and equipments, insinuated, when speaking of the causes of the delay of their voyage, that they had expected to remain at Montreal only four days; but that these four days may well become four months, and that at all events they had to do with a good Father who would not allow them to want for inhabit that part of North America, south of the Lakes which form the River St. Lawrence, and is bounded on the east by New-York, and on the south by the Apalaches. They are the greatest warriors of all those countries. There is not an Indian Nation that they have not attacked and subjugated; but as shrewd politicians as the Romans, they have adopted some of these conquered tribes and given them, so to say, the right of Iroquois citizenship on their mat. As for the rest, although by these adoptions their league is now composed of ten different Nations, they are continued to be called the Five Nations, as they originally were. A portion of these Nations has declared for us, another portion appears desirous to remain neutral. The Mohawks only have accepted the English hatchet.

(B.) Wampum is a sort of shell found on the New-York coast; they are Burgos or periwinkles, some of which are white, others violet, verging towards black. The white are of little value; the violet more in demand, and the more they incline to black the higher are they esteemed. Wampum, for state affairs, is shaped into small cylinders, a quarter of an Inch long, and proportionably thick. They are worked into two forms, Strings and Belts. The Strings consist of cylinders strung, without any order, one after another, like the beads of a rosary. The Belts are wide sashes, in which the white and purple beads are arranged in rows and tied by little leathern strings, whereof a very pretty tissue is formed. Their length, width and color are in proportion to the importance of the affair to be negotiated. Ordinary Belts consist of twelve rows of 180 beads each.

These Belts and Strings of Wampum are the universal agent among Indians, serving as money, jewelry, ornaments, annals, and for registers; 'tis the bond of nations and individuals; an inviolable and sacred pledge which guarantees messages, promises and treaties. As writing is not in use among them, they make a local memoir by means of these belts, each of which signifies a particular affair, or a circumstance of affairs. The Chiefs of the villages are the depositaries of them, and communicate them to the young people, who thus learn the history and engagements of their Nation.

In addition to the name Gaionne, which is most used to signify these Belts, the Indians gave them, also, that of Garihouna, which means, an Affair; that of Gouenda, as speech or message, and Grianderensera, which implies greatness or nobility, because Chiefs only are competent for the great affairs treated by Belts; they it is who furnish the Belts and Strings, and it is among them that they are divided, whenever presents are made to the villages and answers are given to the speeches of Ambassadors.

(C.) The name given to Fort Frontenac by the Indians.

(D.) The Five Nations are the only ones for whose reception there is an established etiquette. An Interpreter is sent to meet them, who presents them with some Strings of Wampum, and when they enter the town they are saluted by five discharges of cannon.

anything; that if their Father pleased, they were ready to speak of good business; if not, they would await the arrival of their brethren, the Senecas and Oneidas.

The speaker then produced, according to custom, the Invitation Belt, which the Marquis de Vaudreuil had furnished the Ambassador who came this summer, and in order to give himself more importance, said he was speaking in the name of 8 Nations.

Finally, he explained the speech of the Commandant of Catarakoui, delivered with two Strings of Wampum, to reassure them against reports propagated by some Indians in the English interest, with the design to indispose them against the French and to dissuade them from coming to Montreal. He added, that these intrigues did not stop them, and that they despised all the false reports. "Perhaps," he then added in a proud and animated tone, "whilst we are here, our wives and children, deprived of our protection, are exposed to the resentment of the English. Perhaps Colonel Johnson, weary of the vain efforts he has made "with us, speaks no longer to them in mild terms, but in threatening tones. What matters it "to us, after all? Let him threaten, let him even act; we will know how to avenge ourselves, "to defend ourselves, to die if needs be, and the dust we shall raise in fighting will ascend "even to the heavens."

The speaker continued his harangue by referring to the care they had taken to restrain their young men, by applauding the wisdom with which they had acted up to the present time, and by praying their Father to give them only wine in the morning so that they may preserve their senses throughout the entire day, but at night to give them some milk out of his left breast (E) because being nearer his heart, 'twould convey to their heads only agreeable ideas on which they would sleep in peace.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, after having acknowledged the Invitation Belt as his, and thanked them for having come, presented them six Strings of Wampum to wipe away their tears, to open their ears and cleanse their throats. He afterwards supplied their wants and told them they had too much shrewdness not to have discovered the artifice of the English, who are accustomed to deceive them, whose threats were vain; that only the weak threaten and the powerful strike without threatening; that for the rest, if the English attacked them, the General who has razed Chouaguen, was able to defend them; and thereupon the Marquis de Vaudreuil presented to the Ambassadors the Marquis de Montcalm, who sat beside him, and mentioned the kind conduct of that General towards two Indians of their Nation, who had been found carrying letters to the English, and the gracious reception he had given to those of the Five Nations, who had come to pay him a visit on the ruins of Chouaguen, although they had no part in the success of that expedition.

Father, resumed, then, with animation the Iroquois orator, We were the first to announce to the English that Chouaguen was no more. They were coming with their army to fight you. We stopped them on their way, telling them your warriors were as numerous as the leaves of the trees; that they were crushing the earth beneath their feet, and that nothing could resist them. The English perceived in us so little disposition to second them, that they themselves destroyed their storage forts (F.) as being thenceforward useless; thus, Father, we have had a share in the good business, at least by conveying to the English news which had astonished and dismayed, and determined them to avoid you and to destroy their forts, which, doubtless, would not have resisted you, but would at least have been difficult for you to take.

(F.) Forts William and Bull, erected on the territory of the Five Nations, about twenty leagues from Choueguen.

The orator terminated the session by presenting six Strings of Wampum, exactly of the same dimensions as those the Marquis de Vaudreuil had given them, and said, in presenting them :

Father. We thank you for having wiped away our tears, cleansed our throats, opened our ears ; although the Master of Life has favored you and you have lost few warriors, the least among them is dear to you, and his loss afflicts you. We present you these Strings to wipe away your tears, to clear your throat, so that you may speak to us, and to open your ears, that you may hear your children, who reckon on your treating them as your late Father treated them, whose Belts we bring back to you, in order the better to bind his messages.

The other Ambassadors from the Senecas and Oneidas arrived at Montreal on the 6th of X<sup>ber</sup>, and the deputation then amounted to 180 persons, including women and children. All the Deputies requested of the Marquis de Montcalm a private audience, which passed in reciprocal compliments, and which terminated with a glass of brandy to the Ambassadors, and a present of tobacco and vermilion from the Marquis de Montcalm to the young men. The Ambassadors invited him to attend the grand meeting, at which good business was to be transacted.

The Iroquois of the Sault St. Louis, those of the Lake, the Algonkins, Outaouacs and Pouteotamis were in like manner invited to this sort of Congress, the first session of which was held on the 13th in the large Government hall. The Ambassadors of the Five Nations assembled in the parlor of the Seminary of St. Sulpice, whence they proceeded in order to the Government house. The Grand Chief at their head, entered, dancing and weeping. They presented their 16 words—14 with Belts, the other two with Strings of Wampum. Some of the Belts were divided in two, so as to serve for two words.

They first gave a Belt in the name of the Eight Nations, to cover the deaths of Baron de Longueuil, Governor of Montreal, and of Baron de Longueuil, his son, killed at the affair of Lake St. Sacrament ; another on the behalf of the Onnontagués and Tascarorins in particular, to pledge those of that Nation to continue to participate in good affairs, as the deceased had always done ; a third to wipe away the Marquis de Vaudreuil's tears for the loss of his warriors during this campaign.

They next presented several other Belts to kindle in Montreal a perpetual fire ; to infuse life into the sap of the Tree of Peace there, whose leaves were ready to wither, and to replace the sun that is obscured by the clouds of bad affairs, by a new sun which should enlighten them all ; to induce all the French who were adopted by their cabins to concur with them in good business ; to offer to their Father, according to the ancient custom of their ancestors, a medicine capable of dispelling his humors ; to sweep off all filth which disfigured the Council mat here since the ancient Councils ceased to be held ; in fine, to recall to mind that the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Senior, had given them a large platter with a beaver's tail, being desirous to make them eat with their brethren all out of the same dish, and that he had also given them a tobacco pouch, with a plug of tobacco, recommending them to make use of it when the Great Pine would be fallen, in order to have only good thoughts and to form only one single family.

The orator spoke of the danger to which they were exposed ; the English having a scowling eye, and the French likewise. He says that, notwithstanding this critical position, no motive could induce them to quit the Belt of Peace ; that their weakness alone, when compared with us, prevented them offering themselves as mediators ; that as for the rest, they would always preserve that spirit of peace except towards the Flatheads and Chicachas ; they demanded a continuance of the permission to attack these, which had been granted them by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Senior. A Belt was then presented, in order to recall to mind that this Governor-General had given them a bow to shoot those Nations.

The orator presented another Belt in congratulation for the fall of Chouagen, and as a pledge of the joy that event had caused them, asking, at the same time, by four Strings of Wampum, that as the English refused them everything, even powder, some may be supplied them at a low rate at Frontenac and Niagara, as well as the merchandise of which they stand in need. He adroitly thanked the Marquis de Vaudreuil for having, by the destruction of Chouagen, reestablished the Five Nations in the possession of a place that was their property. He spoke of the establishment of carts at the Carrying place of Niagara as being prejudicial to them, inasmuch as formerly they did the transportation over that Carrying place themselves.

He said, that although the Delawares were not present, he answered for their intentions, and that their heart was sound. He concluded by inviting the domiciliated Iroquois, the Nepissings and all the other Nations present at that meeting, to join in sentiment and affection with them, to labor in common at good business, and, in order to determine them to this union, he called their attention to the family alliances contracted by reciprocal marriages since the elder Marquis de Vaudreuil had engaged them to eat the beaver's tail out of the same dish.

The session terminated by the orator of the Sault St. Louis, who spoke in the name of the domiciliated Iroquois, congratulating the Five Nations on the good dispositions in which their heart appeared to be; that he believed their words to be sincere; that for themselves, true children of Ononchio, they had upheld, and should always support him; that they were numerous; that such was the determination of the Outaouais and Pouteotamis also, and that Ononchio had thousands of Indians, attached and faithful to his word, from the countries where the Sun rises to the Great Lake in which it sets.

The words of the Five Nations were explained one by one by the Interpreter, recorded by the Secretary of the Government, and the Belts numbered according as received.

The second session, which had been fixed for the 14th, was postponed to the 15th. The same ceremony was observed at it as at the first.

The Cayuga orator, speaking in the name of the Five Nations, presented 3 Strings and 5 Belts of Wampum, which had been sent them before and after the fall of Chouagen, by the Marquis de Montcalm, both in his own name and in that of the Eight Indian Nations, who were with the army. He explained the messages represented by these Belts, the object of which had been, 1st. To notify them that they were to restrain their young people; to confine themselves to their mats and not to afford any aid to the English; otherwise, that their very brethren, the Iroquois of the Sault, would treat them as enemies. 2nd. To communicate to them the fall of Chouagen, and to tell them to remain quiet unless the English should wish to reestablish that place, which we destroyed in order to remove the war from the cabin of the Five Nations. The orator protested that, since the receipt of these messages, they had not and should not afford the English any aid, either in provisions, conveyances or scouts.

He presented a Belt of the Marquis de Vaudreuil the elder, which they preserve in their village as a preventive of bad affairs. In presenting it, he asked for the reestablishment of the ancient custom of keeping among them, as a resident officer, one of their relatives, that is, one of their tribes, to be a witness of their fidelity, the Interpreter of their messages to their Father, and his organ with them; that they were answerable for the person of such officer and of the Iroquois of the Sault and of the Lake who would accompany him; that it was necessary, also, that, pursuant to the ancient custom, this officer should notify his arrival at the River aux Ecorces, five leagues from Chouagen, and that they would send for him with the customary honors.

He finally gave two Strings of Wampum to announce the death of their Grand Chief, and presented the young man destined to replace him. This young man, about 16 years of age, rose up and saluted the Marquis de Vaudreuil.

The Oneida orator then spoke of the ancient attachment of his Nation for the French. He recalled the memory of a famous Oneida Chief named Tharea, who, in the time of the elder Marquis de Vaudreuil, came twice to Montreal to treat of good affairs, which, indeed, they had since ceased to speak about, but their dispositions towards the French were always the same, and such as might be desired. He gave a Belt as a guarantee of his word. He likewise presented the young Chief who had succeeded the old Chief and four Strings of Wampum, to notify the union between them and the Cheraquis, who entertained similar sentiments towards us.

The Cayuga orator terminated the session by calling, in a loud voice, each Nation according to its rank, and when he named it, the chief thereof uttered the cry of thanks which was repeated in cadence by all the Indians.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil said to them that he would communicate to them the day on which he would give his answer.

On the 21st a Council was held for that purpose. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, resuming all the words of the Five Nations, answered them in the same order. The result of these answers was to grant them an oblivion of all the past whilst exhorting them not to fall again into their errors. He showed them that the English were seeking only to deceive them, and pointed out to them the example of the Senecas, many of whose warriors had come to join the French. He promised to have all their necessities supplied at Frontenac and Niagara, and to restore the Carrying place of the latter post to them on condition that they should conduct themselves better than they had done hitherto, inasmuch as they had stolen some of the King's property there.

He permitted them to wage war on the Chicachas and forbade them to strike the Flatheads, who are now allies of France. Finally, he told them that he consented to send them an officer related to them; that is to say, of the families of Longueuil, Jonquiere and de la Chauvignerie, whensoever he should have proposals to make to them.

All these different speeches were accompanied by Belts and Strings of Wampum.

After the Marquis de Vaudreuil's answer, the Iroquois of the Sault and of the Lake, presented the Five Nations with a Belt felicitating them on their dispositions, exhorting them to persevere therein and inviting them to bring back the Mohawks, and thereby spare them the pain of shedding their brethren's blood.

An Algonkin, speaking in the name of his Nation and of the Nepissings, addressing the orator of the Five Nations, said: We, who were the first in this world that beheld the light of the sun and our Father's look; we, the first children of this land, we warn you, for this last time, that we strike whomsoever does our Father harm. Remember this word; there's a Belt to prevent you forgetting it.

Aouschik, a Nepissing chief, he who at the commencement of the siege of Chouagen killed the unfortunate Decomble,* then rose, his looks, his gesture and expression denoting furious anguish. What need, said he, of Councils, deliberations, proposals, when action is needed? I hate the Englishman. I thirst for his blood. I am going to bathe in it. And chanted his war-song at the same time.

An Outaouais chief next rose, and, after having presented a Belt to the Five Nations, said : We notify you, for the last time, to be faithful to the speech you have just solemnly delivered. If you falsify it, we will make a sacrifice of you, and your bloody mat will reproach you for your lack of faith. I am but a young chief; you see me now accompanied by few warriors, but in the spring the number of our warriors will make the earth tremble. Thereupon he sung his war-song.

The Pouteatamis orator, speaking more mildly, presented a Belt to the Five Nations, saying to them: Brethren, do not have sweet lips and a bitter heart, for we should be sorry to cease regarding you as brethren.

The Cayuga orator, then rising up, thanked the Marquis de Vaudreuil in the name of the Five Nations. He assured him of their good intentions; of their having cut off from their cabin the Mohawks, whose heart was wholly English; yet he hoped, by dint of shaking their head, to make them recover their lost senses and to bring them back to their Father. He then called the roll of all the Nations and the Assembly adjourned.

The session has been fixed for the morrow; but the young men having lost their reason (G.) the Ambassadors excused them and requested that it be postponed until the following day.

The Oneida orator opened the meeting by presenting a Belt to the Marquis de Vaudreuil to assure him that his words had persuaded them; that consequently, they had discharged from among them whatever evil might remain; that they brought in two medals the English had given them, and which they wished to trample in the dust; at the same time treading them under foot. He next gave a Belt to say that a Nation dwelling near them, which is neither English nor French, nor Indian, but supports, with impatience, the English yoke, had proposed to unite with them, to live in independence under the shelter of their cabin; that as children ought always to consult their Father before acting, he delivered the Belt of that Nation, in order that their Father should prescribe to them what they ought to do.

The orator of the Sault St. Louis appeared penetrated by this last proceeding of the Five Nations; congratulated them in the name of the domiciliated and Upper Indians, on the favorable dispositions he beheld them in; that his people did not regret having remained longer than they had at first designed, since they witnessed the submission of the Five Nations to their Father's will, and the manner they had rejected the marks of distinction with which the English wished to fascinate their eyes.

The Cayuga orator, addressing the domiciliated and Upper Tribes, in the name of the Eight Nations, said, that their speech was not yet ready; but that on the morrow they would be able to answer the Belts received from them.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil fixed the meeting for next day, that he may answer himself the last Belts, and that the Five Nations might answer the domiciliated and Upper Indians.

On the 24th was held the last session of this Grand Council. The Cayuga orator opened it by presenting a Belt in answer to that which the domiciliated Indians had given them.

Brethren, said he, we shall convey your Belt to the Mohawks to bring them back to their Father's arms; and in order to add more weight to that invitation which you send them, we shall join one in the name of the Five Nations.

Then addressing himself to the Algonkins and the Nepissings, and presenting them a Belt, he said: Brethren, you counseled us to observe, religiously, our words, and to do our Father's will. Our words are sincere, and our Father will be satisfied of our fidelity; act so that he be also satisfied of yours and show us the example of obedience to his will.

He presented another Belt to the Outaouais, and added: You have told us that you were but young people and small in number, and that you were expecting many warriors. We believe you to be great chiefs, for modesty is the characteristic of great warriors. We follow your speech.

Then he presented a Belt to the Pouteotamis, saying to them: Brethren. We shall follow your words as true children of Ononthio, but in reporting what has just occurred here, be careful to be exact, for many, on arriving at their villages, whether through forgetfulness or some other motive, do not tell things as they are, and a word changed becomes of consequence.

When the orator of the Five Nations was seated, the Marquis de Vaudreuil presented a Belt to answer the Oneidas. He thanked them for their good dispositions and for bringing back the English medals. He assured them that he would give them marks of distinction as soon as he should have received proofs of their affection, and should take care of them as they are his real children.

He caused a second Belt to be presented to them in answer to that of the Nation which is neither English, nor French, nor Indian, and added, that he knew that Nation; that it was a part of a people (H.) dwelling beyond the Great Lake and allies of the Great King; that he saw clearly the English domination was becoming odious; let them examine attentively whether the word of the people was sincere; in that case they would do well to incorporate them with themselves, as children of a common Father; that even should that Nation desire to remove to him, he would receive them with open arms and give them lands; but if that people made such propositions only to ward off war from the country they inhabited, these false pretences should not stop him; that he would go all over in search of the English and to continue good business.

The Oneida orator then thanked the Marquis de Vaudreuil and assured him his message should be conveyed to the Palatines, and that if the English were desirous of again settling at Chouagen, the Five Nations could effectually defend themselves; that the English were not so redoubtable, that they never dared to follow them through the woods; that, as for the rest, they would come to notify their Father of the movements of the English.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil caused the Five Nations to be thanked for the manner they had terminated the good business, and added, that it seemed to him they had conversed together long enough; he had no more to say to them; he was going to have them fitted out and furnished with the usual presents; that affairs of importance would call him to Quebec, and that he allowed them to take advantage of the ice to return home.

He next had the domiciliated Indians and those of the Upper country thanked for the part they had taken in the good business, and expressed to them his satisfaction at seeing them all reunited with the Five Nations and how delighted he was to be able to regard them all as Ononthio's children.

The orator of the Sault St. Louis, speaking in the name of the domiciliated and Upper Indians, expressed the joy they felt at seeing matters terminated so happily; and he thanked (H.) They are some families which left the Palatinate on account of religion, amounting, at most, to two hundred men. There is no certain information respecting their dispositions. What is sure is, that the English, as we learned in the latter end of March, had committed to jail, in Orange, one of their principal men, and have planted, in the midst of these European families, a garrison of 200 men in a stone house which they have converted into a fort.

the Five Nations for consenting to add in their names, a Belt to that the domiciliated Iroquois were sending to the Mohawks.

Some Iroquois from La Presentation (I.) were present at all the sessions of this negotiation, but never spoke separately nor in their proper and special name. The reason is, that being domiciliated only a very short time, they regarded themselves still as of the mat of the Five Nations who call La Presentation the confines of the Five Nations.

In regard to the Belts presented by the latter, each of them furnished in turn and contributed equally to that expense, and as the Indians are very particular in exhibiting the share they possess in these presents, at the end of each speech, the orator is careful, when handing the Belt, to cry out the name of the Canton, or Nation, which has furnished it.

On the 29th the Ambassadors of the Five Nations had their audience of leave. Some particular affairs were again transacted on that occasion; one of some importance. The Oneidas presented the Cayugas a Belt from which an English scalp was suspended. This proceeding had been the thought of an Iroquois, a shrewd politician, to get an English scalp introduced into the cabin of the Cayugas, where, as yet, there have not been any.

The Ambassadors asked to remain until the morrow, New-Year's day, because they had been told that on that day the Pale faces kissed each other and that liquor was furnished.

Such has been this famous embassy of the Five Nations, the most important that has occurred for a long time, and which ought be regarded indeed as important under existing circumstances. The Ambassadors, their women and children, have been fitted out entire and entertained at the King's expense from the moment of their arrival to that of their departure. They had also been furnished with supplies and provisions for their journey, and the civil and war chiefs have received special presents. These expenses are unavoidable. The neutrality of those Nations is one of the greatest advantages we could obtain over the English.<sup>1</sup>

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Quebec, 5th May, 1757.

My Lord,

I learn, at this moment, when the navigation opens, that a vessel is being sent to Acadia whence an officer is to proceed to Louisbourg. I am unwilling to allow this opportunity to pass without having the honor to give you some signs of life. I do so in great haste.

Notwithstanding the rigor of the most severe winter, during which the snow has been as much as ten or twelve feet deep, an expedition was set on foot which has partially succeeded. A detachment of 1,200 men and 300 Indians, under the orders of M. de Rigaud, a brother of M. de Vaudreuil, has burned the sheds and magazines outside of Fort George,<sup>2</sup> on Lake Saint Sacrament, a great many bateaux and three sloops, one of which was on the stocks and pierced for 16 guns.

(I.) A Mission planted in the upper part of the River St. Lawrence by Abbé Piquet, a Missionary of Saint Sulpice, who has attracted thither many Iroquois of the Five Nations; a settlement as advantageous for religion as for the state.

The design was to scale the fort if it could be surprised; but the only knowledge of the place was derived from the report of some prisoners and deserters. We had in that detachment 300 of our Regulars under the orders of Captain de Poulharies of the Royal Rousillon grenadiers. M. de Bourlamaque had offered to execute this enterprise. The Marquis de Montcalm had given a Lieutenant-Colonel as second, but the Marquis de Vaudreuil preferred M. de Rigaud, his brother, and M. de Longueuil,<sup>1</sup> the King's Lieutenant at Quebec. It was hoped that this expedition would put off, considerably, the opening of the campaign and afford us time to receive, before its commencement, the supplies of provisions which are expected from France and are greatly needed. Meanwhile, everybody is in motion; M. de Bourlamaque is about to proceed to Carillon; 400 Militia leave here for the Beautiful river, and the French troops are going to Carillon and St. John.

My secretary supplies my place at Montreal whilst I am dispatching the troops which are here, where I shall await the vessels from France and the reinforcements we are expecting.

Letters received last month from Louisbourg have informed us that M. de la Grive des Assises has been sent thither from Halifax as far back as October, doubtless in exchange. He has not written to me nor to Mess<sup>rs</sup> de Montcalm and Bigot. The latter has communicated a letter to me which he has received on business from M. Prévost, Commissary of the Marine, Ordonnateur at Isle Royale, containing a detail of the difficulties which exist between them. I write in consequence to M. de la Grive, to whom I give such advice and instructions as I consider necessary for the good of the service and to the point; I exhort him to concur in the promotion of peace and union in order to effect that; to sacrifice even some prerogatives, which one must learn to give up, so as to yield to the customs of the Colonies. This is the way I get along. In my position, 'tis often necessary to dispense with them and to dissemble. I think, my Lord, that this is a means of pleasing you. M. de Montcalm likewise writes to this Commissary, and we have communicated our letters to each other. M. Bigot gives him orders, which he has let me see. I would have the honor to transmit you copy of my letter had I had time. On the 30th of June, of last year, I had written to M. de la Grive my letter of congratulation, of detail and instruction, and I addressed it to M. d'Ortoman, Adjutant of the regiment of Burgundy.

The number of dead during the current winter has not been so considerable as I had feared. I shall be particular, my, Lord, to send you, by another opportunity, the minute thereof, with the return of the strength of the battalions. This occasion does not allow me time to do so.

We have had a great many marriages of soldiers and two of officers, viz., of Captains Douglas and Larfoura, of the battalion of Languedoc. The former married a young lady, and the other a citizen's daughter.

Pursuant to my intention, I ordered the sale this winter of the effects of M. de Dieskau, of M. Bernier, his Aid-de-Camp, and of those of the late M. de Combles; the whole was disposed of most advantageously.

Everything continues horribly dear, and if prices keep up to the same figure ever so short a time, it will be no longer possible to live on the King's allowance, however liberal it may seem in France.

I am, with most profound respect, your most humble and most obedient servant,

DOREIL.

<sup>1</sup> PAUL JOSEPH DE LONGUEUIL was son of Charles Le Moine, and brother of Charles, second Baron of Longueuil. He was a native of Canada, Captain in the troops of the Marine; Commandant of Detroit in 1747; Lieutenant-Governor of Three Rivers, and subsequently of Quebec. He remained in Canada after its surrender to the English, in whose favor he fought in 1775. He died, eventually, at Tours, in France, 12th May, 1778. Ibid. — En.

M. de Montcalm to Count d'Argenson.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Montreal, 23<sup>d</sup> May, 1757.

My Lord,

I have had the honor to write you by way of Louisbourg, under date 24th April, in order to render you an account of the divers events of the winter: An important embassy of the Five Nations, the consequences whereof are perceptible in the present dispositions of the greater portion of these Indians to attack the English, which we should not have dared to hope for a year ago.

An English detachment of 77 men entirely defeated, on the 21st January, by one of ours, in which were only some officers of the Line, under the orders of Captain de Basserode, of the Languedoc regiment.

We have had likewise a strong detachment of 1,500 men, commanded by M. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil, Governor of Three Rivers, including 250 men, under the orders of Captain Poulhariés, of the Royal Roussillon. This detachment has been 60 leagues on the ice to burn some sloops, bateaux and stores the enemy had under the protection of Fort George, which they possess on Lake St. Sacrament.

I shall have the honor, when vessels will be sent to France, to address you duplicates and even triplicates of those letters of the 24th April, which will inform you in detail of everything relating to the Colony, our troops and the conduct I observe. I have been very glad to write you again by Louisbourg to inform you of our situation; it would be good were it not for the want of provisions and the non-arrival, as yet, at Quebec, of ships from France; the people are in want of bread; the ration had to be reduced. Were provisions arrived at Quebec, it would still require time to have them arrive at the entrepôts.

M. de Bourlamaque is in command of fourteen hundred men at Carillon; the remainder of the troops are in camp or quartered so as to march thither in case of need.

'Tis fortunate that the enemy has not moved on Lake St. Sacrament; our advices by Indians and prisoners state that they are towards Fort Duquesne. In consequence of want of provisions, no other reinforcement than four hundred Canadians can be sent thither. I do not write by this occasion to M. de Machauts.

I am respectfully, my Lord,

Your most humble and

Most obedient servant,

MONTCALM.

*M. de Vaudreuil to M. de Moras.*Montreal, 1st June, 1757.

My Lord,

I have the honor to report to you whatever of interest has occurred at Carillon, since the letter I had the honor to address to the Keeper of the Seals on the 22nd of April, to inform him of the success gained by Mr. de Rigaud de Vaudreuil in the important mission I had confided to him against Fort George.

A party headed by Sieur de Langy de Montegron was to Kouarinet, where it took five prisoners.

A party of Outaouais and Nepissings, commanded by Sieur Bleury, took three scalps and three soldiers prisoners, in the vicinity of Fort Lydius.

Another party of twenty-four Iroquois and seven soldiers of the detachment of Marines, commanded by Sieur Langy de Montegron, took two prisoners in the vicinity of Fort George.

Twenty-five English embarked<sup>1</sup> near Carillon, about two hundred paces from the clearance. Three carpenters who had left without waiting for the escort, fell into this ambush; one was taken, the other two returned to the camp. M. de Bourlamaque immediately dispatched different detachments, but Sieurs Le Borgne de Boucherville and Langy de Montegron, at the head of five soldiers, were the only persons that could overtake the English, in the rear of Bald Mountain. They fired at once at them and raised the warwhoop. The terror of the English was so great that they abandoned their prisoner and their small field implements. The small force Mr. Le Borgne had with him did not admit of his continuing the pursuit of the English. This action, though trifling, preserves for us the tone of superiority.

Sieur Laforce at the head of four Indians of La Presentation, killed an Englishman near the River Corlac, a short distance from the town.

The result of the report of all these prisoners is:

That as soon as the English learned that Mr. de Rigaud was marching against Fort George, they called out six thousand men, to wit, the Scotch,<sup>2</sup> the two regiments of Halquet,<sup>3</sup> and Dumbur<sup>4</sup> and other troops, but learned, when on the point of marching, that the French had terminated their expedition.

That the number of Regulars in all the New England provinces was computed to be fifty-two thousand men; that five transports full of them, had arrived, escorted by two 70-gun ships; that the English were expecting some more in five other transports. This is a great exaggeration of the enemy's forces in the item of Regulars.

That none but the infirm remained in the settlements, and that those who were unwilling to march, paid five hundred pounds.

That the English were slowly repairing the damages Mr. de Rigaud had caused them; that there is neither bateau nor wagon at Fort George, nor at Fort Lidius; that the garrison of this latter fort consists of three hundred men, many of whom are sick, and of the first, the same as this winter, exclusive of three companies of Regulars and thirty-six Militia.

That the policy of the English is to keep on the defensive in that quarter.

That they intend operating on the coast; that Lord Lawdun is expecting a fleet of fifteen ships for the expedition against Louisbourg.

The scouts whom I have sent to Fort George have assured me that there was neither tent nor bateau, nor any extraordinary movement there.

<sup>4</sup> Lieutenant-General THOMAS DUNBAR had been Lieutenant-Colonel in the 18th or Royal Irish, previous to April, 1752, when he was appointed Colonel of the 48th foot. He accompanied Braddock's expedition, but in consequence of his inglorious retreat after the discomfiture of that General, was superseded in the command of his regiment, 11th November, 1755, and appointed Lieutenant Governor of Gibraltar. Though never again on active service, he became Major-General in January, 1758; Lieutenant-General December 18, 1760 (Sargent's Expedition of Braddock, 267), and died in 1767. Army List.—En.

From all these reports, my Lord, it appears that the English are nowise active in following up their project of attack on Carillon and St. Frederic, which proves what confusion Mr. de Rigaud's expedition has scattered among them.

'Tis indeed certain that they cannot dispense with replacing the bateaux, and whatever of theirs we have burnt; 'tis no small work.

This circumstance would be one of the most favorable for me to undertake the siege of Fort George; I have been constantly occupied with it; at the outset of last winter I sent for the greatest portion of the Indian Nations belonging to the Upper countries, and am daily expecting about twelve hundred. All preparations are made, but, unfortunately, I am not free from anxiety in regard to provisions. The scarcity is so great that I am obliged to confine myself to keeping a camp at Carillon of the battalions of La Sarre and Bearn; again I am necessitated to reduce the troops to what is purely necessary to subsist them, and I fear, with reason, that in a short time a number of them will be sick, from the bad quality of the pork issued to them, as I have no other. As it is important that the enemy should not perceive our situation, I have established a camp at the head of the Carrying place, of about two hundred men of the Colonial troops, Canadians or Indians. I have posted another camp of about one hundred men at the Fall, and have laid down, for the Commanders of these two camps, the manœuvre they were to have recourse to, in order to deceive the enemy.

At the same time I provided for the safety of Carillon by encamping the battalion of Royal Rousillon, on the Fort St. John road, where it is at work repairing the road between La Prairie and that fort, and the Guienne battalion at Chambly, where it, too, is at work repairing the road from St. Thérèse to port Gêbeaucour. I have had prepared, at Fort St. John, the number of bateaux necessary for the quick conveyance of these two battalions to Carillon, the moment Mr. Bourlamaque will demand them.

Such, my Lord, is the best that I can do. I could not economize, too much, the small quantity of provisions we have in the Colony which otherwise would be exposed to absolute want, unless those I had the honor to ask you for last fall and those of the contractor reach us forthwith.

'Tis greatly to be desired that I be not obliged, before the receipt of these provisions, to employ our forces to resist the enemy, for then I would be forced to seize the little that remains with each individual and farmer in the Colony, and to support the towns and villages on the domestic cattle, which would destroy the race.

I am, with most profound respect, my Lord,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,
(Signed), VAUDREUIL.

[Département de la Guerre, Paris.]

Camp at Carillon, June 16, 1757.

My Lord,

I have the honor to address you hereunto annexed two copies of the judgment rendered against two deserters of the second battalion of the Bearn regiment. They have been read at the head of the troops of this camp, and will be affixed in the places of the Colony wherever necessary.

Permit me to have the honor of rendering you an account of what has occurred since the opening of the campaign at this camp which I superintend. It is composed of the Royal Rousillon and Bearn regiments, one picket of La Sarre, two pickets of Languedoc and a detachment of the Marine; I have not the honor of sending you a return of their condition, because I am ignorant of the fate of my letter. M. de Bourlamaque, destined to command on this frontier, arrived here on the 13th May, the Royal Rousillon on the 14th, the detachment of the troops of the Marine on the 16th, which proceeded on the 18th to camp at the Carrying place and the Falls; the regiment of Bearn on the 20th; the pickets had passed the winter there with a detachment of the Marine, or had remained there on returning from Fort George. The troops of the Line are encamped near the fort, they commenced work on the 16th, and furnish, daily, more than 400 pioneers or workmen, who are employed to finish a curtain, to construct two half-moons, to dig their trenches and the covert-ways. I doubt not, my Lord, you have the plan of it. A considerable abatis has been thrown up on the right bank of the river of the Falls, to secure its navigation, and another fort in front of the fort, to command its approaches.

On the 17th of last month, the English came, to the number of 26, within half a league of this place, and carried off a carpenter who had set out before the escort. M. de Bourlamaque heard of it in sufficient season to send three detachments, each of 20 men, in pursuit—two by land and one by water, as far as the Falls of Lake St. Sacrament. Two officers and five soldiers of that detachment overtook the English five leagues from here; came so close to them as to force them to abandon the carpenter, whom they did not injure; also their provisions and a part of their baggage.

On the 7th of this month we had a trifling alarm. M. de Gaspé, who commands the camp at the Carrying place, has orders to fire some guns whenever he is certain that the enemy designs to attack him; the Commandant of the Falls to make the same signal to notify M. de Bourlamaque of the enemy's arrival. We heard a considerable firing, followed by several discharges of small mortars (boîtes). On hearing the general, which is to be beaten whenever the boîtes are fired, M. de Bourlamaque proceeded by water to the Fall, with two companies of grenadiers and three pickets; the Royal Rousillon is within a league of this place, on the right of the fall; Bearn at the Falls in the camp it occupied last year. These two regiments are intrusted with the defence of a front by which the enemy must pass, in order to be able to intersect the two advanced camps. On disembarking, M. de Bourlamaque caused the grenadier company of Bearn, with the three pickets, to march some minutes after that of the Royal Rousillon, with two pickets of the Bearn, which followed to reinforce or extricate M. de Gaspé, of whom there was no intelligence. He found the camp very quiet; learned that a troop of nearly 200 men had approached it before the departure of the scout; had responded to the challenge by several shots, and had retired on the first discharge of the boîtes to embark within a league of that place in fourteen barges; that twenty-five men, sent on their trail, a quarter of an hour after their departure, discovered them lying in the middle of the lake. M. de Bourlamaque dispatched some Indians who had arrived the previous evening with some officers and soldiers, to the north and south, to be certain of the retreat of the enemy, and to send orders to the troops to return to the camp. The detachments returned at four o'clock and informed M. de Bourlamaque that they had seen the barges stop near the Sugar loaf.

A party of 90 Outaouas, Iroquois, Nepissings, Algonkins and Sauteurs, commanded by an officer attached to these Nations, who had demanded of M. de Bourlamaque a sergeant and seven soldiers of the Line whom he knew, proceeded on the 5th to make an attack between Fort Lydius and Fort George; they returned in detail on the 12th, and reported that they attacked on the 10th some pioneers and their escort, took four prisoners and three scalps; that the English had hotly pursued them and forced them to disperse; that, wishing to return to their canoes, they discovered a good many trails which obliged them to abandon that intention also; to leave one of their chiefs, who is wounded, under the care of five young men; to abandon a sergeant and two soldiers who could not march, and to proceed slowly by land to Cape Diamond, whence they made a signal to send in search of them.

M. de Bourlamaque did not place entire confidence in their statement; reproached them with having abandoned their chief and the soldiers whom they had so urgently requested.

The depositions of the four prisoners agree in assuring that General Loudon embarked at New-York with almost all the Regulars and a great many Militia, to lay siege to Louisbourg; that there are at Forts George and Lydius only 7 @ 800 Regulars, near two thousand Militia, and that as many more are expected.
